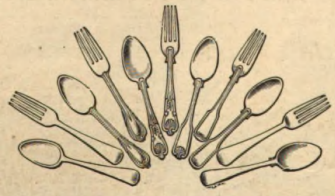
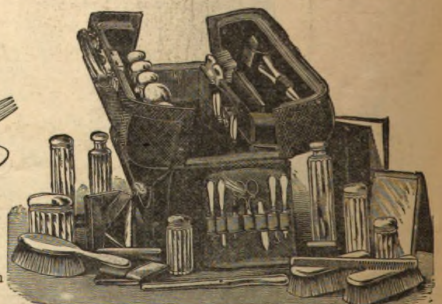
The Poet Laureate has made King Harold die like a hero on the battlefield of Senlac, a fact to which all history testifies. There was, however, a tradition at an early period that Harold had escaped from the slaughter at Hastings; and about one hundred and fifty years after that event a narrative was written describing his life subsequent to the battle. It is now brought before the English reader under the title of Vita Haroldi, the Romance of the Life of Harold, King of England, from the Unique Manuscript in the British Museum, edited, with notes and a translation, by Walter De Gray Birch, F.S.A. (Elliot Stock). According to this curious statement, Harold was found on the field by a Saracen woman, taken to Winchester and concealed there for two years. He tries to obtain allies against the Normans, but fails. Then follows a period of repentance and isolation: the King makes a long pilgrimage, spends many years abroad, returns to England, lives ten years "in a certain rock in solitude," passes a long time in Wales, and ultimately dies at Chester. Harold's asceticism is said to have been extreme during the latter years of his life. "He wore for a long time a corslet next his skin, till it was all rotten and quite worn away. In front of his eyes he hung at all times a cloth, which covered nearly the whole of his face, so that when he wished to walk at all far he required the hand of a guide. Why he did this his attendant did not know; but perhaps he did it to hide the appearance of the wounds upon his gashed face, or lest if a free outlet for his eyes existed, an opening for secular vanities might be made for his soul." There is a difficulty in connection with this MS., which Mr. Birch states but does not attempt to solve. It is supposed that the "Life" was written to prove that Harold was not buried at Waltham, a tradition which "made that great House of Secular Canons rich and famous in the annals of British Monasticism." Yet there is little doubt that the work was composed in the Abbey, and certain that it was transcribed there. It comes to this, therefore, that the authorities of the House allowed "a transcript, or perhaps more than one, to be made of a treatise founded upon a fact, and professing to prove a fact, which, if generally accepted, would have utterly destroyed the cultus of the departed monarch, on which the flourishing condition of the Abbey, both morally and financially, depended." Such conduct seems altogether inexplicable. We may add that the translation of the manuscript is now made for the first time, and Mr. Birch deserves the thanks of the public for unearthing and presenting in so pleasant a form a narrative, whether of fact or fiction, interesting from its suggestiveness and still more interesting from its antiquity.



Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson, Bart., has agreed to continue the mastership of the Essex Hunt for another season.



NOVELS.

Seldom is it the privilege of the reader of modern novels to take up one so fresh, so vivid, so strong in its incidents as is Diana of the Crossways, by George Meredith (Chapman and Hall; in 3 vols.). Writing of the early part of this century, the author makes his heroine—Diana—a moving, living, breathing being; with a rare beauty, a rare wit, so alive to the reader that time passes on and he feels that she also is living her life, with all its storms, its passing currents, its amusements, its interests. And this Diana is not an entire creation, but she was a social reality, mentioned often in the diaries of the day; and the incident of the publication of the Cabinet secret (although, with permissible license, it is stated to have been intrusted to a personal confidant by Mr. Meredith) is a matter of history, and refers to the premature disclosure of Sir Robert Peel's intended repeal of the Corn Laws by one of the Cabinet to the empress of his heart, and so—to the editor. But all is brocaded with gems of thought and harmonised by the skill of an artistic hand. The poetical friendship between two women—so poetical, so ideal, and so possible—is very powerfully described. Emma's love has the worshipping fibre in it which there must be on one side, coupled with talent, intellectual gifts to a certain extent, and the nobility of faith; with Diana, it is the feeling of being thoroughly understood, even to every vibration of voice, every shade of word, and, stronger still, the certainty that here there will always be found rest, trust, and love till the world's end, that binds her soul to that other. Excitement and sensationalism of the best there are, surely, for those to whom such sensations are a necessity in their reading: in the ride of Redworth through the burning sunset "with junipers behind him"; the curious sensation stealing over his frame when he fancies he sees two figures vanishing through the churchyard, where in the moonlight the gravestones were legible; the amusing and characteristic episode of the man Hedger (a true Hampshire and Sussex name), and the dissection of the "fair white pig"; the night-watch of Diana, so well drawn that it is not over-drawn; and the thrilling scenes between the passionate lovers. Then, how clever is the dissection of Lady Wathin and her particular world, and how she is visible in the description "a lady of incisive features bound in stale parchment"; how true to her nature the supposition and earnest conviction that Diana would, on hearing of Mr. Warwick's death, try to detach Percy Dacier from Constance Asper. The difference between the heroine's nature and Lady Wathin's is contained so succinctly in a sentence that we quote it, "The intrusion of the spontaneous on the stereotyped would have clashed." That this vein (the stereotyped), strongly developed, runs through the English as a people is well known, and the condemnation of originality is sweeping amongst mortals brought up on the usual lines of the commonplace. How accurately Diana's phases of thought and surging dreams are read, shows what a thorough grasp of her character the author has. To be noted, besides, are Percy's wakeful night with the Bell at Rovio, a little village below the Generoso, and his parting scene with Diana—on her part the awful maddening rising of the thought that by her deed she had betrayed the man she loved, her acceptation of the punishment, and the powerful ending of the scene, which is not too long, not too short, but word for word what it should artistically be, each parting from each as those two would have parted. Mr. Meredith can perfectly describe the passionate woman controlled by her immense self-respect; and he profoundly appreciates the little inflections of voice, the little finenesse of manner, the choice of ordinary words put in such a way that they are commonplace no longer; and the voice is heard, the manner felt; and the reader is conscious that it is the instinct of great talent, the shrewdness of wit, the discrimination of tact, which can divine and essentially balance. The English is expressive and unique; sometimes the phrases and joint words are a little brusque, a little over-strained, and give the impression of affectation; but this only occasionally; and the splendid originality, coupled with the absolute truthfulness of the feelings described in many passages, fascinate the reader. Can anything be better told than the scene of Lady Dunstane's visit to her heartbroken friend, and her soothing ministrations? The characters are all well drawn and lifelike; but the heroine is the key-note to the book—the presiding central figure round which all the others revolve, not as round an exaggerated deity, but round what is assuredly more attractive, as it is certainly more difficult of description—a perfectly natural woman. The interest heightens as the story and life grow older—no flagging attention for the reader—on he is impelled—the beauty of some soft saying, the lure of some passionate love scene, the lament of the woman that, by the confession of her love, she is humiliated—all bear him on, on resistless wings.

Railway travellers who grow impatient at the delays of the South-Eastern and other railways will find solace in Mr. Sutherland Edwards' Missing Man (Remington and Co.), a "tale of incident," printed in thoroughly readable type. It deals pleasantly with the ordinary incidents of a sensation novel—a confiding husband, a faithless wife, a shipwreck, a duel, and the somewhat novel psychological problem as to how far a man can forget his own identity, and honestly personate someone else. The story is short, and hangs so well together that, if once commenced, the reader is not likely to lay it aside until he reaches the dénouement.

RHEUMATIC GOUT.
Major PAKENHAM, Longstone House, Armagh, writes, Feb. 23, 1885:—
"I am very happy to inform you that the ELECTROPATHIC BELT which you supplied me with has completely cured me of the Rheumatic Gout from which I had suffered such intense agony for nearly two years, and I now feel as strong and active as I have ever felt in my life. Several of my friends have, on my recommendation, tried these Belts, and in every case the result has been most satisfactory."

NERVOUS DEBILITY.
Mr. W. A. SMITH, 6, Exeter-st., Woodhouse-lane, Leeds, writes:—
"Oct. 23, 1884.—I am heartily thankful that I ever consulted you for advice with regard to my advanced stage of Nervous Debility. I do not feel like the same man I did previous to wearing your ELECTROPATHIC Appliances. I am more fitted for business, for study, and better able to converse than ever before. I have every confidence in the ELECTROPATHIC BELT; and you can give publicity to this if you wish."

NOTE.—The ELECTROPATHIC BELT is adapted for either a Lady or a Gentleman. Please send size of Waist when ordering.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

The various annual contests between the "dark blue" of Oxford and the "light blue" of Cambridge include all sorts of games, from chess and billiards (always poor exhibitions) at the beginning of the season to football at the end. The most noteworthy, however, are three—the "athletic" contest at Lillie-bridge, the boat-race at Putney-Mortlake, and the cricket-match (in the summer) at Lord's. Of these three, two have already been decided. At Lillie-bridge, on the 27th ult., the "Dark Blue" won 5½ events (dead-heat of three for the high jump—two "Dark Blues" and one "Light Blue," the mile, putting the weight, the quarter of a mile, the 120 yards hurdle-race, and the long jump), against 3½ (throwing the hammer, the hundred yards race, dead-heat for high jump, and the three miles race). The "Dark Blue," on the whole number, from 1864, have now won 100 to 97. This year it was considered remarkable that both Mr. McNeill, president of the "Dark Blue" club, and Mr. Eliot, president of the "Light Blue" club, should, after several unsuccessful attempts on other occasions, have won each his "particular weakness," the hurdle-race and the three miles, respectively, in their year of office. At Putney-Mortlake, on the 28th ult., the boat-race was won by "Dark Blue," making, according to the usual calculation, twenty-three victories for Oxford against eighteen for Cambridge, with one dead-heat. Once more the race "followed the betting," which was at one time as much as 3½ to 1 on Oxford, though the odds dropped to 5 to 4. Officially, Oxford won by "a length and a quarter" clear, but might probably have won by enough to justify the higher odds. There is no object, however, in winning by as much as possible; and the best of a boat-race is that the leading crew can give its "wash" to the other, and the stroke of the former can generally take it easy at the end, watching the efforts of the latter, and using no more labour than is absolutely necessary to keep a respectable distance ahead. Besides, No. 6 in the Oxford boat "slipped" his shoulder.

Last week the lovers and followers of horse-racing on the flat had their first opportunity this year of indulging in that pastime, combined with not a little steeplechasing, at Lincoln and Liverpool. Lincoln began it on Monday, and Liverpool ended the week's racing on Saturday. "First blood," to use the language of the pugilists, might be claimed for Mr. R. C. Naylor, who won the first flat-race of the season—the Trial Stakes at Lincoln—with Forethought, three years old, ridden by F. Barrett. The first great handicap of the season, the Lincolnshire Handicap, was won by the favourite, the Irish horse Bendigo; and the Grand National Steeplechase, at Liverpool, was also won by the favourite, Roquefort, ridden by Mr. E. P. Wilson, who also rode the winner, Voluptuary, last year. Curiously enough, on the 26th ult., at Liverpool, the favourite won in every race; and, curiously enough, again, the "crack" jockey, Mr. F. Archer, did not win a single race until his seventh attempt, which was on Round Shot, winner of the Prince's Park Plate at Liverpool. The first notable race for two-year-olds this season, the Brocklesby Stakes at Lincoln, was won by a colt, The Bard, son of Petrarch. This is noteworthy, because the Brocklesby has been won by fillies (receiving an allowance in weight) seventeen times out of twenty-two. The Bard, moreover, proceeded to win the Molyneux Stakes at Liverpool, carrying 7 lb. extra. The sensation of the Grand National was the behaviour of Zoedone, the second favourite, and the winner two years ago: both in the preliminary canter and in the race she fell, but without doing serious injury, and most fortunately, to her gallant owner and rider, Count Kinsky.

About the same time, at any rate on the same day, as the race between Oxford and Cambridge, a much more important race—a sculling-race for the championship of the world between Messrs. Beach and Hanlan—took place at the Antipodes, on the Parramatta. Beach won by from six to eight lengths, it is said. The Australians believed in him fervently; and their belief has been justified. The Canadian, Hanlan, the best oarsman the world had ever seen, it was thought, up to his date, has now succumbed for the second time to Beach, whose former victory is thus proved to have not been the "fluke" some people considered it to have been. There is always as good a fish in the sea as ever came out of it; and, as the Irishman would say, "a good deal betther too."

The ways of the "rulers of the Queen's Navee" are often inscrutable, and no one seems to know the reason why the corvette Conquest, which was built five years ago, has been laid up ever since in Hamoaze. She is the ninth vessel of what is known as Class C, and the other eight have all been out to sea, but just now every ship we have is wanted, so she has been overhauled and her rigging found to be rotten—not from use, but the want of it.

The French Marines at Formosa are suffering terribly from illness and the lack of medical remedies and comforts. The 1500 men who took Kelung in the autumn are reduced to less than 600 by cholera and typhoid fever, and the survivors look more like walking corpses than human beings, having been enfeebled either by last summer's campaign in Tonquin, or by a sojourn in Cochin China. The doctors are said to be without the barest necessaries for the sick and wounded, and it is they who have reported this sad state of things to a French medical journal.

Amongst the several hundred gifts received by Lady Ermyntrude Malet on the occasion of her marriage, was one exceptionally beautiful curiosity presented by the Khedive. It consisted of a necklet of green beetles in a setting of enamelled, hammered gold, and those who have seen it report it worthy of a place in the show-cases in the British Museum.

There are four 81-ton guns on board the Inflexible, and they cost £10,075 each. One of these, after firing eighty-six rounds, is damaged, and requires re-lining, which will cost something like £400. Luckily, there is a reserve gun of 80 tons at Shoeburyness; so that the Inflexible need not be useless while her own weapon is being repaired, and John Bull's pocket is still well furnished, in spite of all the talk about hard times. Besides, all this kind of thing means additional labour; and that is good news for the vast army of the unemployed.

Apropos of the unemployed, an experiment made recently on a sewage farm at Norwood points to the fact that a great many of the men who make an outcry about the scarcity of work are those who prefer idleness to industry. It has always been the custom to have this farm ploughed up in the spring, but as a very large number of men in the neighbourhood professed to be out of work, the manager arranged this year to use spade husbandry instead. About two dozen labourers were engaged, provided with spades, and set to work, but no sooner were they left to themselves than they retired to a shed, pulled up some palings and lit a fire, leaving one or two scouts on the look-out for stray philanthropists. Gentlemen who had urged the advisability of the plan naturally walked over to see how it answered, and on such occasions a shrill whistle summoned the men from the shed, and they made some pretence of digging for a little while. One of these visitors secreted himself in a hollow tree, and observed that one shivering, shoeless wretch who appeared desirous of earning a little money was shamefully pelted, buffeted, and abused, while the rest planned the theft of the manager's dog-kennel, stuck their spades in the ground and sat astride them, and accounted it a doughty deed to break one. It is almost needless to add that this scheme of providing employment has been given up in disgust.

Russian aristocrats are great connoisseurs in tea, and their favourite brand (if one may borrow a word sacred to less innocent beverages) is called Baïkovoï-Tchaï. The infusion when made is not darker than amber, and it has a delicious perfume, which is caused by a mixture of jasmin-blossoms, the flower being cultivated in China as freely as we grow potatoes, and always for the purpose of adding aroma to the most delicate teas. Baïkovoï only grows in one district, which is about seven days' journey from the town of Fou-Tchéou; and some idea of the profits made in the tea-trade may be gathered from the fact that on the spot one lan, or 150 pounds, of it may be purchased for 8s. 4d., but by the time it reaches St. Petersburg the dealers ask and obtain £123 10s. for the same quantity.

The simple faith of Hassan Fehmi Pasha is something refreshing. He looks upon England as a great Moslem Power and the natural ally of the Sultan of Turkey. He urges the value of the Sick Man's friendship in view of possible complications in Afghanistan and elsewhere, and maintains that the British Lion should make common cause with him in all parts of the world. If the Mahdi be a true representative of El Islam this programme would surely include "peace with honour."

The British Navy will be considerably increased this year, for at least eight splendid new vessels will be completed. They will include the Colossus, Collingwood, Calliope, Edinburgh, Impérieuse, Scout, Surprise, and Alacrity. Several of them are being built on the Clyde and Tyne, but will be finished and fitted in Government dockyards. This is something like activity, and will give employment to many hundreds of men. One might almost say thousands of men, seeing that 700 were employed last week on the Camperdown.

The Spring Flower Show at the Crystal Palace on the 27th and 28th, though small, was choice, and a perfect feast to such lovers of flowers as have an all-round affection for them, rather than a craze after any particular fancy that may happen to be fashionable. The saxifrages were many and good, the seedling auriculas splendid; the very dark, almost black, hyacinths curious, and not too ornamental. Ordinary observers were most gratified by a few well-grown, sweet-scented, and lovely roses shown by Paul, of Cheshunt; the wonderfully fine pot violets exhibited by Turner, of Slough; and the huge clumps of lily of the valley, masses of snowy bloom and exquisite odour, shown by several well-known firms of florists.

Last Easter a good deal of money was made in country places by gathering primroses, which certain enterprising market gardeners sent up to London by the ton for the purpose of church decoration. This year they will hardly be so plentiful, because Easter falls earlier, and the cold winds have retarded the full and bountiful development of the blossoms. Of the vast quantity of primroses sold in London a considerable proportion has been imported this year.

Why should the chancels of our churches be decorated at Easter with costly exotics, such as gardenias, azalias, arum-lilies, and even orchids? They do not spring up spontaneously out of Mother Earth after a winter sleep, and consequently do not typify a resurrection to new and lovelier life. We put plenty of primroses and mosses and other woodland beauties in the nave; but even decoration should be consistent, and spring flowers as emblems of the Resurrection are quite as suitable for the Holy of Holies as for the Court of the Gentiles, or, in modern parlance, for the chancel as for the body of the church.

There is a fresh instance of the advance made by women towards the higher walks of life until lately only attainable by the sterner sex. A young lady has been appointed vaccination officer for Fordingbridge, in Hampshire, and the appointment has been ratified by the authorities. Perhaps the post is not a particularly exalted one, but, nevertheless, it is progress, and an encouragement to female workers. Even the obstinate anti-vaccinators, who pay fines rather than comply with the law, may now be charmed into complying with it at the persuasion of Miss Isabella Oates, who is stated to be young, attractive, amiable, and clever.

The quaint old Norman church dedicated to St. Oswald at Oswaldkirk, North Yorkshire, is going to be restored. In this edifice it was that John Tillotson, destined to become one of the most celebrated divines of the Church of England, preached his first sermon. He had only just been ordained at the time, although he was thirty years of age. Afterwards he became Curate of Cheshunt, where "he lived, with Sir Thomas Dacres, at the great house near the church." In his life of Tillotson, Mr. Birch tells a story which Southey has quoted, and which serves to show the attitude of the public towards preachers in the time of Cromwell. "He prevailed," says Birch, "with an old Oliverian soldier who set up for an Anabaptist preacher there, and preached in a red coat, and was much followed in that place, to desist from that encroachment upon the parish minister, and the usurpation of the priest's office, and to betake himself to some honest employment." This suggestion of the dishonesty of preaching is a significant sign of the times. It is to be hoped that the little church near Sowerby will not be restored out of recognition, but that so interesting a memento of the great Primate will be allowed to stand in its original condition as nearly as is possible.

The Government and the public are considerably indebted for the remarkably prompt inter-communication between England and Egypt to the admirably effective service of the Eastern Telegraph Company, which has, under the sagacious direction of Mr. John Pender, M.P., and Sir James Anderson, brought cable telegraphy to a wonderful pitch of perfection. A fine fleet of cable-ships, expressly built for this service, is maintained by the Eastern Telegraph Company. The latest is a very handsome steam-ship, the Electra, as beautifully fitted up as a nobleman's pleasure-yacht, a graceful steel vessel, reflecting great credit alike upon the skilful designer, Mr. Joseph Birnie, and on the constructors, Messrs. Napier and Sons, of Glasgow. The Electra, commanded by Captain Pattison, recently left the Thames for the Red Sea, to assist in laying a new cable required by the Government in connection with the military operations round Souakim. With what celerity the Eastern Telegraph Company's expert staff transmits messages from Souakim to London may be indicated by two simple facts. This commendable dispatch enabled the Daily Telegraph, the printing of which usually begins at three a.m., to give in its first issue of March 13 a telegram respecting an attack on the British Camp, which its exceptionally smart Special Correspondent, Mr. Phil Robinson, sent from Souakim at 3.20 the same morning. Again, on Thursday, March 19, shortly after three o'clock in the afternoon, the newspaper boys were selling in the streets a third edition of the Daily Telegraph, containing the telegraphic message which the same indefatigable Correspondent dispatched from Souakim at 1.23 p.m., announcing the reconnoissance in force of General Sir Gerald Graham.

The late Bishop of Lincoln was a man of considerable learning and of high intellectual attainments; but he made a great mistake in supposing that because he was a nephew of the poet Wordsworth he was therefore able to write his life. He did not possess the first requisite for such a task—the knowledge and the love of poetry. And not only was he indifferent to poetry generally, but it is stated in Sir Henry Taylor's "Autobiography" that when Dr. Wordsworth accepted the task he knew little either of his uncle or of his works. Diligence and erudition are invaluable qualities. They may produce a good Greek grammar or an exhaustive commentary; but such qualities will no more enable a man to understand a poet like Wordsworth than to command the Channel Fleet. The memoirs were written, for whatever the late Bishop undertook he accomplished; but the two heavy volumes rank with the books we look at but do not read. Truly does Sir Henry Taylor say that "the life is rather buried in the biography than brought to light in it."

Royalty has, of late years, graciously contributed to literature several interesting narratives of personal reminiscences and travel. Following the example set, the Empress Eugénie is about to publish "Some Recollections of My Life." Few women—we cannot call to mind one—have seen such stirring scenes and have been so immediately affected by the crises she has passed through as the sorrowing widow of Napoleon III., the bereaved mother of his unfortunate son. Her work, if it tells a tithe of what she recollects, will be an important addition to modern European history, and will be read with interest and respect by persons of every nationality.

There has been an immense falling off in the number of pictures sent in to the Paris Salon this year as compared with last. Large canvases are the order of the day, and this should be a satisfactory sign to the multitude who love art but cannot afford to possess specimens, for it shows that there is an inclination on the part of museums to buy. The Royal Academy Committee anticipate a decrease in the number of exhibitors of water-colours at Burlington House, but the aspirants for spaces on the walls of the oil-painting galleries are more numerous than ever, the increased number of smaller exhibitions notwithstanding.

Leicester continues to show the most indomitable, if not the most inexplicable, repugnance to vaccination, considering the antidote worse than the bane. It is stated that, without some special Act of Parliament, it will take more than two years to dispose of the cases in which proceedings have already been commenced against persons for refusing to comply with the provisions of the Compulsory Vaccination Act. It is to be feared that the vaccinators have in many instances been to blame: they have been too hasty, perhaps, in vaccinating children who were suffering from some inherited disease or were sickening for something. The children either died or became dreadful objects for life; and, in both cases, the result has been attributed to vaccination, which had nothing whatever to do with it. Many of us must have heard our doctor say:—"It is fortunate that I refused to vaccinate that child which died; the death would, without doubt, have been put down to vaccination."

The Emperor William, like many men of humbler position, feels most at home in old clothes, and uses an old uniform by way of robe de chambre, and slippers which from long use are perfectly easy to his feet. Vast piles of papers encumber the bureau in his private study, for he diligently reads everything before signing it, and frequently makes marginal notes with a square pencil such as is used by carpenters. He always gives the first audience in the morning to the Chief of his War Office, and then sees his other Ministers one by one. All other ordinary receptions are in a room adjoining, which is very plainly furnished, all the chairs, &c., being embroidered by members of the Imperial Family with bluettes, the common corn-flowers of the country, which the Emperor associates with his good mother, Queen Louise.

Apparently some years, perhaps some centuries, will have to elapse yet before the lion begins to lie down with the lamb, save as the cat lies down with the poor mouse between her paws. Wars and rumours of wars, with "additional income-tax" as a consequence, are rather more frequent than less; and, oddly enough, the two most Christian and most civilised countries, England and France (whose King, when she had one, was titularly "Most Christian"), are conspicuous among both the combatants and the combative. Russia, of course, is also Christian of a sort; but the heathen Tartar has always been but the distance of a scratch below the exterior of the Christian Russian.

Vitriol has become in France a recognised weapon of domestic warfare. So terribly frequent have been cases of mutilation with this corrosive, that a clever chemist has deemed it worth his while to invent a pomade which resists the effects of the acid. It is a collodion unguent, with which the face is to be glazed, and on which vitriol is harmless as water. Unfortunately, the viragoes who employ sulphuric acid to avenge their jealousy or to punish gambling husbands are not in the habit of giving their victims notice of their intended onslaughts. Therefore it is somewhat difficult to conceive how the invention is to benefit humanity. Does the enterprising chemist suggest that "no family should be without" the anti-vitriol ointment, and that all Paris should walk about with collodion-glazed faces? Or does he intend that those threatened with the sulphuric attack should ask for a truce until they have time to smear themselves with the protective preparation? It would be curious, though of course impossible, to find how much of the stuff has been sold and how many people it has saved from scars.

Luckily for the lessees of the theatres where comedy and burlesque are performed, the proceedings at the Central Criminal Court are over before those places of entertainment open for the evening; else representations for which money is charged would stand no chance against such exhibitions as are to be witnessed, gratis, when M. Rivière prosecutes Mrs. Weldon for libel, and Mr. Harcourt performs a variety of parts, with plenty of "gag" and vociferous "asides." It is not only "as good as a play," it is a play; but a court of justice is not a playhouse.

If phonetic spelling were adopted, novelists who introduce local dialects would be done for, as readers would never have the patience to grapple with the additional difficulty entailed. Even common Cockney pronunciation is a great trial, when it is represented phonetically. A boy was asked the other day what o'clock it was, and he answered in words which would probably be phonetically rendered by "Ah pah state," meaning "half past eight." Another boy was asked whether he liked toffee, and he answered in a word or words which would probably be rendered phonetically by "or flea," or "or fle," meaning "awfully." Perhaps "aw flea," or "aw fle," would be less unintelligible. What phonetic spelling might come to may be gathered from a report written by a late Inspector of Schools, the Rev. H. Brookfield, about the year 1857. He had requested some boys, who had learned the Lord's Prayer, the Catechism, and so on, from simple dictation and repeated dictation, to write down on a slate what they had so learned, and they wrote down their notions of the sounds they had heard. The result, if it did not smack so dreadfully of profanity, would convulse a canonised saint with laughter.

THE CHURCH.

The Bishop of Oxford held a Confirmation at Eton College last Saturday, the service being attended by a large number of the students and their friends.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint the Bishop of London to be Dean of her Majesty's Chapels Royal. The enthronement of the new Bishop in St. Paul's Cathedral will take place at the afternoon service on April 8 (Wednesday in Easter week). Mrs. Temple, the wife of the Bishop, has been presented with a service of plate and three diamonds stars, subscribed for by "women of Devonshire," as a memento of their good will.

A handsome reredos has been erected in St. George's Church, Campden-hill, as a memorial to the late Lieutenant-Colonel D. W. Lawrell, R.A., by his wife. It rises to a height of about 13 ft., and occupies three sides of the apse, which has been newly decorated. This work is from the studio of Mr. James Forsyth, of Finchley-road.—A fine Munich stained-glass window has been placed in St. Mary's Church, Arbroath, the gift of Mr. and Mrs. Muir, of Abbey Bank. It occupies the west end of the church, and consists of four lights, with elaborate tracery. The leading features of the window are large-sized figures of St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Andrew, and St. John. The artists are Messrs. Mayer and Co.

The inaugural meeting of the Drury-lane Working Girls' House and Day Nursery was held on Monday evening in the new premises of the institution.

A new school, built by the London School Board, was opened on Monday evening in Ruby-street, Old Kent-road. Mr. E. B. Gudgeon, a member of the Works Committee, presided. The Board has secured a fine site for this building (the 310th erected in London), and has been thus enabled to surround it with a capacious playground. It will accommodate 796 children, at a cost of £18 13s. 8d. per head. The site cost £5693, and the building £9179.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

When, to the delight of many a playgoer, Mrs. Keeley and Mrs. Stirling—the Audrey and Celia of Macready's day—appeared together on the stage of the Criterion Theatre the other day to speak a rhymed address in furtherance of the National Aid Society, there was but one opinion concerning the success of the thing purely as an elocutionary feat. The ear so long tortured by modern mouthing and mumbling, the sense so long outraged by so-called actors and actresses who have not the faintest idea how to pronounce the Queen's English, or to point a sentence of dialogue, were at once fascinated by the style and method of these actresses of a past era. It was not so much, after all, that they had to say, but then how admirably they said it! The balance of every line was preserved. The force of every idea was at once sent home to the intelligence of the audience. We all knew how they could act, but what a surprise it was that they knew so well how to speak. No! that is not quite it. Did it not rather occur to us, if this comparatively lost art of elocutionary expression could be revived, how much more might be done for that higher and nobler stage work that is held in such contempt by the Philistine band that has got possession of the stage, and is holding it bravely against all comers? The triumph of Mrs. Keeley and Mrs. Stirling in speaking so well, only succeeded in emphasising the fact that at too many theatres actors and actresses appear who have never been taught how to speak on the stage so as to be understood by their audience. Of what use is the Shakspearean drama, or the poetic drama, or any work of imagination or pathos, when the author's words are, as a rule, rather inaudible or pointless? Who shall say whether the Philistines would have been able to dance over the grave of so much good work, and to chuckle with glee when ambitious work failed, if the artists intrusted with that work had been able to convey its meaning with force and propriety? We cannot make good plays popular without the assistance of such as understand the mere rudiments or alphabet of their art. But it is not alone in the poetic drama that our actors and actresses fail so lamentably. "Adrienne Lecouvreur" is not a poetic play, or a classic, or one that should require any particular training for its proper elaboration. It has been translated from the French by Mr. Herman, and rendered in adequate prose; but how strangely the whole work is misunderstood at the Lyceum! That Madame Modjeska should find some difficulty in pronouncing the English language and in dealing with the inflection of complicated sentences might well have been imagined. It is wonderful that she speaks English as well as she does. But Modjeska's English is infinitely more direct and forcible than that of the majority of the performers, who appear on the stage apparently to show how ineffective they can be. Old Michonnet the Prompter, the fantastical Abbé at the Court of Louis Quinze, the dissolute Prince de Bouillon—these should not be difficult characters to portray by such as have studied the art of acting. They all have leading characteristics. One has pathos, the other frippery, the third an aristocratic demeanour. But on the stage the points of the characters are one and all washed out, vapid, and colourless. That such a performance of "Adrienne Lecouvreur" could ever have been given on the boards of the Lyceum Theatre must surely strike any ordinary foreigner with surprise. It is high time that the truth should be told, and that plays superior to the ordinary run of touch-and-go farces should demand the assistance of such as have higher capabilities for acting than a very laudable ambition. When provincial theatres had stock companies, there was something like a school to learn in and to draw from; but nowadays the paying public has painfully to watch the process of training the young people who adopt the stage as a profession merely because it is a convenient one, and quite outside their individual talent. Lady Monckton has played for a considerable time as an amateur, and has only just joined the professional ranks; but she, at any rate, sets an excellent example to those with whom she was associated. She was called on at the last moment to study and play the Princesse de Bouillon; and had it not been for her, disaster would have followed disaster. In witnessing the Adrienne of Modjeska it is impossible to resist comparison; for Sara Bernhardt's Adrienne—when she cares to play it carefully—is as fine a thing as young playgoers have ever seen. Modjeska underrates the value of several important scenes in the play, and her love is very much in the minor key. Bernhardt made the actress stupified with the first true and honest love of her life. But Modjeska's feeling for her gallant preserver is expressed in various tones of acute depression. Her love is one long wail of despair. She misses the tenderness of the recital of "Les Deux Pigeons." She is too loud and emphatic in the dark scene with her rival, which should be intense, silent, and mysterious. But she awakened her audience to enthusiasm in the recital from Phèdre, where Bernhardt has often failed; and the whole of the death-scene is worthy of the closest critical study. Not so effective as Sara Bernhardt's, perhaps; not so thrilling, but still very beautiful in idea and sentiment. The Adrienne who has not been passionate in her earlier scenes can scarcely be expected to be so when her lover finds her in the throes of death; but for all that, Madame Modjeska's death, as Adrienne, is infinitely superior to anything we get from our leading actresses at this period of the enlightened nineteenth century. Mr. Henry Neville never looked better or more manly than as Maurice De Saxe; but he was not in love. He did not seem to feel the situation. He played it as a dashing cavalier of the Restoration period, not as a soldier who had some sentiment in his composition. He did not lack vigour, but he was occasionally wanting in refinement. Out of the smaller characters, only one, that of a merry, pretty, and fascinating little duchess, stood out, as played by Miss Florence West with very welcome brightness and intelligence. Anything sadder than the stage management of this play has seldom been seen on the boards of a theatre of the first importance. When Michonnet bundled the actors and actresses on to the stage from the decorous green-room of the Comédie Française, the play at once lapsed into the broadest farce, and utterly destroyed the illusion. But after all, it will be urged, the people had only come to see Modjeska, and not to trouble their heads about "Adrienne Lecouvreur." If so, they saw her, and were delighted at her performance; greeting her with cheers and pelting her with flowers and bouquets. C. S.

The initial meeting of the Institution of Naval Architects was held on Wednesday week in the hall of the Society of Arts, under the presidency of the Earl of Ravensworth, who, having given his annual address, called upon Captain G. H. Noel and Mr. P. Watts to read papers, respectively, upon the subjects of the Comparative Fighting Efficiency of Ships of War, and the Use of Water-Chambers for Reducing the Rolling of Ships.—The Earl of Ravensworth presided on Thursday afternoon and evening over meetings of the Institution held in the hall of the Society of Arts, when papers were submitted by Mr. J. H. Heck, Mr. F. P. Purvis, Mr. John Nicholson, Captain J. C. Tuxen, Mr. J. I. Thornycroft, Mr. E. A. Seaton, Mr. J. McFarlane Gray, and Mr. M. H. Robinson.

MUSIC.

THE LONDON MUSICAL SOCIETY.

The concert of last week—the first of a new series—brought forward some works for the first time in England. Three movements from a series of ten orchestral pieces composed by Herr Anton Dvorák opened the programme. The whole are entitled "Legenden"; and the extracts give an impression of wild romanticism, in accordance with the general title. Another novelty here was Schumann's ballade, "The Minstrel's Curse," the text adapted by Miss G. E. Troutbeck from Uhland's poem, "Des Sangers Fluch." The music belongs to a comparatively late period of the composer's career, and is characterised by a dreary monotony that hinders any wish for a re-hearing. It is scored for five solo voices, chorus, and orchestra; the soloists in last week's performance having been Misses C. Elliot and L. Little, and Messrs. H. Thorndike, H. Piercy, and W. Forington. Another, and the concluding, novelty of the programme was Herr Rheinberger's setting of F. Von Hoffmaass's version of the well-known legend "Christoforus," given to the English adaptation by the Earl of Wilton. Like Schumann's work, this is also for five solo voices, chorus, and orchestra. This recent work of the composer contains some highly effective writing, particularly in the choral and orchestral details. A special effect was created by the highly dramatic chorus illustrative of Satanic revelry, which was greatly applauded, and had to be repeated. The soloists in this work were Misses Elliot, Little, and A. Fripp, and Messrs. Piercy and Thorndike. The chorus singing during the evening was more generally satisfactory than the orchestral performance. Mr. Barnby conducted.

The third concert of the Philharmonic Society's present season took place last week, too late for comment until now. The programme included a new orchestral "Serenade," composed expressly for the society by Mr. T. Wingham, several of whose overtures and symphonies we have had previous occasion to commend. The work now referred to consists of three movements—an "Andante Espressivo," a "Scherzino," and a final Rondo. Each division contains some pleasing writing, the orchestral colouring being skilfully varied. It was finely played, and it and the composer, who conducted its performance, were enthusiastically received. Herr Joachim gave an excellent rendering of Brahms' violin concerto, and Signor Bottesini displayed his extraordinary powers on the contra-basso in pieces of his own composition.

The Sacred Harmonic Society's season is over, so far as its concerts are concerned. That of yesterday (Friday) week was appropriated to a performance of "Elijah." The principal solo vocalists were Miss A. Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Charles Hallé conducted. The supplemental conversazione will take place at Prince's Hall on May 8.

The Crystal Palace Concert of Saturday afternoon (the last but three of the present season) included a selection from the works of Beethoven, closing with the grandest possible climax, the choral symphony; the solo vocalists in which were Misses Marriott and McKenzie, Mr. B. McGuckin, and Mr. F. King. The concert was in remembrance of Beethoven's death, which took place on March 26, 1827.

The Popular Concerts closed their twenty-seventh season with the afternoon performance of last Saturday and the evening concert of the following Monday. On each occasion, Herr Joachim, Herr Straus, Mdlle. Kleeberg, Miss Zimmermann, Signor Piatti, and Signor Bottesini contributed to a varied instrumental programme. The Misses Nunn were the vocalists on Saturday, and Mr. Santley sang, with special effect, on Monday. The Popular Concerts will be resumed early in November.

The musical announcements for Good Friday promised a grand performance of "The Messiah" at the Royal Albert Hall. Easter Monday will offer a special attraction at the Albert Hall, where Mr. Austin will give his National Holiday Festival Concert, with a powerful programme.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.

Mr. Carl Rosa will enter on a new London season at Drury Lane Theatre next Monday evening, this being the third series of performances given by Mr. Rosa at that establishment. The forthcoming season will be of longer duration than that of last year, extending, on this occasion, to eight weeks. Much interest will attach to the production of the new opera composed expressly for Mr. Rosa by Mr. A. Goring Thomas, whose "Esmeralda," also commissioned by Mr. Rosa, was brought out with such success in 1883, and repeated with the same result abroad. The new work is entitled "Nadeshda" and is founded on a Russian subject, the text being by Mr. Julian Sturgis. Another interesting feature will be the first performance in London of the English version of M. Massenet's "Manon," produced by Mr. Rosa, with great success, at the Royal Court Theatre, Liverpool, last January. With the excellent company, including Madame Marie Roze and other eminent artists, associated under Mr. Rosa's management, and with the extensive and varied répertoire at the establishment, there is every prospect of special success. The comparatively early hours and the non-restriction as to evening dress are welcome features in the arrangements.

Mr. Edward Clarke, M.P., presided last Saturday evening over the annual dinner of the Press Club, at which Mr. W. H. Smith, M.P., Sir R. Cross, M.P., and Mr. Charles Russell, M.P., were also included in the list of speakers.

The fortieth annual banquet of the Royal General Theatrical Fund, which will be given at the Freemasons' Tavern next July, will be made the occasion of a farewell to Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft on their retirement from theatrical management. Mr. S. B. Bancroft will himself preside.

The Committee of Management of the Royal Fund for the Relief of the Orphans of Sea Fishermen have granted relief to fifteen sons and twenty daughters of the men who have lately lost their lives in the lamentable fishing disaster in the neighbourhood of Stornoway. The committee have also granted relief to the orphans of three Stonehaven fishermen.

At the meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works yesterday week, the solicitor to the Board reported that they had no power to lend £20,259 to the School Board for industrial schools, as they could only lend for industrial schools such sums as had been sanctioned by the Home Secretary. The subject was referred back to the Finance Committee. A motion to apply to Parliament for power to levy a rate of 1d. in the pound for Fire Brigade purposes was lost.

The two prisoners Cunningham and Burton, who are charged in connection with the dynamite outrages in London, were again brought up at Bow-street Police Court yesterday week, when the case on the part of the Crown was concluded, and both prisoners were committed for trial under the Treason-Felony Act 11 and 12 Vic., c. 12, sec. 3. Among the witnesses examined was Sergeant Cole, who removed the dynamite from the crypt in Westminster Hall to the top of the stairs. The remainder of the evidence was chiefly scientific.

THE LATE LIEUTENANT E. M. B. NEWMAN, R.E., KILLED IN THE SOUDAN.

THE LATE CAPT. DUDLEY DIGGES DALISON, SCOTS GUARDS, KILLED IN THE SOUDAN.

THE LATE LIEUTENANT MONTAGU SEYMOUR, R.N., KILLED IN THE SOUDAN.

OFFICERS KILLED IN THE SOUDAN.

Captain Maximilian Dudley Digges Dalison, of the Scots Guards, killed on March 20 at the battle of Hasheen, was the eldest son of Mr. Dalison, of Hamptons, in Kent, and Gratwell, Lincolnshire, by Matilda, daughter of the late Rev. Robert Alexander, Prebendary of Derry Cathedral. Captain Dalison was born in February, 1852. He came of an ancient stock of cavaliers and loyal gentlemen; his ancestor, Sir Thomas Dalison, Bart., fell under the Royal banner at Naseby, in 1645, when the title became extinct in the confusion of the time. He was closely connected with the families of Hammond, of St. Albans Court, Shaw, and Mouson. Captain Dalison was well known for his devotion to his profession. He acted on the Staff at Hythe for five years as Lieutenant Instructor of Musketry. He was a soldier of high courage and splendid physique, whose stately bearing and grand countenance told of chivalrous honour and tender purity. He will be long missed and mourned, not only by his own family but by the service of which he was an ornament and the comrades to whom he was dear. He married, October, 1875, Grace, daughter of the late Mr. Henry Beresford Pierce, of Bedale, grand-daughter of Admiral Sir John Poore Beresford, Bart.

Lieutenant-Colonel Alexander Mitchell Taylor, 19th Hussars, was born Sept. 9, 1849. He entered the service Dec. 30, 1871, and obtained the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel Sept. 10, 1884. He served with his regiment in Egypt, and was present at the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. He was mentioned in despatches, and obtained the brevet rank of Lieutenant-Colonel, receiving the medal, with clasps, the fourth class of the Osmanieh, and the Khedive's Star. He remained in charge of the Egyptian cavalry, and only resigned that appointment in September, 1884, on receiving further promotion. He served in the Soudan War of last year as Brigade-Major of the Cavalry Brigade, and was present at the engagements of El Teb and Tamai, upon which occasion he was mentioned in the despatches, and received two clasps. In the present expedition he had gone, with his regiment, as far as Wady Halfa, where he was laid down with typhoid fever, to which he succumbed, on Feb. 6, at Cairo, after a painful illness of three months.

The five officers killed on Sunday week in the attack of Osman Digna's followers on the zereba camp near Souakim were Lieutenant Swinton, of the Berkshire Regiment; Lieutenant Seymour, of the Naval Brigade; Captain Romilly and Lieutenant Newman, of the Royal Engineers; and Captain Van Beverhoudt, of the 17th Bengal Native Infantry. Surgeon-Major Lane, attached to the Scots Guards, was wounded in the action on the Friday before, where Captain Dalison was killed, and died next day on board the Ganges hospital-ship. Quartermaster Charles Eastmead, R.E., was killed on the Monday by the attack on a convoy going to the zereba.

Lieutenant Montagu H. M. Seymour, R.N., was First Lieutenant of the Dolphin, and saw seventeen years' sea service. Before his appointment in May last to the Dolphin, he was successively Midshipman of the Triumph, Channel Squadron; Sub-Lieutenant of the Antelope, in the Mediterranean; and Senior Lieutenant of the Dwarf. He was gazetted Lieutenant in August, 1878. He changed his name from Gruggen to Seymour some years ago.

Lieutenant Edwin Montague Browne Newman was the eldest son of Lieutenant-Colonel Newman, R.A., and was born at Corfu, April 23, 1862. He was educated at Wellington College, where he gained Lord Derby's French Prize twice, also the German Prize, and that for "Chemistry and Physics," and the Modern Exhibition. He passed fourth into the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, where he won the French, German, and Chemistry prizes; and thence passed fifth into the Royal Engineers on July 26, 1881. He served in India, in the Punjaub, at Peshawur, Chirat, and Bangalore, and in 1881 passed the higher standard in Hindostani. He left Bangalore, recently, with the Madras "Queen's Own" Sappers and Miners, to join the forces at Souakim, and was there killed, while superintending the construction of the zereba, on Sunday week, in the twenty-third year of his age.

The Mercers' Company have given twenty-five guineas to the East London Union for Advanced Education (evening classes) Stepney Centre.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

A few additional Sketches of the late campaign in the interior of the Soudan, some by our Special Artist, Mr. Melton Prior, and some contributed by a private of the 1st Life Guards, W. S. Perry, who was in the "Heavy" Camel Corps with the forces commanded by the late General Sir Herbert Stewart on Jan. 17 and Jan. 19, in the advance to Metammeh, will be found in this Number of our Journal. The gallant Life Guardsman happened to stand beside one of the gentlemen who are in correspondence with us in the fighting "square" at the battle of Abou Klea, and to meet him again before Metammeh; he is a man of some education, and has fair skill with the pencil, which he was encouraged to use in sketching these characteristic incidents of a soldier's experience in those stirring days of action. One of his Sketches represents the late Colonel Burnaby, to whom the Guardsmen were greatly attached for his personal qualities and kindness to all of them, as he appeared when riding a camel. Another is that of two soldiers of the outposts on picket duty, challenging a man who is approaching them in the darkness of night, and doubtful whether he is to be fired at, as one of the enemy's scouts, or whether he may not be one of their own comrades returning to the picket. In the third of these Sketches, an English officer and soldiers, on their way from Gakdul Wells to the camp with a convoy, on Jan. 30, thirteen days after the battle of Abou Klea, are passing near the battle-field, and find some wounded Arabs, strange to relate, still alive, but in a very shocking condition; they are shown in the act of tending these miserable fellow-creatures, but we do not know whether the poor Soudanese warriors died after all; it is wonderful that they could have lived so long. Our Special Artist's subjects include one of the "Dangers of the Road," messengers with despatches attacked by some Arabs, who are trying to cut them off; the arrival of the first batch of wounded at Korti; and the Soudanese of General Gordon's force, who came down in the steamers from Khartoum to the British camp, entertaining themselves at Korti with a rude musical performance on the "tom-toms." Mr. Melton Prior has also sketched the portraits of three of Gordon's native officers, a General, a Colonel, and a Major, who were in military command of the steamers that Gordon sent down from Khartoum, and who afterwards came to Lord Wolseley's head-quarters with the returning British force, under Sir Redvers Buller. The other Soudan War Illustrations presented this week refer to the military operations around Soukim. One of the frequently repeated night attacks on the camp adjacent to that town, just before the assembling of Sir Gerald Graham's army there, but which were invariably repulsed by the garrison, though upon more than one occasion the enemy did some damage to the sand-bag ramparts, is the subject of a large Engraving in our Extra Supplement. The forces now collected, however, are more than sufficient to prevent the enemy approaching within a distance of several miles; and the ground about the town and forts is also commanded by the fire of British gun-boats in the harbour. We have to thank an officer of the Royal Marines, Lieutenant J. L. R. Maclurcan, for a Sketch of the scene at the landing of the 15th Sikhs from India. The appearance of those fine specimens of the fighting force of our Indian Empire, whose valour and loyalty have been proverbial since the Mutiny war of 1857, excited much attention at Soukim, both among the Europeans and the native population. One article of their attire is very peculiar, a circular piece of steel, a quoit with a sharp edge, which is worn on the head over the turban, and which they were able, when fighting in the manner of their nation, to take off and throw as a missile weapon, striking an enemy within a moderate distance, and doing this with formidable effect. The Sikhs will on no account give up wearing this ancient implement of their warfare, and they are equally attached to the national costume, the tight-fitting trousers unlike the apparel of most other Asiatic people, and the rule of never cutting their hair or beards. They are a singular race, differing in religion, manners, and institutions, as well from the Mohammedans as from the Hindoos, and possessing a distinct creed and code of laws; they were formerly the rulers of the Punjaub, until its conquest, in 1848, by the British Government of India, to which the Sikhs have since rendered valiant and faithful service.

It was expected this week at Soukim that Sir Gerald Graham's force would advance on Wednesday to attack Osman Digna's main position at Tamanieb; but on Monday there were reports from the spies that nearly all the Arabs, reckoned at seven thousand, who composed Osman Digna's force have deserted him, and now think he is likely to sue for peace. The arrival of the New South Wales Contingent, by the steam-ship Iberia, from Sydney, caused great joy in the British camp on Sunday last. The Australian battalion of six hundred volunteer infantry, wearing a scarlet uniform, had a fine appearance, and was inspected and praised by General Graham. It has been attached to the Brigade of Guards. Another portion of this colonial force with artillery came next day by the steam-ship Australasia, and was received with equal acclamation.

The British army on the Nile, above Dongola, is now perfectly quiescent, and has withdrawn from its former head-quarters at Korti. Lord Wolseley, on Monday last, set forth with several officers of his Staff, from Dongola and the Upper Nile, on his return to Egypt. He is to meet Prince Hassan, the Khedive's brother, at Wady Halfa, and is expected at Cairo on April 13, after which he may either go to Soukim, or may possibly come home to resume the duties of his office as Adjutant-General of her Majesty's Forces. No fear of an advance of the Mahdi is now entertained between Merawi and Dongola; the war in those parts is over.

Mr. Charles Edward Malden, of the South-Eastern Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Thetford, in succession to Mr. Carlos Cooper, who (as stated in our Supplement) has recently been transferred to the Recordership of King's Lynn.

The Goldsmiths' scholarships offered in connexion with the March entrance examination to Girton College, Cambridge, have been awarded to Miss Christina Barnard, of the Highbury High School, and to Miss Caroline Bisset Best, of the North London Collegiate School for Girls. The Classical Foundation Scholarship has been awarded to Miss Adela Marion Kensington, of Bedford College, London.

Mr. Mundella, M.P., presided last Saturday at a conference, held at the rooms of the Society of Arts, with reference to penny dinners. He said that the inspectors had been almost surprised at the beneficial effect these dinners had on the vigour and the mental activity of the children. The Birmingham Committee had reduced the price of the dinners to one halfpenny, and this covered the cost of the food.

Mrs. Weldon was on Monday found guilty, in the Central Criminal Court, of having failed to justify her libellous statements concerning M. Rivière, the jury strongly recommending her to mercy. The Common Serjeant sentenced her to six months' imprisonment, without hard labour, and ordered her to enter into her own recognisance in £50, and find two sureties in £25 each, to keep the peace for two years.

THE COURT.

The Queen held a Council at Windsor on Thursday week, at which Sir Edward Malet, British Ambassador at Berlin, was introduced and sworn as a member of the Privy Council. Lady Ermyntrude Malet was presented to her Majesty on her marriage by the Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe. Lady Wolseley, wife of General Lord Wolseley, arrived at Windsor in the evening on a visit to the Queen. On Saturday last the Prince and Princess of Wales, with Prince Albert Victor of Wales, visited her Majesty. This being the first anniversary of the loss of the Queen's beloved son Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, her Majesty and the Royal family visited the Royal vault in St. George's in the morning, and in the afternoon the Queen, with Princess Beatrice and the Duchess of Albany, attended the evening service in St. George's Chapel. The anthem "Blessed are the departed," by Spohr, and Chopin's "Funeral March" were performed. Prince and Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein dined with the Queen and Royal family. The Marquis of Lorne, K.T., arrived at the castle. On Sunday morning the Queen and Royal family, and the members of her Majesty's household, attended Divine service in the private chapel. The Very Rev. R. Davidson, Dean of Windsor, assisted by the Rev. Canon E. Capel Cure, M.A., Rector of St. George's, Hanover-square, officiated, and the Rev. Canon Cure preached the sermon. Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), attended by Lady Sophia Macnamara, and the Marquis of Lorne, left the castle at two o'clock for London. Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein visited her Majesty and remained to luncheon. The Duchess of Albany, who had been on a visit to the Queen, left Windsor Castle in the afternoon. The Duke of Edinburgh visited her Majesty. The Queen will contribute £50 to the guarantee fund in connection with the approaching visit of the British Association to Aberdeen; and her Majesty has sent £50 to Lady Rosebery, the treasurer of the Princess of Wales's branch of the National Aid Society; likewise a case of tobacco for the use of the soldiers and sailors in Egypt and the Soudan. Sir Henry Ponsonby has written to Lord Aberdare that the Queen will be happy to patronise the Welsh Eisteddfod which is to be held at Aberdare in August.

On Monday afternoon the Queen and Princess Beatrice left Windsor, and travelled by railway to Portsmouth, where they proceeded on board the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, and spent the night in the Harbour. Next morning her Majesty crossed the Channel to Cherbourg on her way to Savoy.

The Prince of Wales, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor, arrived at Marlborough House yesterday week from Germany. Their Royal Highnesses dined in the evening with the Earl of Rosebery at Lansdowne House. The Empress Eugénie visited the Princess of Wales. The Prince and Princess, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor, left Marlborough House last Saturday morning on a visit to the Queen at Windsor Castle. This being the anniversary of the Duke of Albany's death, their Royal Highnesses visited the Royal vault, at St. George's Chapel, and afterwards returned to London. On Sunday the Prince and Princess, Prince Albert Victor, and Prince George, and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud were present at Divine service. Accompanied by Prince Albert Victor and Prince George, the Prince visited the Duke of Genoa at the Alexandra Hotel in the afternoon. His Royal Highness dined with the Prince and Princess in the evening. On Monday morning the Prince presided at a meeting at Marlborough House of the Royal Commission of the Colonial and Indian Exhibition (London, 1886). The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh visited the Prince and Princess, and remained to luncheon.

Her Royal and Imperial Highness the Duchess of Edinburgh, her Royal Highness the Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), and the Marquis of Lorne were present at the conversazione of the Royal Water-Colour Society Art Club on Thursday week evening.

A marriage has been arranged, and will shortly take place, between the Earl De Grey and Gladys, Countess of Lonsdale.

"THE MIKADO."

The new comic opera of "The Mikado" at the Savoy Theatre may rank with the successes of Sir Arthur Sullivan and Mr. W. S. Gilbert. So quaint are the characters and so picturesque the handsome Japanese costumes, that this diverting musical piece offers especial opportunities for the Artist, as may be judged from the Sketches given this week of the principal dramatic personages in this delightfully melodious and humorous opera. Prime favourites as they are, the "three little maids fresh from school" richly merit the place of honour. To the manner born seem Misses Sibyl Grey, Leonora Braham, and Jessie Bond, as they demurely creep forward, and, impersonating respectively Peep-Bo, Yum-Yum, and Pitti-Sing, render a trio with an ingenuous freshness that commands an instant encore. The due amount of "local colour" is added by the accomplished scenic artist, and by the rest of the cast delineated—the archly funny Mikado himself (Mr. R. Temple); the similarly droll Minister of many offices, Pooh-Bah (Mr. Rutland Barrington); the drily comical high executioner, Ko-Ko (Mr. George Grossmith); the amusing Pish-Tush (Mr. F. Bovill); and the tragically affectionate Katisha (Miss Brandram), to avoid the amorous pursuit of which ancient but ardent dame the tenor hero, Nanki-Poo (Mr. Durward Lely) flies from home, and falls in love with the fascinating Yum-Yum (Miss Leonora Braham). Such are the personages in "The Mikado; or, the Town of Titipu," represented with fidelity by our Artist.

At a conference held last Saturday, under the presidency of the Marquis of Lorne, it was resolved to form a permanent council to extend the operations of the National Society for the Protection of Young Girls (the Princess Louise Home).

Our Portrait of the late Sir T. Bazley is from a photograph by J. and C. Watkins, Parliament-street; that of the late Captain Dalison, by Lambert Weston and Son, Dover; that of Lieut.-Colonel Taylor, by Robinson, Grafton-street, Dublin; that of Lieutenant Seymour, R.N., by W. N. Malby, of Chichester; and that of Lieutenant Newman, R.E., by Elliott and Fry, Baker-street.

The past week's arrivals of live stock and fresh meat at Liverpool from American and Canadian ports were, of live stock a decrease on the preceding week's imports, and of fresh meat an increase—the total arrivals being 1324 cattle, 11,070 quarters of beef, and 1855 carcases of mutton, against the preceding week's imports of 2378 cattle, 211 sheep, 8507 quarters of beef, and 1105 carcases of mutton.

The Secretary for War has approved of the attendance of 43,000 Volunteers in the Northern District in camps of exercise in the ensuing season, at an estimated expense to the State of nearly £24,000. In the other military districts of Great Britain sanction has also been given for the formation of camps on a larger scale than has ever previously been known, the total number of men who it is estimated will go under canvas during the season amounting to no less than 100,000.

FINE ARTS.

MR. WALLIS'S EXHIBITION.

Although Mr. Wallis, at the French Gallery (120, Pall-mall), is for the most part faithful to foreigners like Professor Müller, Karl Heffner, Seiler, Chevillard, and others whom he has made known in this country, and who, in return, have made his exhibitions attractive, yet he is always ready to admit the claims of new and rising artists. In the present exhibition, the first place among the recruits—if such a term may be applied to a painter whose work is eagerly sought for among Continental collectors—is Mr. Aug. Holmberg. His really remarkable picture, "Far from the World, its Toils and its Cares" (58), represents the interior of a stately apartment, painted with exquisite care and delicate colouring. There are only three occupants—two elderly ecclesiastics at table, and a younger one, dressed in scarlet, who, in the deep recess, is thoughtfully contemplating his companions' eager gestures, regardless of the peaceful landscape seen through the window. Amongst the accessories of the room—which is probably in some Cardinal's palace among the Alban hills—is a fine landscape-subject picture, occupying nearly one side of the wall, and in this way forming a clever background to the scene. The "Song of Scanderberg" (52), by I. Joanowitz, is painted with considerable force. A ragged old man is seated on the floor, and to the twang of a rude instrument is singing to a group of Servians those lays of old which at length stirred them to be "serfs no more." The mixture of listlessness and energy in the figure of the man in red, seated on the settle, is especially clever; whilst the group of attentive men and women, who have gathered round the minstrel, is full of reality. Herr Joanowitz is a Slav, probably, of some particular nationality, although his art is essentially German and marked by the influence of Professor Müller; but Herr Imré Révèsz, we presume, is of Magyar race, and he also gives us an insight into the influence of song upon his fellow-countrymen. He has chosen an episode in the romantic life of Sandor Petöfi, the Burns of Hungary, by turns student, stroller, soldier, and journalist. The poet is represented seated at a table, in a wayside inn or peasant's house, reciting to the astonished hearers "his rustic song, sweeter than the nightingale's," as Heine said of his poetry. A third work by an equally little-known, but equally deserving artist, is, "He Won't Hurt You," by Géza Peske (92)—two sisters in a barn or store-room, whither two geese have followed them to be fed with maize, of which the husks and pods are scattered about the floor. The hesitation of the little child, who is half disposed to resent the advances of the old goose, is full of simple grace and truthfulness; but this is only one point in a work which by its management of light and excellent drawing promises future successes for the artist.

Of the better known supporters of Mr. Wallis's Gallery, Professor Müller sends a number of Cairene scenes and studies, painted with his usual fidelity, and with ever increasing delicacy. "Bazaar-street" (15), is a scene of sedate business, most suggestive of the mixture of Oriental self-possession and keenness for gain; the most effective figure being that of a girl carefully carrying away a green bowl. His study of a negro woman, "Toujours Gaie" (43), is full of life and movement, and most successful as a bit of colour. But in colour, even Professor Müller must give place to Gérôme, whose figure of "Botzaris" (33) is one of the most finished works of the great French artist, who can rise far above mere archæological studies, and, in spite of his knowledge, throw life and feeling into his figures. Botzaris is represented seated in a sort of alcove lined with blue and white Persian tiles. He is dressed in a superb red velvet robe covered with embroidery: he looks at once a born leader of men, and one who was not free from human vanities and weaknesses. Karl Heffner is represented by a number of Italian scenes of various sizes, the most important being a "Moonlight View of Tivoli" (21), in which he has attempted a somewhat fresh line, and the "Bay of Baia" (11a), where his special talents show to greater advantage in the dreary, dreamy expanse of sky and water. Some of his smaller sketches, like "The Boboli Gardens" (38), "Fiesole" (40), "Storm and Sunshine" (66), and "The Dunes near Calais" (75) are, especially charming, and should not on account of their size be overlooked. Amongst the other artists whose works deserve attention are M. Laugée, whose "Pauvre Aveugle" (107) is full of feeling; M. D. Skutezki's "Mia Figlia, Signor" (37), a wily old man introducing his new model to the artist; C. Mayr-Graz's "Dolly's Bath" (27); E. De Blaas' "In His Element" (89), a boy busy with an orange; Chevillard's "Le Curé Dort" (120); and the "Rival Claimants" (121), by C. Seiler, which will bear comparison with Meissonier's "Stirrup Cup" (10), painted in 1865, which one is glad to welcome back.

MR. McLEAN'S GALLERY.

At Mr. J. McLean's Gallery (7, Haymarket) the centre of attraction must be Mr. Millais' "Perfect Bliss" (43), which, if we mistake not, will take rank among his most successful and popular works. Mr. Millais has, on this occasion, got away from silks and satins and over-dressed children, as he has managed to keep clear of the conventional outcast. The little child with wide-open eyes seated beside the strawberry bed, is full of reality, although the picture itself is one of almost ideal poetry. The little damsel is simply dressed in a yellowish frock with a blue sash and a hat to match. She has evidently been given permission to plunder the strawberry plants, and her little hands have been well engaged. Suddenly, her attention has been attracted by the coquettings of two yellow butterflies, who are pursuing one another. The eagerness of her little face, with its large eyes, its soft baby-mouth, and pink transparent flesh, must appeal to every one; whilst the care bestowed upon the garden and the foliage encourages us to hope that Mr. Millais now recognises where his real strength lies, and that he will make himself as truly the exponent of childhood in the nineteenth century as Reynolds was of that of the eighteenth. It is impossible to look at such a picture as "Perfect Bliss," or to its companion picture, "The Orphans," of which we shall have occasion to speak when it is publicly exhibited, without admitting that Mr. Millais occupies a pedestal in the school of painting which has been vacant for nearly a century. Of the other works in Mr. McLean's Gallery, Mr. Vicat Cole's "Backwater near Medmenham" (25) is as fine a bit of English river scenery as we have seen for a long time—full of air and sunshine; and it contrasts favourably with Mr. Leader's "Evening Hour" (62), of which the effect seems strained. In landscapes, however, we note with pleasure a new name—that of Mr. E. H. Holder, whose two bits of "Welsh Scenery" (63, 64) are very far above the average. Mr. Albert Moore sends two heads, "Portia" (9) and "The Blonde" (2), painted with far greater strength and decision than he has accustomed us to look for in his work. Mr. G. Laugée is seen here even to greater advantage than at Mr. Wallis's Gallery, with his two scenes of outdoor peasant life, "Dinner in the Field" (22) and "Resting" (50), in both of which the influence of François Millet as of Bastien Lepage may be traced. Signor Milesi's "Tasting the New Vintage" (53) is a capital specimen of modern Italian painting, of which there are numerous other exponents in this exhibition. Mention should also be made of Mr. Peter Graham's "Rock-Bound Shore" (6), F. Roybet's "Amateur" (26), Julien Dupré's "German Milkmaid" (80), and J. Israels' "Consolation" (60).

We very much doubt whether Hans Makart's picture of "Summer," now on view at Herr W. Dierken's Gallery (157, New Bond-street), will add much to the artist's fame in this country. As a splendid piece of colouring, in which the effort to combine Titian and Veronese is scarcely disguised, this last great work of a genius prematurely cut off, will always have an interest. But there is something so forced and unnatural in the subject and its treatment that we can scarcely fancy the work is likely to become popular. A group of ladies have been bathing in a retired spot, and are reclining about in various attitudes, and with scant clothing. One group is—similarly attired—absorbed in a game of chess. Another lady is just preparing to enter the bath; whilst the principal figure is that of one who is reclining on a couch in a decidedly graceful attitude. There is no question as to the beauty of much of the drawing and the richness of the colouring; but, beyond these Academic qualities, it is difficult to find anything in the picture to arouse interest. It is neither mythical, allegorical, nor realistic; and it leaves one in amazement that so much undoubted talent should have been bestowed upon a work which can commend itself to so very limited a public.

Among the works exhibited in the adjoining galleries are those of many foreign artists, chiefly of the Düsseldorf school, whose names even are but little, if at all, known in this country. M. G. Nicolet is one who exhibits great versatility and no small promise, as displayed in such works as "La Prière" (73), a Dutch nun; "Tired Out" (49), a boy asleep on the sandy dunes; and "Haidée" (53), a study.

In a recent notice of the Hanover Gallery, we alluded to the doubts which so frequently arose with reference to French works exhibited in this country. Nothing was further from our intention than to suggest that Messrs. Hollender and Cremetti, who, although newcomers to London, have held a hundred exhibitions in the provinces, would offer to the public works which they did not believe to be genuine. Our remark was in truth suggested by a statement recently made by M. Ch. Pillet, the well-known commissaire-priseur of the Hôtel Drouot, who publicly commented on the surprising fecundity of certain French artists after their death. The testimony—to be taken for what it was worth—which we bore to the works brought together by Messrs. Hollender and Cremetti would, we hoped, be regarded as evidence of our belief that they had skilfully avoided the perils to which even the most careful experts are at times exposed. In any case, we can only express our regret if our remarks should have given annoyance where none was intended.

Messrs. Christie, Manson, and Woods concluded the sale of the works of art from the Bohn collection last Saturday. The amount obtained for the nine days' sale was £19,220. On Monday and Tuesday Messrs. Christie disposed of the Library, containing works of reference and of art.

Last Saturday, at St. Jude's Schools, Commercial-street, Mr. North Buxton, the chairman of the London School Board, opened a Fine-Art Exhibition, in the presence of a large number of ladies and gentlemen. The exhibition is the fifth of a series that have been promoted by the Rev. Mr. Barnett, and contains about 250 pictures, which have been kindly lent by the owners. The admission to the exhibition is free.

THE EASTER MANŒUVRES OF VOLUNTEERS.

The advance upon Brighton by nine marching columns, amounting in the aggregate to nearly 6000 men, and covering a frontage of upwards of twelve miles, taken in conjunction with the field-day of Monday, in which 20,000 men will take part, is expected to be the most important and interesting series of operations yet attempted. The general idea on which the operations of Good Friday and Saturday are based is that an invading force is reported to be endeavouring to effect a landing in the neighbourhood of Newhaven, and that the marching columns constitute the advanced guard of an army corps dispatched to oppose it. This advanced guard, under Colonel H. F. Davies, Grenadier Guards, leaves London on Good Friday morning: the 1st Brigade, under Colonel G. Moncrieff, Scots Guards, detraining at West Hoathly and Forest Row, and the 2nd Brigade, under Lieutenant-Colonel Helsham Jones, at Crawley, Three Bridges, Rowfant, and Grange-road. After a short halt the entire force will advance shortly after ten o'clock by parallel routes in a southerly direction, and with all the precautions observed on a march through country occupied by a hostile force. Saturday's advance will be of an extremely interesting character, and will assume, as far as possible, the aspect of a march effected in actual warfare from the circumstance that it will be opposed by a force estimated at about 4000 men. This force will advance from Brighton in the morning, but the probable spot at which they will come in contact with it will only be disclosed to the commanders of the military columns by sealed orders, not to be opened till their men are in readiness to start. The most likely scene of the main engagement will be somewhat to the north-east of Stanmer, on the down land, at about five miles or so from Brighton. On Monday morning the men already at Brighton will rendezvous at the points usually selected for this purpose, and, being joined by the detachments arriving by train from London, will move off the parade-ground by about half-past nine o'clock. At the sham-fight the attacking force, commanded by Major-General R. White, C.B., will number about 12,000, with fourteen guns, furnished by the Hon. Artillery Company and the 1st Sussex Artillery Volunteers. The defending force, under Major-General the Hon. R. Monck, will number some 6300, with sixteen guns of the 2nd and 3rd Middlesex Artillery Volunteers. The Middlesex Yeomanry and the Light Cavalry of the Hon. Artillery Company will also take part in the day's proceedings.

The marching column to Dover will consist of the 3rd City of London Rifle Volunteers, under Colonel Laurie, together with a strong detachment of the 1st Volunteer Brigade South Staffordshire Regiment. The column will proceed from London by rail on Good Friday morning to Faversham, and will thence advance to Canterbury, picking up several local contingents by the way, and being exercised en route in scouting and similar duties. After passing the night in barracks at Canterbury, they will make their way to Dover on the following day, and take part in the field-day arranged for Easter Monday. The major portion of the Volunteer corps engaged will be supplied by the metropolis. Of these, one brigade of artillery and three battalions of infantry will leave London on Thursday for the forts at Dover and the camp at Shorncliffe for garrison duty. The number of Volunteers engaged will be about 7000.

At Portsmouth a brigade of artillery from Lancashire and a battalion of infantry, 500 strong, supplied by the 2nd London Rifle Volunteers, will be engaged in the performance of garrison duty; and at Aldershott two metropolitan battalions will take part in the manœuvres to be effected by the regular troops.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Monday, March 30.

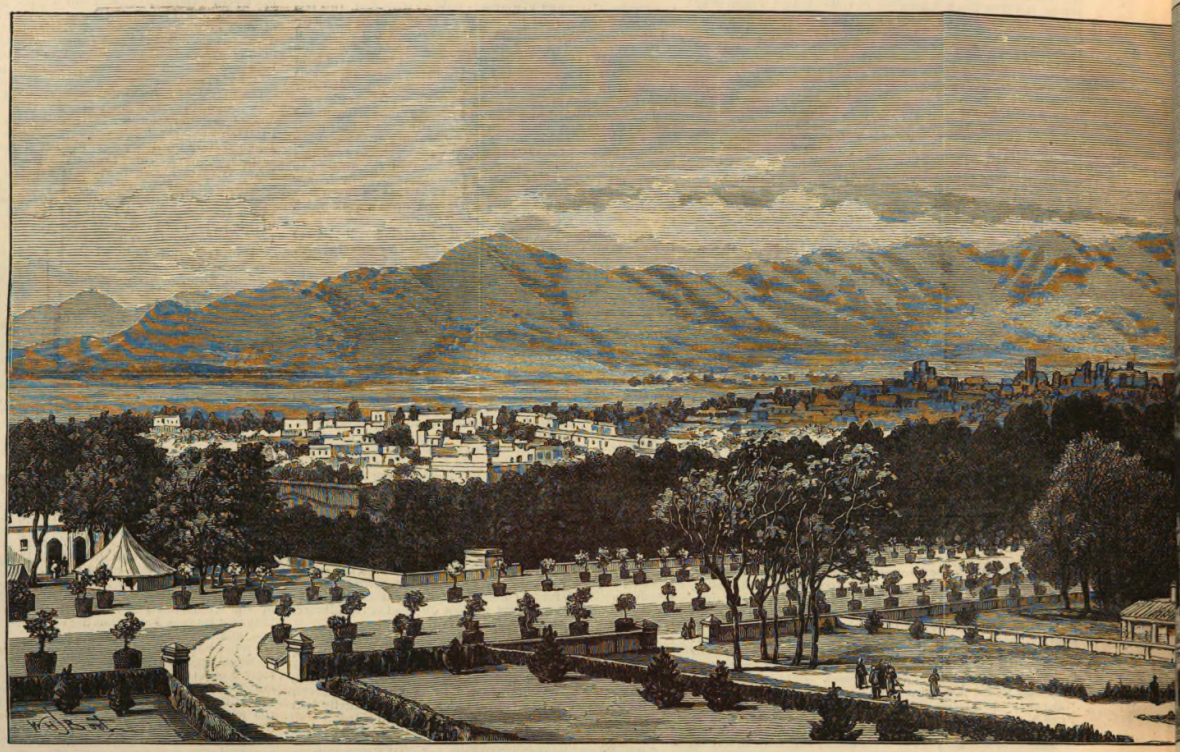
The past week has been remarkable for the proofs of frivolity which the Parisians and their journalists have given, both in the subjects which have apparently interested them and in their manner of commenting upon them. The chief topic was the conduct of Mdlle. Van Zandt and of the manager of the Opéra Comique, conduct which gave rise to disgraceful scenes in and outside the theatre, and to the semblance of riots in which the students of the Latin Quarter played a conspicuous rôle. These ridiculous events have ended in the resignation of Mdlle. Van Zandt, who, it is to be presumed, will not venture, at least for some years, to present herself before a Parisian audience. Meanwhile, there were new plays being brought out at the theatres; the "Concours Hippique" was attracting the monde and the demi-monde to a grand show of toilettes and luxury at the Palais de l'Industrie; as usual, the vaudevillists, who fulfil the rôle of Parliamentary reporters, were turning the proceedings of the Legislature into ridicule; in short, Paris was as thoughtless and frivolous as ever, and heedless of the fact that all Europe, except France, had its head out of the window wondering what would come next in that mighty perturbation of nations in which the far-seeing pessimists discern the beginning of the uprising which will end in the dusky and yellow races in their turn dominating the white.

On Sunday afternoon all Paris was abroad to enjoy the sunshine. Thousands were assembled on the race-course of Auteuil, when, about four o'clock, newspaper boys arrived hoarsely crying: "General Négrier wounded! Retreat of the French troops! Invasion of Tonquin by the Chinese!" Following, as it did, immediately on the debate in the Chamber on Saturday, this news produced a formidable impression, and no more attention was paid to the races. During the evening considerable excitement prevailed on the boulevards, and in all quarters of the city the journals were read and commented upon. It would be an exaggeration to say that the excitement was intense. But the news of the retreat, and the pressing demand of General Brière de l'Isle for reinforcements—the rumour, too, that General Négrier was not merely wounded, but dead—seemed to wake up the Parisians for the first time to the tremendous gravity of the situation. Naturally, the first movement was to blame M. Ferry and the Government. Ferry, it was said, was hiding the truth and falsifying despatches, as M. Clémenceau had accused him of doing in the Chamber on Saturday. Ferry had violated the Constitution, and deceived everybody. The Ministry ought to be impeached. Now, the only thing to do was to send at once reinforcements—50,000 to march on Pekin. Now that we are in the mire, we must get out of it with honour. At the Château d'Eau Theatre, where a piece called "Les Français au Tonkin" is being played, the whole house rose and recalled the actors five times at the passage where it is said, over the corpse of the Commander Rivière, "Even at a distance of five thousand leagues, France has her eyes upon you. She honours you, and will avenge you."

What will be the effect of public opinion and of these grave incidents upon the Government? This (Monday) morning all sorts of plans of action were discussed amongst the deputies, in anticipation of a most important meeting of the Parliament this afternoon. Finally, the Extreme Left decided to propose the impeachment of the Ministry. At the opening of the sitting M. Ferry read a statement as to events in China and the measures taken to meet them, and concluded by demanding a credit of 200 millions, adding that this vote would not be considered as one of confidence. Thereupon, M. Clémenceau said that no Republican regarded M. Ferry any longer as a Minister, but as a man on trial, an accusé. In the name of the Extreme Left, he laid on the table the order of the day for impeachment, and a demand of interpellation. M. Rebot then spoke, and proposed another order of the day. M. Ferry demanded priority for the vote of the credits. This was refused by 308 against 161, and the Ministry then retired to hand in its resignation to M. Grévy. It is alleged that M. De Freycinet, requested by the President of the Republic to take office as Prime Minister, has asked for twenty-four hours' reflection before accepting or refusing M. Grévy's offer. The Corps Législatif was surrounded by a large and anxious crowd, and on the boulevards the newspaper kiosques are being besieged by people greedy for news.

Prince Orloff died at Fontainebleau, after a long illness, yesterday afternoon, at the age of fifty-eight, after acting as Minister Plenipotentiary at Brussels from 1859 onwards. He was appointed Russian Ambassador at London in 1870, and at Paris in 1873. He remained Ambassador here until 1883, when he was nominated Ambassador at Berlin. T. C.

The Second Dutch Chamber has granted a subvention of 25,000 guilders to the Antwerp Exhibition.



The Crown Prince and Princess of Austria arrived at Vienna last Saturday evening, on their return from Montenegro.—The second reading of the bill for the reform of the Hungarian Upper House came to an end yesterday week, all the proposals of the committee being adopted. The old "Table of Magnates" has now ceased to exist. Twenty-one dukes, two hundred and forty-two counts, and two hundred and eighty-three baronets will be excluded, because they pay less than three thousand guldens taxes yearly. The new "House of Estates" will be composed of seven dukes, one hundred and sixty-two counts, thirty-six baronets, twenty-six Roman and Greek Catholic and nine Protestant bishops, thirty peers, who will be nominated by the Crown for life, and fifty representatives of those peers who have forfeited their seats.

The Danish Rigsdag has elected a committee of fifteen members from each House to arrange respecting the Budget.

A telegram from Ottawa states that the Dominion Government is determined to crush the rebellion among the half-breeds, and has ordered 1100 men from Quebec and Toronto to the North-West. Louis Riel has relinquished the command of the rebels.

The extraordinary Session of the New South Wales Parliament, convoked for the purpose of voting the funds required for the dispatch of the contingent to the Soudan, has been closed, and Parliament is prorogued. Although the minority in the Legislative Assembly voted for the amendment on the address, when the grant of the necessary money and the indemnity asked for by the Government were put to the vote no division was taken, the whole House supporting the Government.—The sculling-match between Hanlan and Beach for one thousand pounds took place at Sydney on Saturday, and resulted in the victory of Beach by six lengths.—It is announced from Melbourne that the Governor has prohibited foreign ships from entering Port Phillip during the night, and that his order will be enforced by the ships of war there stationed.—The match between Shaw's English cricket team and a representative Australian Eleven composed of picked men from the different colonies was concluded on the 25th ult. The Englishmen won by an innings, with ninety-seven runs to spare.

RAWUL PINDI, THE MEETING-PLACE OF THE VICE FROM A SKETCH BY C

CONFERENCE AT RAWUL PINDI.

The important meeting between Lord Dufferin, the Viceroy of India, and Abdurrahman Khan, Ameer of Cabul and ruler of Afghanistan, has taken place this week at Rawul Pindi, a well-known British military station in the Punjaub, the administrative head-quarters of a large district between the Indus and the Jhelum rivers. The town of Rawul Pindi, which has nearly thirty thousand inhabitants, is situated on the railway from Lahore to Peshawur; to the north-east are the Murree hills, where is the sanitarium and summer retreat of English Punjaub officials; to the north-west is Hassan Abdul, where in 1873 a camp of exercise for twenty thousand troops was formed under Lord Napier of Magdala, then Commander-in-Chief in India. We are indebted to Colonel H. B. Urmston, of the Bengal Staff Corps, who was six years Deputy Commissioner of the Rawul Pindi district, for several good water-colour sketches of those places as they were in 1873, and of the camp then assembled at Hassan Abdul. The Sketch we have engraved presents a general view of Rawul Pindi, with part of the ground now occupied by the grand encampment, and with the hills in the distance. The Viceroy's camp, including the large Durbar tent, with the tents of his escort, is on the race-course, west of the military cantonments; it is well laid out with two broad roads, along which the tents are ranged, and between which is a space of green turf, with fountains and plants adorning the scene; at night it is lighted up with gas and coloured lamps. To the south of this, on the opposite side of the Peshawur road, are encamped the Royal Horse Artillery, the 9th Lancers, the Seaforth Highlanders, the 1st Bengal Infantry, and the Punjaub Guides. To the east is the camp of Sir Charles Aitcheson, Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjaub; while the Civil Service camp is on the infantry parade-ground in the middle of the cantonments. A house, richly furnished, near the park to the south-east, has been allotted for the lodging of the Ameer, with a splendid Durbar tent, which was lent by the Maharajah of Cashmere, on the lawn, for the Ameer to use in receiving ceremonial visits. The Punjaub Native Chiefs have a separate camp on the north side of the town. The troops of the Rifle Brigade, and the 4th and 5th Ghoorkas, are encamped on the Khunna plain, two miles east of the cantonments.

Lord Dufferin arrived by railway at Rawul Pindi on Friday week, in the evening, and was met by Sir Charles Aitcheson; General Sir Donald Stewart, Commander-in-Chief in India; General Sir Frederick Roberts, Commander-in-Chief of the Madras Army; and General Hardinge, Bombay Commander-in-Chief, with the Civil Service officials of the district, the municipal authorities of the town, and the Punjaub Chiefs. An address was presented by the municipality, to which the Viceroy replied. He next day received and returned the visits of the native chiefs, and held a general Levée. The Ameer of Afghanistan was expected to arrive at Rawul Pindi, accompanied by a military escort of two thousand men, cavalry, artillery, and infantry, with which he has travelled from Cabul through the Khyber Pass. He was met last week, at the frontier line west of Lundi Kotal, by Colonel Waterfield, the Commissioner of Peshawur, with an escort of the 1st Bengal Cavalry; on Sunday his Highness was at Jamrud, on the Indian side of the Khyber Pass, where he was received by General T. Gordon, on behalf of the Viceroy, and was saluted with Royal honours by the artillery and the 12th Bengal Cavalry regiment. The Ameer went on through Peshawur. Great war preparations are being made in India. At a conference between the Viceroy and Commander-in-Chief it was resolved to send 25,000 men to the Bolan Pass, under General Roberts, to be subsequently supported by another force of the same strength, advancing from Rawul Pindi. A reserve force of 10,000 men will be placed under the Duke of Connaught's command, and 15,000 soldiers are to be drawn from England as reinforcements, should the Anglo-Russian negotiations on the Afghan boundary question fall through. Sir Donald Stewart will take command of the army at Quetta. It is stated that 60,000 troops have already been equipped for active service. Lord Dufferin, on his way to Rawul Pindi, was met by the Maharajahs Scindia and Holkar, who formally placed their armies at the disposal of the Indian military authorities in the event of a war with Russia.

His Highness the Ameer Abdurrahman Khan, whose Portrait, from a photograph by Messrs. Bourne and Shepherd, of India, appears on our front page, was born in 1830, the eldest son of Afzul Khan, and is thus a grandson of Dost Mohammed, who ruled Afghanistan till his death, in 1863, and nephew to the late Shere Ali, who was deposed and expelled by the British invasion of 1879, and who died soon afterwards in exile. Afzul Khan was Dost Mohammed's eldest son, but was Governor of Balkh, in Afghan Turkestan, when his father died, and Shere Ali had supplanted him in his absence, persuading old Dost Mohammed to nominate him, instead of Afzul, heir to the throne of Cabul. The disinherited elder brother, joined by a third brother, Azim Khan, engaged in a revolt against Shere Ali, and a civil war ensued during four years, in which Abdurrahman, a young man of great energy and ability, played a leading part, winning several battles at Sheikhabad, Khelat-i-Ghilzai, and other places, but was finally defeated by his cousin Yakoub Khan, son of Shere Ali. The Government of British India, under Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo, preserved a strict neutrality in this dynastic family quarrel, but at last recognised Shere Ali as reigning Sovereign, when he had gained the victory over his brother. Abdurrahman, who had married a daughter of the Turkish Ameer of Bokhara, took refuge in those countries north of Afghanistan, beyond the Oxus, which had then not yet been subjected to Russian control. He was pursued, however, by the persecuting spite of Shere Ali and Yakoub, who had seized his mother, wife, and sister, and detained them many years prisoners at Candahar, and who compelled the Ameer of Bokhara to deny him an abode in that State. Abdurrahman was fain to put himself under the protection of the Russians, then gradually advancing their conquests in Turkestan, and was received by General Kaufmann, who procured him, in his poverty, a Russian pension of 25,000 roubles a year, and afterwards permitted him to reside at Samarcand. He was visited, while in exile, by the American traveller, Mr. Schuyler, who formed a high opinion of his character and intelligence; and he seems to have always been a man of industry in public business, working some hours daily with his secretaries, and attending punctually to all details of administration. His face, manners, and conversation are described as very pleasant, frank, and dignified; and Sir Lepel Griffin, who was Political Agent of the British Government at Cabul in 1880, after the Afghan War, found no difficulty in coming to a good understanding with Abdurrahman. It will be recollected that, when Shere Ali was deposed, his son Yakoub was allowed by the Treaty of Gundamuk to succeed him, upon conditions of peace by which a British Resident, the unfortunate Sir Louis Cavagnari, was to have a privileged and authoritative position at Cabul. An insurrection broke out among the Afghan troops in that city, who came from Herat, and who are supposed to have been instigated by Ayoub Khan, the younger brother of Yakoub, then and long before ruling at Herat as deputy of the Cabul Government. Cavagnari and the other English officers at the Residency, with the Indian soldiers of their escort, were barbarously massacred; and the war began again in 1880: Yakoub Khan voluntarily abdicated, and became a pensioner of the British Government; Cabul and Candahar were occupied for some time by British troops, while Ayoub Khan led an army of twelve thousand men from Herat, defeating the brigade of General Burrows at Maiwand, or Khushk-i-Nakhud, on July 27, and laid siege to Candahar, but was finally defeated by Sir Frederick Roberts, on Sept. 1, fled to the west, and is now an exile in Persia, where he may not impossibly be amenable to Russian intrigue. In the meantime, Abdurrahman Khan, who has certainly as just a claim, by birth, to the throne of Dost Mohammed as any son of Shere Ali could have had, was formally chosen by the leading men of Cabul, in July, 1880, for their new Ameer, and has been very substantially supported by the British Government of India, under Lord Ripon, receiving from it a regular subsidy of £160,000 a year, with large gifts of artillery, rifles, and ammunition to improve his military force. No fault whatever has yet been found with him in his dealings with the British Government; and it is to be hoped that nothing will happen to impair the useful alliance between India and the ruler of Afghanistan. The restoration of Candahar to his hereditary dominion, after the last war, though it was not approved by some English politicians, was a signal pledge of the honesty and good faith with which England is disposed to behave to the native Principalities of Asia, with which she desires to live at peace, and to afford them protection at need so long as they deserve it.

The Ameer got to Rawul Pindi on Tuesday morning. On Monday evening, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught arrived there.

In a case referred to the Court of Queen's Bench from Yorkshire, Justices Mathew and Smith have decided that crayfish are "fish" within the meaning of the Act of Parliament.

A Royal Proclamation declares the present to be a time of great emergency, and directs the Secretary for War to call out such men of the Reserve and of the Militia Reserve, from time to time, as he may think fit, also suspending throughout the Army the transfer of men to the Reserve.—As the result of a Council held at the Admiralty, important instructions have been sent to the dockyards, and further orders given for the chartering of transports.

The trial of the action brought against Captain C. N. Hoare and Mr. E. E. Lawrence for alleged false representations connected with the scheme for converting French Five per Cents by means of a loan, terminated on Thursday week. In summing up, Mr. Justice Stephen remarked that if people risked their money in speculative transactions they must reckon on the risk of not getting back their stakes. The Jury found that the plaintiffs had been induced to part with their money by false representations, which, however, were not made in the execution of any conspiracy between the defendants, and that a material statement relied on was not made by Lawrence independently of Captain Hoare. Mr. Justice Stephen the following morning gave judgment on these findings to the effect that the plaintiffs were entitled to the amounts claimed from the defendants, with interest; but execution was stayed for a week.

THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Our Special Artist, Mr. William Simpson, at the date of his latest communication to us, was still with the British Commission in the disputed territory north of Herat. He had leisure, during his sojourn of two months at Bala Murghab, to sketch both the scenery of that neighbourhood and the figures and habits of the native people, and of the immigrant Turkoman tribes. One of his Sketches is a view of the gorge at the head of the valley, in the mountain range called the Tirband-i-Turkestan, which means "The Girdle of Turkestan," for this range is the geographical limit of Turkestan on the south. "The range," he says, "we can see from our camp; but the particular view which is represented in my Sketch was taken from a point about six or seven miles from this place. There are the ruined mud walls of an old fort on the right bank of the river; at least, its name of Kala Khoja implies that it is a fort. The Murghab flows from the mountains through the gorge, which may be looked upon as the south end of the Murghab valley. Beyond the gorge there are, no doubt, valleys, but they will be very different from the flat alluvial valley leading from this down to Merv."

We are indebted to Captain Peacocke, R.E., one of the scientific officers of the Boundary Commission, sent on by Sir Peter Lumsden to Khoja-Saleh, on the Oxus, nearly two hundred miles east-north-east of the Murghab, for Sketches of the river at that place. The Oxus of the ancient Greeks, the Jihun of the Arabs and Turks, the Vak-Shu of the Indians, the Amoo-Darya of the modern Persians and of Russian geography, is a great river of antique and mysterious renown, vaguely remembered in the earliest traditions of infant nations of the Aryan race. Its banks may have been frequented by primeval progenitors of the most civilised nations of Europe: of the Greeks and Romans as well as the Germans or the English, the Franks, Gauls, Saxons, and Scandinavians, who appeared in Europe at the dawn of mediæval history; and of the Persians and genuine Hindoos, who created a different type of civilisation in Asia. This venerable stream rises somewhere in the great Pamir or upper table-land, north of the Hindoo Koosh, which divides the Chinese territory of Kashgar, and the Mongolian world of Eastern Asia, from Turkestan and Central Asia. It flows westward, forming the northern boundary of Badakshan, Kunduz, Balkh, Andkhui, with Shibbergan and Maimene, provinces still belonging to Afghanistan, as far as Khoja-Saleh, where it turns north-west, and ultimately falls into the Sea of Aral, now a Russian lake. But there is a belief, entertained by many physical geographers, that its former course was more directly westward, across the vast desert steppe of the Kara-Kum, and that it reached the Caspian Sea, near Krasnovodsk Bay. The Murghab and the Heri-Rud, which now lose their waters in the Desert, may then have been tributaries of the Oxus. The old dried-up beds of these rivers are still discoverable; and if there was once plenty of water in that region of Asia, there may have been a large settled population in pre-historic ages, a past world of Aryan nations, speaking language of which the roots are left in thousands of words of our common speech at this day. Such is the interest attached to the Oxus and the adjacent countries in the view of archæologists and philologists; but its glory, like that of the Euphrates, has long since departed, and it presents, in general, scenes of melancholy desolation. It is naturally a very large river, bringing down, from the Ak-Su mountains to the plains, nearly as great a volume of water as the Nile. It may originally have been greater; but much of its water, which has similar fertilising properties, is spent in numerous canals for irrigation like those of Khiva; and there is a general drying-up of all the rivers and seas of Central Asia, going on for many centuries past. Civilisation has likewise dried up, and the once fruitful and populous lands have become a desert, haunted by migratory tribes of robbers. At Khami-i-Ab, near Khoja-Saleh, where Captain Peacocke took his couple of Views, one looking west and the other looking east, the river is six or seven hundred yards wide. The neighbouring mountain, which in January was capped with snow, is called the Koh-i-Jan—the lower sandhills, to the east, are the Ak-Kum. There is a patch of cultivation, and willow-trees are growing, about Khami-i-Ab and Bosaga, favoured by the "Sheikh's Canal," which lies to the left hand in the View looking west or down the river. A solitary crane at the water's edge is the only living creature in that View; but the other Sketch introduces the figures of Captain Peacocke, lying on the ground with an astronomical instrument, taking the latitude, we suppose; his Hindoo servant, who is sitting near him; two "hakims" or doctors, from Andkhui and Ak-Cha respectively, with two Turkoman followers; and a British officer employed in the political business of the Commission. These are, we believe, the first pictures of that part of the Oxus ever drawn by an English pencil, and certainly the first engraved and published. If there should, unhappily, be war between Russia and Great Britain, a regular army, with all the military bustle of a grand campaign, might soon be encamping on those lonely river-banks in Central Asia, having been conveyed several thousand miles, over sea and land, to be employed in the old, old work of fighting for empire, which has been carried on since the time of Cain, and to which mankind, for their sins, are still addicted.

Sir William Jenner, K.C.B., M.D., was on Monday elected for the fifth time President of the Royal College of Physicians of London.

Sir Saul Samuel, K.C.M.G., Agent-General for New South Wales, has been informed by telegram of the arrival in Sydney of the steamer Gulf of Mexico, which sailed from Plymouth with emigrants in January last.

Mr. Justice Chitty will be the Easter Vacation Judge, and his Lordship will be in attendance at Judges' Chambers, Royal Courts of Justice, on Thursday, April 9, Friday, April 10, Saturday, April 11, and Monday, April 13. There will be no sittings in court during the Easter Vacation.

A general abstract of marriages, births, and deaths registered in England in 1884 has been issued as a Parliamentary paper. This shows that up to the middle of 1884 the estimated population of England was 27,132,449, against 25,974,439 enumerated by the Census of 1881. The number of deaths last year was 531,951; of persons married, 408,410; and of births, 908,584.

The Royal Commission appointed by her Majesty for the purpose of organising the Colonial and Indian Exhibition of next year met, for the first time, on Monday at Marlborough House, under the presidency of the Prince of Wales, who, in opening the proceedings, reminded the commissioners of the objects for which her Majesty had appointed them, and described the project, to the realisation of which he had looked forward for some years, as essentially one of a national and Imperial character, differing in this respect from former exhibitions, in which the elements of trade rivalry and profit largely predominated. His Royal Highness expressed a hope that this gathering might be the means not only of giving a stimulus to commercial interests and intercourse, but of strengthening that bond of union between her Majesty's subjects in all parts of the Empire the growth and manifestation of which are sincerely appreciated by all.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The Scotch Confirmation, under seal of office of the Commissary Court of Elgin and Nairn, of the general disposition and deed of settlement, dated Aug. 14, 1884, of the Right Hon. Louisa, Dowager Countess of Seafield, who died at Grant Lodge, Elgin, on Sept. 2 last, granted to the Hon. Lewis Alexander Grant and Alexander Lewis Henry Grant, the executors nominate, was sealed in London on the 7th ult., the value of the personal estate in England, Scotland, and Ireland exceeding £8000.

The will (dated Nov. 25, 1884) of Lady Catherine Georgiana Barrington, late of Watton, Hertfordshire, who died on Jan. 18 last, at St. Leonard's-on-Sea, was proved on the 20th ult. by Russell Henry Barrington, the son, one of the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £7000. The testatrix leaves the cash at her banker's and her English and Indian Government Stocks to her husband, the Hon. and Rev. Lowther John Barrington, for life, and then to her three children; and the residue of her property to her husband, absolutely. The deceased was a daughter of Thomas, second Earl of Chichester.

The Scotch Confirmation, under the seal of office of the Commissariot of the county of Edinburgh, of the disposition and settlement (dated May 17, 1883) of Sir Henry James Seton-Steuart, Bart., late of No. 9, Charlotte-square, Edinburgh, who died on Dec. 6 last, granted to Dame Elizabeth Seton-Steuart, the widow and executrix nominate, was sealed in London on the 10th ult., the value of the personal estate in England and Scotland amounting to over £16,000.

The will (dated Sept. 3, 1880), with six codicils (dated Sept. 3, 1880; May 14 and Aug. 3, 1881; Nov. 21, 1882; June 12, 1883; and Aug. 15, 1884), of Mr. Thomas Curtis, formerly of No. 74, Lombard-street, but late of The Hall, Berkhampstead, Herts, who died on Dec. 7 last, was proved on the 18th ult. by John Turton Woolley, Beaumont William Lubbock, and Charles Constable Curtis, the great nephew, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £374,000. The testator bequeaths £10,000, upon trust, for his sister-in-law, Frances Blathwayt, for life; £10,000 upon the trusts of the will of his late great nephew, the Rev. Richard Folliott Scott; £5000 to his nephew, Constable Curtis; £4000 and certain shares to his said great nephew, Charles Constable Curtis; £6000 Consols, upon trust, to pay a stipend of £60 per annum to the clergyman of the Church of England in ministerial charge of the church at Whelpley Hill, Chesham, Oxfordshire, erected by him; a stipend of £60 per annum to the schoolmistress of the school at Whelpley Hill, also erected by him; and the remainder of the income to be applied in the repair and maintenance of the said church and school;—his plate, books, pictures, bronzes, statuary, and works of art to go as heirlooms and be enjoyed with his estates in Bucks and Herts; the remainder of his furniture and effects, farming stock, &c., to the person who shall succeed at his death to the said estates; and numerous bequests to his executors, friends, relatives, clerks, servants, and others. His real estate near Weybridge and elsewhere in the county of Surrey he leaves to his said sister-in-law, Frances Blathwayt, for life, and then to his late wife's nephew, Charles George Blathwayt; and his estates in Nottinghamshire and Lincolnshire he settles on his great nephew, Charles Constable Curtis. All his real estate in the counties of Buckingham and Hertford, and the residue of his real estate, and also the residue of the personalty, he settles on his nephew, Constable Curtis, for life, with remainder to his great nephew, Charles Constable Curtis, for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively, according to their respective seniorities in tail male.

The will (dated May 8, 1884) of Francis James Gill, of Bank House, Tallowfield, Manchester, and senior partner in the firm of Gill and Hartley, 79, Cannon-street, Manchester, and Bury-lane, Culcheth, Lancashire, and 120, Wood-street, London, has been proved under £160,000 at the District Court, Manchester, by the executors, his brother, Robert Preston Gill, and his sons, Thomas Gill, John Whitcombe Gill, and Robert Hartley Gill.

The will (dated Aug. 24, 1884) of Mrs. Catherine Bousfield, late of No. 44, Grosvenor-place, who died on Aug. 24 last, at Coniston, Lancashire, was proved on the 14th ult. by Richard Fell Steble and Alexander Milne, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £79,000. The testatrix leaves Holywath and all her property at Church Coniston, in the county of Lancaster, to James William Henry Barratt and Margaret, his wife, and the survivor of them, absolutely; £50,000 to the said Richard Fell Steble; £20,000 to Mrs. Metcalf, of Trizett; £10,000 each to Salome Bythia Barratt and Alexander John Barratt; and other legacies. The residue of her property she gives to the said Richard Fell Steble.

The will (dated April 1, 1880) of Mr. Nathaniel James Powell, late of Devonshire House, Beckenham, who died on Jan 1 last, was proved on the 14th ult. by William James Smellie, Nathaniel Porter, and Ernest Pewtress, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £48,000. The testator leaves the cash in the house, all his furniture, plate, pictures, effects, horses, carriages, and cattle, £500, and an annuity of £1000 for life, to his wife, Mrs. Susannah Powell; she is also to have the option of using his residence or a further annuity of £100 for life; and he bequeaths £500 to the Asylum for Fatherless Children, Reedham;—£250 each to the Orphan Working School, Haverstock-hill, and the Royal Hospital for Incurables, Putney;—£200 each to the Asylum for Idiots, Earlswood; the London Missionary Society, the London City Mission, the London Congregational Chapel Building Society, the Church Aid and Home Missionary Society, and the London Congregational Union;—£100 each to the Aged Pilgrims' Friend Society; the Milton Mount College, near Gravesend; Hackney College, Well-street, Hackney; New College, Hampstead; the London Orphan Asylum, Watford; the Religious Tract Society, the Governesses' Benevolent Institution, the Sunday School Union, Old Bailey; the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Evangelical Continental Society, the Irish Evangelical Society, the Kent County Congregational Society, the London Hospital, Whitechapel-road; the London Hospital, Victoria Park; the Eastern Dispensary, Leman-street; the Protestant Blind Pension Society, the Congregational School, Lewisham, for the education of the sons of Ministers; and the Countess of Huntingdon's College, Cheshunt;—an annuity of £200 during the life of his wife to his brother, William Thomas; and very numerous and considerable other legacies. At his wife's death he bequeaths many further legacies, some of large amount; and the ultimate residue is divided into fourteenth parts, among various persons, including his said brother and his wife and daughter.

The will (dated June 6, 1884) of Mr. Henry Freeman George Coleman, late of Oakley House, Alpha-road, St. John's-wood, who died on Dec. 3 last, was proved on the 9th ult. by George William Coleman, the brother, and Richard Seddon Toller, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £31,000. The testator leaves his household furniture and effects to his wife, Mrs. Charlotte Tilke Coleman, and the residue of his real and personal estate, upon trust, for her, for life, and then for his said brother.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

"Victoria Regina." The Royal Message, thus headed, communicated suddenly to Parliament on the 26th of March, took the wind out of the sails of the debate on the Egyptian Convention. It was with almost startling abruptness that the Earl of Kimberley, in the Upper House, exclaiming, "A message from the Queen," rose from the Ministerial bench, and, quickly walking to the woolsack, handed the paper to the Lord Chancellor. There was a fair gathering of Peers; and all eyes were directed to Lord Selborne as he quietly read the momentous message intimating the necessity of calling out the Reserves and the Militia to meet "a case of great emergency." The Marquis of Salisbury, as Leader of the Opposition, naturally rose to inquire whether this grave step had been decided upon in consequence of intelligence of an alarming character from the Afghan frontier. But Lord Kimberley adopted the unusual course of crossing the floor of the House to the front Opposition bench in order to whisper his reply in the ear of the noble Marquis—an answer presumably to the effect that reticence was for the moment expedient. In a wellnigh inaudible voice Lord Selborne then—perhaps, to stigmatise by a side wind those that had rendered the Queen's message necessary—explained the principle of the new Lunacy Laws Amendment Bill, which was read a first time, and which is intended to remedy some of those evils at present existing in the administration of a merciful law singularly liable to abuse. What had been a subdued and hushed sitting, so to speak, bade fair to have an animated ending. But it was made manifest to Lord Greville that it would be inadvisable to persist in his inquiry concerning the cause of the surprise of General McNeill's zerebas, near Souakim, on the 22nd of March, and the matter dropped. None the less, the attack in question, with such important details as the alleged jamming of the Gardner guns, the trouble with the Boxer cartridge, and the dispatch of empty water-bottles to the zerebas, cannot have failed to engage the serious attention of the Horse Guards and War Office authorities.

"No flinching!" Lord Granville the next day was able to assure the Marquis of Salisbury that there would be "no flinching" on the part of the Government with regard to the question in dispute between Russia and England. Referring to Penjdeh, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs declared that the debateable ground had been occupied by the Afghans before the arrival of General Lumsden. Their Lordships met for a short time on Saturday last, when her Majesty signified by Royal Commission her consent to a cluster of measures. Thereafter, the House of Lords adjourned for the Easter Recess.

Before the Commons rose for the holidays, the Government were fortunately able to foreshadow a more hopeful state of things with respect to the Afghan difficulty. The bold front assumed by the Ministry towards Russia, and the patriotic support offered by the Opposition and the House generally, indisputably helped to bring the impulsive spirits of St. Petersburg to reason. Last week the Message from her Majesty calling out the Reserves and the Militia had been sonorously read by the Speaker; the Prime Minister had returned replies regarding the respective positions of the Russian and Afghan forces on the frontier of Turkestan; and considerable tension existed. Monday brought good news. The Marquis of Hartington had the satisfaction of announcing that "the latest intelligence from St. Petersburg is of such a nature as to strengthen our hope of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion (Cheers). As to the military preparations respecting which the hon. member for Kirkcaldy asks, I can say no more than that, as the House is aware, we have entered into certain engagements on certain conditions towards the Ameer of Afghanistan; but, looking to the distance which separates our military force from the region to which our engagements relate, we are of opinion that it is desirable to make some preparations to enable us to fulfil those engagements if occasion should arise."

The cheers that greeted the statement of the Secretary for War had hardly died away when Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, replying to Mr. E. Stanhope, imparted an additionally cheerful tone to matters by holding out hopes that the Russian Government contemplated "an early meeting of the Commission, and looks forward to such meeting as likely to allay the excitement on both sides." This long-delayed meeting, however, would be more exactly described as "better late than never," for it can scarcely be considered "early" now.

The resolution of Mr. T. Bruce condemning in unqualified terms the Egyptian Financial Agreement missed fire, because the Opposition did not formulate any distinct alternative policy. Mr. Gladstone's opening statement on March 26, although clear as a piece of exposition, was characterised by as languid a grasp of the Egyptian Difficulty as ever. The terms of the Premier's motion were:—

That her Majesty be authorised to guarantee the payment of an annuity of £165,000 sterling for the purpose of a loan, to be raised by the Government of Egypt, in pursuance of the Convention signed at London on March 18, 1885, between her Majesty and the Governments of Austria-Hungary, France, Germany, Italy, and Russia, with the authority of Turkey; and that provision be made out of the Consolidated Fund to fulfil the guarantee of her Majesty in respect of such annuity.

But no gleam of hope was given by his speech that this Convention would be anything but a temporary tiding over the financial embarrassments which threatened Egypt with bankruptcy. Nor did Mr. Bruce's amendment promise any better solution. Whilst Mr. Gladstone's was perhaps the most impolitic of the many impolitic addresses he has been called upon to deliver since the bombardment of Alexandria, neither Sir Stafford Northcote nor Mr. Chamberlain, neither Sir Michael Hicks-Beach nor Mr. Childers could present to the House any more statesman-like plan. Hence, probably, the goodly majority the Government secured on the second night of the debate. Mr. Bruce's condemnatory amendment was negatived by a majority of 48—294 against 246 votes—and Mr. Gladstone's motion was then agreed to. We are, accordingly, on the eve of another phase of the Egyptian Difficulty, which can barely be worse, however, than the present phase.

Ere the Commons separated on Tuesday, there was a brief but interesting discussion on the condition of the Ladies' Gallery. Mr. Sydney Buxton's gallant endeavour to secure an improvement in the at present very imperfect accommodation had a damper thrown upon it by Mr. Herbert Gladstone and Mr. Gibson, and even by Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, who has such rational views with respect to the arrangement of the House generally that he might well have been expected to have agreed with the motion. But there was a majority of 56 against Mr. Buxton, whose fair clients will have to wait yet "a little longer."

Mr. Henry Irving will conclude his American engagement at New York this week. He will be entertained at a farewell dinner, on April 6, at Delmonico's, Mr. William M. Evarts being in the chair. Mr. Irving leaves on the 7th.

At a meeting of the subscribers of the York and Ainsty Hunt, held at Harker's Hotel, York, last Saturday, under the presidency of Lord Wenlock, Lieutenant-Colonel E. C. York, of Hutton Hall, was appointed master of the hounds, in the place of Captain Brockiehurst, resigned.

CITY ECHOES.

Tuesday Evening, March 31.

In the absence of any indication that permanent terms can be made with Russia in regard to the Afghan frontier, and in the knowledge that the British Government is rapidly preparing for war, all business has for a week past been increasingly under the influence of the feeling that war must be counted as almost probable. And at the time of writing the Ministerial crisis in France has added to the sensitiveness of the European Bourses. Most home and foreign Government securities have further declined. Russian are still being taken for German account, though upon borrowed money. In Berlin war is not thought probable, and hence this dangerous speculation. If war does not result, large profits will be made by many; but in the other event, there will be a crash indeed. But, apart from this befalling Government securities, trade generally is being seriously interfered with. War would mean not only great interruption to nearly every branch of business, but involve such an outlay of money as to render necessary a great addition to taxation. Income-tax payers would probably have their special burdens increased; but it is taken for granted that there must be a resort to increased import duties in order to distribute the burden over the widest area. Tea is regarded as a convenient commodity for such a purpose, and there has in consequence been considerable excitement in that market, stock being taken out of bond in advance of requirements to make sure of the present basis of duty. The preparations of our Government have given an impulse to trade in some directions. The purchases of tinned meats are understood to have quite cleared the American market of supplies; and with us the shipping interests have been affected by the purchase or hire of many of the largest and best ocean-going steamers, while the intention to call out the Reserve affects the labour market in many parts of the country. But apart from these special causes for animation, there is nothing favourable to say of any class of business.

The Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul Railway Company have just announced a materially reduced dividend for the second half of last year, the rate being 3 per cent per annum, compared with 7 per cent per annum for several previous half-years. The New York Central and Hudson River Company, which for many years paid 8 per cent per annum, lowered their rate in October last to 6, and again the last month to 4. Still later, the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railway Company, which formerly paid 8 per cent per annum and latterly 6, are to "pass" the dividend due in May.

At the meeting of the East and West India Dock Company, held for the purpose of raising new capital in the form of debenture stock, the chairman, in the course of his remarks, rightly deprecated the policy of issuing stock below market value to shareholders. He stated that stock had on a former occasion been rateably issued to existing holders, and a material fall in the market value had resulted through the holders being in haste to sell, in order to take their profit. The shareholders thus gained very little, and the company of course was deprived of the money it would have otherwise obtained had the stock been issued at the proper value.

For the year 1884 the directors of the South Australian Land Mortgage and Agency Company, Limited, are to pay 12½ per cent. The company was established in 1880, and it has from the first paid 10 per cent. There is a reserve of £45,000. The subscribed capital is £2,000,000, £200,000 being paid up, and there are debentures to upwards of £800,000.

Another serious failure has taken place in connection with the recent losses in Grand Trunk stocks, and in this case fraud had been resorted to to delay discovery. T. S.

THE HAIRY-FRONTED MUNTJAC.

The muntjacs are a small group of the deer family peculiar to India and Western Asia, and remarkable for having their antlers carried on long bony pedestals which are covered with a hairy skin, and somewhat remind one of the diminutive horned processes on the head of the giraffe. They are likewise peculiar for having longitudinal ridges of skin between the eyes, within the folds of which small glands are situated, and for the extreme development of the canine teeth in the males. The best known species of muntjac is the ribbed-faced, or barking deer of Indian sportsmen, which is found throughout the jungles and forests of British India, and ascends the Himalayas to an elevation of eight or nine thousand feet. It is most abundant in hilly countries, Dr. Jerdon tells us, and is quite a forest animal, only coming to the skirts of the woods in the morning and evening to graze. "It gets the name of barking deer from its call, which is a kind of short bark like that of the fox, but louder, and may be heard in the jungles it frequents both by day and by night." Closely allied to the Indian muntjac are two species from China, known to naturalists as Reeves' muntjac (cervulus Reevesi), and the crying muntjac (cervulus Lacrymans). Of both these forms of muntjac, as well of the Indian species, examples may usually be seen in the Zoological Society's collection. But the animal lately received by the Zoological Society, of which we give an Illustration, appears to belong to a very different species from the three above mentioned. It is readily distinguishable from the muntjacs hitherto known to us by the long hairs which spring from the forehead and summit of the head and almost conceal the short horns, and by its long tail. The single male specimen received was transmitted to this country by Mr. A. Michie, of Ningpo, China. It was doubtless obtained in that part of the Celestial Empire, although little further information has as yet been received concerning it.

Her Majesty's ship Mersey was successfully launched at Chatham Dockyard on Tuesday morning by Lady Key, wife of Admiral Sir Astley Cooper Key.

We understand that the Boy's Own Paper, of the Religious Tract Society, whose readers have already subscribed over £1200 for two life-boats, besides £400 for a hospital cot, is promoting a Boys' Gordon Memorial, on the lines known to be dear to Gordon himself—viz., to help the poorer working and suffering lads.

POSTAGE OF THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

OBITUARY.

SIR V. H. LEVINGE, BART.

Sir Vere Henry Levinge, eighth Baronet, of Knockdrin Castle, in the county of Westmeath, died at Madras on the 22nd ult. He was born Nov. 28, 1819, the sixth son of Sir Richard Levinge, sixth Baronet, by Elizabeth Anne, his wife, daughter and eventual coheir of Thomas Boothby, first Lord Rancliffe; was educated at Haileybury, and was for some years in the Madras Civil Service. He succeeded to the baronetcy at the decease, last September, of his brother, Sir Richard, seventh Baronet. Sir Vere was never married, and the title devolves on his nephew, now Sir William Henry Levinge, ninth Baronet, born in 1849, and married, 1876, to Emily Judith, daughter of Sir Richard Sutton, Bart.

SIR A. H. FREELING, BART.

Sir Arthur Henry Freeling, fifth Baronet, Major-General Royal Engineers (retired), died on the 26th ult., at 2, Elm Park-gardens. He was born July 26, 1820, the second son of Mr. John Clayton Freeling, Secretary to the Board of Inland Revenue, and succeeded to the title at the decease of his cousin, Sir Henry Hill Freeling, fourth Baronet, March 12, 1871. He was educated at Harrow, entered the Royal Engineers in 1837, and retired as Major-General in 1877. He married, 1848, Charlotte Augusta, daughter of Sir Henry Rivers, Bart., and leaves a son, now Sir Harry Freeling, sixth Baronet, born June 5, 1852, and a daughter, Marion, wife of Mr. William Foster Moore, of Plymouth.

MAJOR-GENERAL HOPKINS.

Major-General William Friend Hopkins, C.B., Royal Marine Light Infantry, died at his residence, St. James's Lodge, Hampton-hill, Middlesex, aged seventy-five. He was son of Mr. John Hopkins, of Rochester. In 1829, he entered the Army, and served with the Royal Marine Brigade in the Crimea, 1854 to 1855; in command of the first battalion, at Balaclava, did duty in the trenches, and commanded the Royal Marines at Inkerman. For his services, he received the Crimean medal with three clasps, the Sardinian and Turkish medals, the Medjidieh and the Legion of Honour, besides being made C.B. From 1859 to 1864, when he was promoted to the rank of Major-General, he acted as A.D.C. to the Queen. He married, 1839, Jessie, daughter of Mr. Henry Thompson, of Turnham-green.

COLONEL COCKS.

Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Lygon Cocks, of Treverbyn Vean, Cornwall, J.P. and D.L., late of the Coldstream Guards, died on the 24th ult., at Bournemouth, in his sixty-fourth year. He was third son of Mr. Thomas Somers Cocks, by Agneta, his wife, daughter of the Right Hon. Reginald Pole-Carew, and grandson of Mr. Thomas Somers Cocks, banker, of Charing-cross, whose eldest brother was created Lord Somers. Colonel Cocks was educated at Sandhurst, and served with the Coldstreams in the Crimea from May, 1885, to the fall of Sebastopol. He had the Crimean medal with clasp, the Turkish medal, and the Medjidieh (fifth class). He married, July 5, 1870, Josephine, daughter of Mr. J. Chichester-Nagle, of Calverleigh Court, Devon, and leaves two daughters, twins.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Morison Watson, M.D., F.R.S., Professor of Anatomy, Owens College, Manchester, on the 25th ult., aged thirty-nine.

The Hon. George Cornelius Gerald O'Callaghan, elder and last surviving son of Lord Lismore, on his passage home from India. He was born Nov. 3, 1846, and, by his death without issue, there is now no heir to the Lismore peerage.

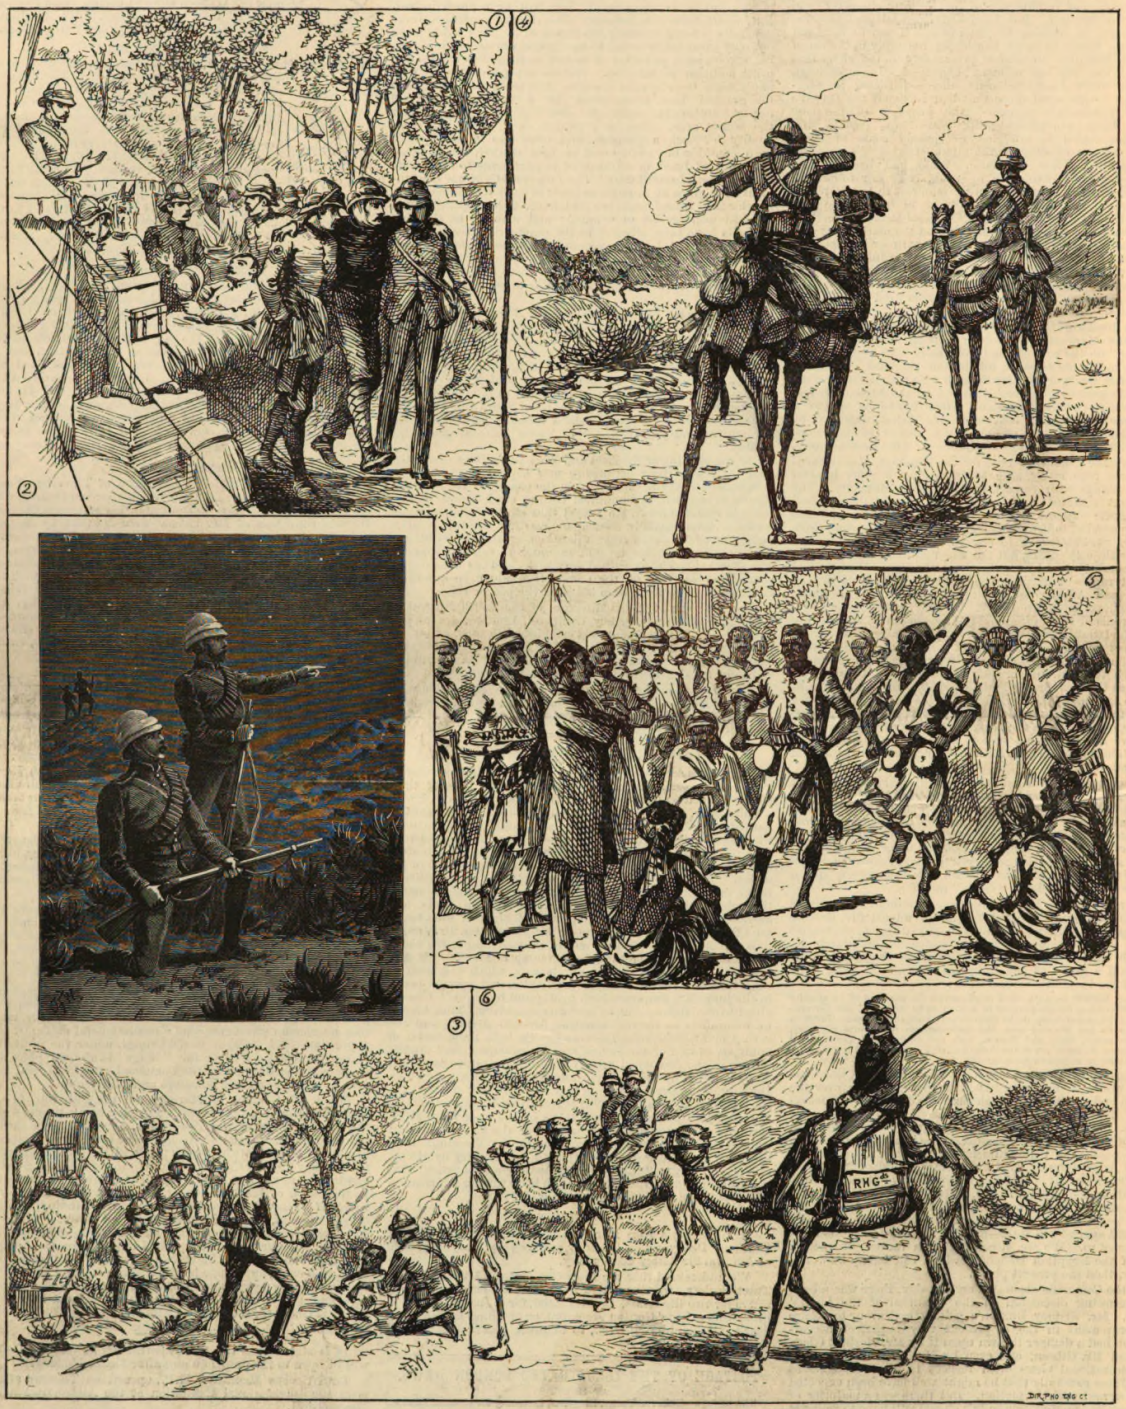
Lieutenant Alexander T. F. Edwards, Royal Irish Regiment, doing duty with the Indian Contingent, on the 23rd ult., from the effects of a wound received the previous day in action near Tamanieb; son of the late General Clement Alexander Edwards, Colonel of the Royal Irish.

Mr. Mark Anthony Saurin, of Orielton, in the county of Pembroke, J.P., High Sheriff, 1867, youngest son of the Right Rev. James Saurin, D.D., Bishop of Dromore, and nephew of the Right Hon. William Saurin, Attorney-General for Ireland, on the 25th ult., aged seventy.

Miss Elizabeth Crombie Duthie, the lady who gave the city of Aberdeen the public park which bears her name, on the 30th ult., aged sixty-five. The Duthie Park, which was opened by Princess Beatrice in September, 1883, cost £50,000. Miss Duthie has bequeathed the rest of her fortune to the public institutions of the city.

Mr. Thomas Fellowes Reade, late her Majesty's Agent and Consul-General for Tunis, on the 24th ult. He acted as private secretary to his father, the late Sir Thomas Reade, when that gentleman was Agent and Consul-General at Tunis. In September, 1854, he went to the Crimea, under the authority of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to place his services at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief, and was present at the battles of Balaclava and Inkerman.

Mr. J. W. Davison, at Margate, on the 24th ult., in the seventy-second year of his age. For very many years he was the musical critic of the Times. Mr. Davison was a skilled practical musician, besides having possessed high literary attainments and powers. He had much to do with the establishment of the Monday Popular Concerts, the analytical programme-books of which were written by him up to the period of his death. In the course of his long career, he had had personal knowledge of many distinguished musicians, including, among others, Rossini, Auber, Mendelssohn, and Spohr; while he was one of the first to estimate and to make widely known the genius of our own distinguished countryman, the late Sir Sterndale Bennett. Mr. Davison's conversation was attractive to all who could appreciate his great range of information, his wide-extending sympathies, and his combination of earnestness and genial satire. In 1860, he was married to Miss Arabella Goddard, the eminent pianist.



It is stated that the State apartments at Windsor Castle will be open to the public on and after Easter Monday.

Lord George Hamilton, M.P., opened on Tuesday afternoon the International Exhibition at the Alexandra Palace, Muswell-hill.

The whole of the £5000 required for the purchase of the Sussex County Cricket-Ground has been guaranteed, and the Committee of the Club have accordingly decided to effect the purchase. The Earl of Sheffield, the President, has contributed £600 to the fund.

The Duke of Cambridge presided on Monday at the annual meeting of the Royal School for the Daughters of Officers of the Army, held in the Royal United Service Institution. His Royal Highness said that the chief difficulty the school had to contend with was financial, and it was more than ever necessary that it should be liberally supported.

NEW SCANDINAVIAN CHURCH, LIVERPOOL.

THE LATE SIR T. BAZLEY, BART.

The death of this gentleman, who represented Manchester in the House of Commons until the General Election of 1880, and who was President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce during twenty-five years, was recorded in our Obituary last week. Mr. Thomas Bazley was a native of Bolton, engaged at an early age in the staple manufacturing business of Lancashire, and became the sole proprietor of the largest fine cotton and lace thread spinning concern in the trade, employing more than 1000 hands. He joined earnestly in the efforts of Lancashire men to promote free and unsectarian popular education; and he established, in connection with his factories, schools, lectures, and reading-rooms. Mr. Bazley was one of the earliest members of the Manchester Anti-Corn Law Association, and of the Council of the League; in 1837, with Richard Cobden and John Brooks, he opened the Free Trade campaign at Liverpool, on which occasion he made his first public speech. In 1858, he was elected M.P. for Manchester without opposition, and was again returned at the head of the poll at two subsequent elections. He seconded the Address in reply to the Queen's Speech in the Session of 1863, but did not often take part in debate. A baronetcy was conferred upon him in 1869, which devolves on his son, Sir Thomas Sebastian Bazley, of Riversleigh, Lytham, and Hatherop Castle, Gloucestershire. The late Baronet was eighty-eight years of age.

SCANDINAVIAN CHURCH, LIVERPOOL.

This church, known as "Gustaf Adolf's Kyrka," has been built for the use of the Scandinavian sailors who frequent the port of Liverpool in large numbers. Its erection is due to the "Fosterland" Society of Stockholm, which makes the care and comfort of the Norsemen in foreign ports its special object. King Oscar of Norway and Sweden has shown his lively interest in this excellent work by heading the Swedish subscription-list with a handsome donation. Norway and Denmark have added their quota, and, with the further assistance of the Liverpool Scandinavians, a total of £4000 has already been raised, further funds being still required for the purchase of the site. The building, which has been erected from the designs of Mr. W. D. Caröe, M.A., architect, of London, comprises a church to accommodate 500 persons, a spacious reading-room, and a parsonage. The architecture is characteristically Scandinavian in style, entirely new to this country, and the building thus forms a striking and unusual object in the city. The birthday of King Oscar and the Princess of Wales was appropriately chosen for the opening ceremony, Liverpool showing its interest by the attendance of its Mayor in civic state. The occasion was further honoured by congratulatory messages from the King and the Princess. We learn that the services of the church continue to be numerously attended—a mark of the well-authenticated high morale of the Norse seamen.

PUBLIC DEBT OF NEW ZEALAND.

CONVERSION of £3,772,400 NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT FIVE PER CENT CONSOLS.—The Governor and Company of the Bank of England give Notice that, on behalf of the agents appointed by the Governor of New Zealand in Council, under the New Zealand Consolidated Stock Act, 1877, the Amendment Act, 1881, and the Consolidated Stock Act, 1884 (Sir Francis Dillon Bell, K.C.M.G., and Sir Penrose Goodchild Julyan, K.C.M.G., C.B.), they are authorised to invite holders of the debentures of the above loan to bring in their debentures for conversion, on the following terms, viz.:

For every one hundred pounds of such debentures a new debenture will be issued for the same amount, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum for seven years, from April 15, 1885, to April 15, 1892, when it will be converted into £107 New Zealand Four per Cent Consolidated Stock, inscribed at the Bank of England, which will rank pari passu with the Four per Cent Consolidated Stock already created and issued, and redeemable at par on Nov. 1, 1929.

Applications for conversion will be received up to April 30 next, inclusive.

The interest upon the new debentures will be payable by coupons in the same manner as upon the Consol Debentures—viz., Jan. 15, April 15, July 15, and Oct. 15, at the Bank of England, the first coupon being for the dividend due July 15 next.

Consol Debentures, from which the coupon due April 15 next must be detached, may be deposited at the Chief Cashier's Office, Bank of England, for exchange on or after Wednesday, the 11th inst. They must bear all coupons subsequent to that due April 15 next, and must be left three clear days for examination. Receipts will be given for the debentures deposited, and the new debentures will be issued in exchange as soon after as possible.

The usual annual drawing for redemption of the Consols will take place on Tuesday, March 31; debentures deposited before that date will not be affected by the drawing. Holders of Consol Debentures drawn for redemption, in respect of which no application for conversion has been made, will be allowed to receive, in exchange for each drawn debenture, a new debenture as above, upon payment of the sum of £4 per cent, provided such location be made before April 15 next.

By the Act 40 and 41 Vict., ch. 30, the revenues of the colony of New Zealand alone will be liable in respect of the stock and the dividends thereon; and the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, and the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, will not be directly or indirectly liable or responsible for the payment of the stock or of the dividends thereon, or for any matter relating thereto.

Bank of England, March 6, 1885.

CHAPTER XX.

ESTRANGEMENT.

Heriot's circumstances and domestic arrangements so far differed from those of most bachelors that he enjoyed the privilege of asking ladies to dinner, and availed himself of it pretty freely during the season. When he invited our friends in Alexandra-gardens to honour him so far one evening, they had no excuse for sending him a refusal, although one of them would have been glad to escape the lecture which he feared was in store for him. Clare and Miss Vidal, who had not yet seen the interior of Heriot's abode, felt the curiosity natural to their sex to inspect a house which owned no mistress—a house, too, which was reported to contain artistic treasures of every description.

Their host's drawing-room proved to be very much what they had anticipated: that is to say that it was filled with beautiful and valuable objects, and that the absence of feminine superintendence was very perceptible in it. A man may hope to fit up a library or a smoking-room with fair success; but to make a drawing-room look inhabited is a little beyond us. Heriot had not attempted this feat. With the exception of a few Oriental rugs, he had added nothing to the furniture which he had inherited, and which belonged to the period of gilding and mirrors. The pictures, the bronzes, the enamels, and the china which he had collected in the course of his travels had been sent home to Brook-street, and unpacked by his housekeeper, who had arranged them without interference on the part of their owner. The result would have grieved the soul of an æsthetic dilettante; but Heriot had something to say in justification of it.

"You see," he explained to the two ladies who were busily examining his pretty things, "I feel that everybody who enters this room will do me the justice to perceive that I am not responsible for it; whereas, if I tried to lessen its ugliness, I should probably fall into blunders which you couldn't forgive. Lady St. Austell was here the other day, and she said, 'Your drawing-room is like yourself—frankly hideous, you know, at the first glance, but full of unexpected beauties, if you take the trouble to look for them.' I think that was a very pretty compliment. One doesn't make one's face; but one may flatter one's self that the unexpected beauties are of one's own creating."

Clare thought to herself that Lady St. Austell's own face merited precisely the opposite description; the beauty of it being apparent to careless observers, while its unexpected uglinesses became visible upon a closer scrutiny. But she prudently refrained from saying this aloud, and Georgina laughed and remarked: "I shall break into your house some time when you are away, Mr. Heriot, and lay hands upon various trifles which you will never miss."

"Do," answered Heriot; "or lay hands upon them now, which will be still better. Lady St. Austell did. She never comes here without carrying away some memento of her visits. She says it will save me the trouble of mentioning her in my will."

And it was a woman who could make such speeches as that, Clare thought, whom men found fascinating! Then De Wynt came in, rubbing his hands, and the small party was complete.

"I am sorry that we are a lady short," Heriot said. "Lady St. Austell, who had promised to join us, sent about an hour ago to say that she couldn't get off another engagement."

It is probable that the absence of this fifth guest was not deeply deplored by the other four. Adrian inwardly returned thanks to Heaven for his deliverance from danger, and remarked aloud: "We shall be ever so much jollier without outsiders."

Yet, somehow, the evening was not a very jolly one. De Wynt may have enjoyed it, and so, perhaps, did Georgina; but the remaining three certainly did not. Heriot could not help noticing that something was amiss between Adrian and Clare, nor could they help being aware that he noticed this; so that their joint and several efforts to behave as though all were well failed lamentably. The presence of De Wynt was a comfort to Adrian, since nothing of a private nature could be said before him during the twenty minutes that the three men spent in the dining-room after dinner; but he was not to escape the interview with his friend which he dreaded. For when the hour of release came, and when he had put the ladies into their carriage, muttering something about going down to the club to smoke a cigar, Heriot interposed with, "Stay and smoke your cigar with me, Adrian; I haven't seen anything of you yet." To which he could only reply, "All right, old man," with such show of alacrity as was at his command.

"I hope it is not too late to offer my congratulations," Heriot said, after he had led the way into the comfortable library of which he made a good deal more use than of his drawing-room. "You have become a famous man since you were last in this house."

"Hardly that," answered Vidal, laughing.

"Oh, you are famous—don't affect modesty with an old friend. And I am told that you write the review of fiction in that queer new venture of Pilkington's—if it is his venture. Probably it is somebody else's venture, though?"

"Oh, of course. I don't know who the principal proprietors are—Egerton, I believe, for one—but we are all of us interested in it to a small extent. What do you think of its chances?"

"As a speculation, do you mean? I am no judge of such matters; but I should think it ought to pay, if Pilkington can be induced to stick to it. I read the literary article in the last number, and thought I recognised your touch. You were quite right to join the staff of the Anglo-Saxon. It is a brilliant one just now, and, even if it doesn't hold together long, you will be all the better for having been connected with it."

"Do you think it won't hold together?" asked Vidal, a little anxiously.

"I know nothing about it, except that brilliant staffs have a way of splitting up after a certain time. Perhaps this one will be the exception that proves the rule. At any rate, you are not dependent upon Pilkington and his experiments. Your business is the writing of novels, and I am very glad to think that you are making a much better business of it than seemed likely this time last year."

Vidal laughed. "Oh, yes; the money is tumbling in. It tumbles out again, though, at a deuce of a pace. I can assure you, Heriot, that it costs a great deal more than a bachelor might suppose to maintain an establishment in a humble way on the extreme outskirts of civilised London. I feel that I ought to be laying by for a rainy day; but I haven't been able to manage it so far."

"Let us hope that there will be no rainy days for a long time to come," said Heriot, cheerfully. "After such a start as you have made, your earnings ought to increase henceforth rather than diminish; and if there is such a thing as luck, I should say that you may safely count yourself a lucky man. Up to the present, at all events, you have got everything that you have wished for. You ought to be about the happiest fellow in London."

"Well, perhaps," answered Vidal, who somehow rather resented this imputation. "The things that one has wished for don't always turn out to be all that one's fancy painted them, though."

"Do you mean to say that greatness is beginning to pall upon you already? This is the result of too many dinners and too much flattery. Never mind, Adrian; whenever you find your palate cloyed by an over-dose of compliments, come to me and I will administer correctives. I can pick plenty of holes in 'Two Lovers,' let me tell you."

Such is the perversity of human nature that Adrian no sooner noticed a disposition on his friend's part to shirk the delicate subject that we know of, than he himself began to wish to introduce it. It was not natural to him to keep his distresses to himself; moreover, he had some hope that Heriot had abstained from condemning him out of sheer inability to do so. So he said, "I don't mean that. I can swallow a fair quantity of compliments without feeling sick, and I don't get any more than I can manage. But sometimes I doubt whether it was wise to take up our abode in London. I think, perhaps, we should have been happier down in Cornwall, after all. That is, I think my wife would have been happier."

"People who have been born and bred in the country naturally long for fresh air after they have been several months in a large town," remarked Heriot.

"Yes; but that isn't all. The fact of the matter is that Clare hates society and I like it. Well, of course, if one were living on a Cornish moor, one would adapt one's self to circumstances, and there would be an end of it; but I can't live like a hermit in London. I don't think it ought to be expected of me that I should."

Heriot said nothing at all, which was rather provoking, and it was in a somewhat more aggrieved tone that Adrian went on: "I know you understand how things are. It isn't pleasant to be received with black looks after one has talked for ten minutes to a woman who is not even young or pretty; it isn't pleasant to be suspected and distrusted. I make every allowance for difference of temperament and all that; still, it isn't pleasant. And it seems to me that I should be quite wrong to give in for the sake of a quiet life. You, at all events, will believe that I would gladly give up many of my own pleasures to please Clare. I haven't changed towards her, though in some ways she has changed a little towards me. But the truth is that she wants what it is impossible that she should have—at any rate, so long as we live in London. She really is not reasonable. Of course, I wouldn't say this to anyone but you."

"Do you know," observed Heriot, quietly, "I think you would do more wisely not to say it even to me."

"Very well," answered Adrian, a good deal affronted; "I won't do it again, then. I thought perhaps you might be able to help me out a little, and you used to be willing enough to do that, when you were asked; but no doubt you are quite right to snub me. It is bad form to talk about one's wife."

"It won't do, Adrian," returned Heriot, laughing good-humouredly. "I decline to be inveigled into the absurd position of a mediator between two people who must understand each other better than I can understand either of them. Your quarrel—if it can be called a quarrel—seems to me perfectly ridiculous. I suppose the quarrels of lovers always do seem so to outsiders, and it would be easy enough to give you excellent advice, if one did not know that it would be superfluous. You and Clare can make friends again whenever you choose to do so, and I imagine that you will choose before you are much older. Anyhow, I wish you both to remain friends with me, and therefore I shall not say anything to either of you that I don't want repeated to the other."

This cavalier way of dismissing the subject did not impose upon Adrian, who was too familiar with Heriot's face and voice to be deceived as to the anxiety which it was intended to conceal. But he did not insist upon plainer speaking, and only remarked, after keeping silence for a short time: "I'm glad you don't blame me, at any rate."

"Oh, but I never said that," returned Heriot. "If you want to know what I think of you, I haven't the slightest objection to telling you that I consider you an ass. You ought to know better than to require a woman to be reasonable, and you certainly must know that, whatever other women may be or do, your wife doesn't carry unreasonableness to the pitch of wishing you to renounce all society."

This being exactly what Adrian believed that Clare did wish, the question of whether he was more or less of an ass than Heriot gave him credit for being seemed to remain open; but he did not care to bring the point forward; nor did he think it worth while to mention, as he had intended doing for a moment, the alarm that he had been caused by Susan Bowman's reappearance. He went away soon afterwards, admitting to himself that Heriot had probably been right in refusing to meddle between husband and wife, yet feeling a little sore that he had been denied the sympathy which his friend had never before failed to extend to him.

Sympathy was, in fact, to Adrian Vidal very much what an ancient coin was to his father-in-law. He could make shift to do without it at a pinch; but he could not deny himself the solace of it, if it was to be had anywhere within reach; and when the customary sources failed him, he was fain to seek what he required in Grosvenor-square. With Lady St. Austell's habits, opinions, and general conception of life, he had no more sympathy than she had with his; but there were certain minor points as to which they were in complete agreement; and, besides, it was pleasant to be smiled upon and made much of.

"So you are going down to Polruth again," she said to him one afternoon. She was sipping a cup of tea and was equipped for the Park; for the hour was approaching when she, like most other ladies, felt it incumbent upon her to take part in that daily parade which they would find so intolerable if it were made compulsory. Beyond the open window behind her were banks of flowers; the lowered sunblinds made the light subdued; and in the coolness and fragrance of the room, in the ceaseless roll of the carriages outside, even in the aspect of the well-dressed, well-preserved woman who sat opposite to him, the jewels on her plump white hands flashing as she raised her tea-cup, Adrian found something that at the same time soothed and excited his senses. In truth, the atmosphere of London was as delightful to him as the atmosphere of the country is to some other people.

"So you are going down to Polruth again," she repeated—"dear old sleepy Polruth! How will you like that?"

"I liked it very well last year," Adrian answered.

"Ah, last year was—last year. I can understand that you enjoyed yourself very much then; but one ought never to go back to places where one has enjoyed one's self; and to go back with the partner of one's former joys—after having actually married her too!"—— Lady St. Austell shook her head gravely. "I should think it would be dreadfully depressing," she remarked presently.

Adrian had reasons for thinking that it very possibly might be; but he did not feel inclined to state them, or to claim Lady St. Austell's sympathy with regard to this particular matter. "Shall you be in Cornwall in the course of the summer?" he asked; and, feeling that her presence in the vicinity of Polruth would be far from an unqualified boon, he was rather glad to hear her reply: "Not this year, I believe. We are to go to Scotland rather earlier than usual, and after that we shall have to be in Hertfordshire until the hunting begins. That is the worst of having so many houses. One is obliged to live in them more or less, and the consequence is that one really lives nowhere, and one never lay one's hand upon anything that one wants."

"I don't think I should object to eighty thousand a year, all the same," remarked Vidal. "Or is it a hundred thousand?"

"I don't know what it is," answered Lady St. Austell. "Of course one would a great deal rather be rich than poor; but the provoking thing about money is that it seems as if it ought to give you everything, and yet, after a certain point, it only gives you the same things as your neighbours have, but on a rather larger scale. I can quite enter into the feelings of Matthew Arnold's sick king in Bokhara, who had wealth and fame, and all the rest of it, but could not even save a beggar from being stoned to death. What is the use of being such a magnificent person if one can't do what one wants or have what one wants?"

"What is the especial thing that you want?" Vidal inquired.

Lady St. Austell sighed plaintively. "Ah, so many things!—and all of them especial things, too! But it's no use thinking about them. One thing I want, which ought not to be impossible. I want you to come and stay with us in Scotland. Are you fond of shooting? If you are, you will be able to amuse yourself all day: and then perhaps you will take pity upon me; and amuse me a little in the evening."

"Thanks; it's very kind of you," began Vidal, hesitatingly.

"Now, I know what you are going to say," interrupted Lady St. Austell; "your wife won't let you leave her. Well, she can come too, if she likes. I am sure I shall be delighted to see her. So will Lord St. Austell," she added, with a little titter, of which the significance escaped her hearer.

"You are extremely kind," said Adrian again.

"And you are more than extremely foolish," retorted Lady St. Austell, who was not fond of being thwarted. "Why do you allow yourself to be so cruelly hen-pecked?"

"It isn't exactly that," Adrian said.

"Oh, but I assure you it is exactly that, and you won't find it a bit the less inconvenient for being called by another name. Really, I have no patience with women like Mrs. Vidal! I don't say it to annoy you, you know; but it is a fact that I have taken some trouble to be polite to her, and have had nothing but rudeness in return. As far as I am concerned, she is perfectly welcome to be rude; only I do most sincerely pity you. Without vanity, I may say for myself that I am rather more good-natured than most people; and if she goes on like this she will very soon deprive you of all your friends. I should like to have her here for five minutes to tell her what I think of her!"

Adrian opened his mouth; but whether he was going to undertake his wife's defence or to apologise for her ingratitude will never be known; for he had not yet got out a word when the door was thrown open and "Mrs. and Miss Vidal" were announced.

It was certainly a piece of rather bad luck that Clare should have selected this afternoon of all others for paying the call which she owed after Lady St. Austell's garden party, and it was also bad luck that Georgina, who wanted to see the inside of the house, should have persuaded her to come in, instead of leaving cards at the door. The moment of her entrance was an awkward one for everybody. Even Lady St. Austell was a little thrown off her balance by this speedy fulfilment of the wish that she had just uttered, and felt no inclination to take advantage of the opportunity thus afforded her for speaking home truths; while Adrian, who had jumped up from his chair, stood smiling foolishly, and looking a great deal more conscious of having been caught than so seasoned a man of the world had any business to do.

Clare, as a general thing, had far less self-command than either of the other two; but she now remained perfectly composed, surprising her husband, and compelling the respect of a lady who respected but few things. She stayed for about ten minutes, making conversation, somewhat stiffly, but without apparent effort, and exchanging cold civilities with Lady St. Austell, who had of course shaken off her momentary embarrassment, but who probably judged the occasion inopportune for renewing that invitation to Scotland which Adrian had already declined on his wife's behalf. To him Clare did not address a word until she rose to go, when she turned to him and asked, "Are you coming with us?" That question admitted of but one reply; so Adrian presently found himself descending the staircase behind his wife and sister, looking—and knowing that he looked—extremely like a schoolboy who has been pounced upon by his master when out of bounds, and is being led back for punishment.

He was not in an observant frame of mind; otherwise he might possibly have noticed a red baize door, giving access to the back stairs, which was cautiously opened an inch or two as he passed. Behind that door might have been seen the exultant countenance of Miss Susan Bowman, who was rubbing her hands softly, and who laughed aloud when the three visitors had disappeared. This was indeed a treat! Susan required nobody to tell her that the meeting between Mr. Vidal and his wife had been unpremeditated on both sides, and, having noticed the expression of their respective countenances as they passed her post of observation, she had little difficulty in picturing to herself the sort of interview which would be likely to take place between them on their return home.

"Oh, my dear friend and benefactor," she murmured, what an evening you are going to have! I shouldn't wonder if you had been telling a few little innocent lies of late about the number of times you have been to see her ladyship, and I shouldn't wonder if you had to confess the lot of them. Tears?—bless you, yes! you'll get plenty of them; and you're not partial to tears, you know. You'll have to make some promises, too, and then you'll break them, and then you'll be found out again; and so it will go on till you wish you were dead. That wife of yours has got a nice, soft, pretty face of her own; but there was a look upon it just now which makes me suspect that she can scratch as well as purr—and she'll let you find it out to-night, unless I'm very much mistaken."

But Susan was mistaken, as it happened; and although Mrs. Vidal did indeed find it necessary to request a private interview with her husband that evening, Lady St. Austell's name was not mentioned in the course of it, and it was she, not he, who found it a painful one.

When Clare followed Adrian into his study, after the rest of the household had retired to bed, and began: "Adrian, I have something to speak to you about," he groaned in spirit, fearing the worst; and nothing could have exceeded his relief when it turned out that all she had to say was that she was at the end of her resources and that the household expenditure could no longer by any possibility be kept within the limits assigned to it some months before. He did not in the least realise what it cost her to make this avowal; he was far from imagining that, in order to avoid making it sooner, she had deprived herself of every personal luxury that could be dispensed with, and that to her somewhat disordered fancy it appeared as though by admitting her failure to accomplish her duty as a housewife, she were in some sort condoning the offence which he, on his side, had committed against her.

"Why didn't you tell me this before?" he asked, unlocking the drawer of his writing-table and taking out all the loose cash that he had by him. "Of course, an extra person being in the house must make a difference, and one can't dine one's friends for nothing. We'll have a supplementary vote now and increase the estimates for the future. What shall we put it at? Half as much again? All right; and if that isn't enough, you must let me know. I can always make up a deficit by a little extra work."

This was certainly a liberal way of doing things; for Adrian's coffers were by no means overflowing, and he thought that his wife would at least reward him with a few words of thanks. But she did nothing of the kind. She only gathered up the money, remarking, "I am sorry to have been such a bad manager," and moved towards the door.

Adrian let her go. It seemed to him that she made an almost imperceptible halt upon the threshold, as if she thought he might be going to call her back, and, indeed, he was more than half inclined to do so. But he resisted the weakness. What would be the good, he thought, of entering upon explanations which would certainly not be held satisfactory and listening to reproaches of which he could not admit the justice? Time and change of scene would do their work, he hoped; and it was better to trust to such old-established remedies than to the doubtful one of a scene, followed by a possible treaty of peace.

CHAPTER XXI.

A CRUEL CALUMNY.

Heriot was a poor sleeper at the best of times; and when anything occurred to disturb or perplex him after ten o'clock in the evening his chances of rest before daybreak were small indeed. The brief conversation which he had held with Adrian upon the subject of the latter's domestic troubles had worried him a good deal more than he had chosen to show; and when he had read a book in bed until his head ached, without inducing the faintest sensation of drowsiness, he blew out his candle, and resigned himself to the fact that he was going to have a night of it. This being by no means his first experience of the kind, he did not count up to ten thousand, or try to see an endless flock of sheep leaping over a stile, or adopt any other of the futile remedies by means of which some people, similarly circumstanced, are wont to goad themselves to the verge of insanity, but lay patiently on the flat of his back, like a sensible man, and reflected.

And this, among other things, was what he said to himself: "It's rather a hard case when a man can do nothing for his two best friends, except hold his tongue. Here are these silly people drifting apart, thinking evil of one another, and doing all they know to build up a wall between themselves which may gradually reach such a height that they will never see each other again—and all about nothing! Half a dozen words would set the whole stupid misunderstanding straight; only it isn't by me that they can be spoken. I was right to shut Adrian up; he has a strong case, and it wouldn't do to argue it with him. As for Clare, she has next to no case at all; so that argument with her would be even more hopeless. The best thing that could happen to them would be to have a downright quarrel; but I'm afraid it won't come to that, and if I interfere they will both quarrel with me, as sure as this is a world of fools. Evidently, there's nothing for it but to stand on the brink and watch them sinking or swimming, as the case may be."

But such a philosophical course of action was hardly within the compass of one whose heart was softer than his head, and Heriot felt that there was a hope—a rather forlorn one, it was true, still a hope—that he might to some extent benefit, by means of speech, those whom he desired to serve. No one knew better than he did that the real source of their trouble lay in total dissimilarity of character, and that if it had not appeared in this direction, it would assuredly have done so, sooner or later, in that; but just as there are certain latent maladies which can only be arrested when they manifest themselves in a specific form, so it seemed possible that something might be done for this estranged couple by removing what was at all events the ostensible cause of their disagreement. Of course, it was not certain that such a removal could be effected; but Lady St. Austell, like many other selfish people, was extremely good-natured, and if it were represented to her that she was bringing a vast amount of unhappiness upon others with very little prospect of counterbalancing advantage to herself, she would be quite as likely as not to give Adrian his congé, and appoint some more suitable young man to take his place.

So Heriot thought he would make the attempt. An attack of illness, which was the penalty that he invariably paid for fidgetting himself overmuch about any matter, prevented him from giving effect to his resolution for some days; but, as soon as he was able to go out again, he betook himself to Grosvenor-square, and arrived there, as it chanced, just after Adrian and Clare had escaped from the comfortless visit of ceremony described in the last chapter. Lady St. Austell's carriage was at the door; but, after Heriot had been kept waiting a few minutes, he was told that she would receive him, and she interrupted his apologies by declaring that she would much rather talk to him than go out for a drive.

"I am only thankful that you didn't come in five minutes ago," she said. "If you had, I should certainly have burst out laughing, and then I don't know what would have happened. I do wish people wouldn't have such foolish wives!"

"Whose husband have you been qualifying to match his wife in that respect?" asked Heriot.

"Oh, nobody's. If that poor Mrs. Vidal only knew what a perfectly harmless, and indeed improving thing platonic affection is, I am sure she would be a far happier woman."

"Not a doubt of it; but we must have patience with the dulness of humanity and forgive those who are not yet educated up to our standard. So it is Mrs. Vidal who has been behaving foolishly?"

"I can't quite say that. No; she behaved wonderfully well, considering. She was very freezing; but she was not rude. I imagine, though, that she doesn't allow her husband even to pay calls without her, for I never saw anyone look so utterly dumbfoundered as he did when she was announced. Oddly enough, we had just been talking about her, and as I was telling him in a friendly way how idiotic it was of him to let himself be ridden over roughshod by her, in she walked, accompanied by that grenadier of a woman who, I am told, scampers about the Cannibal Islands without any clothes on during the greater part of the year."

"Really, I think there must have been a trifling exaggeration about that report," said Heriot.

"Perhaps so; it doesn't much signify. She was quite clothed to-day, and I presume she was in her right mind; though why she should have planted herself before me, with her hands on her knees, and stared at me as if I were some new kind of savage I don't know."

"Open-mouthed admiration," said Heriot. "It couldn't have been anything else, you know."

"Well, whatever it was, it was rather embarrassing. And I think these good people might understand that I am not so desperately eager to cultivate them, after all. Mr. Vidal is all very well, and I am always delighted to see him; but I don't know whether I was quite right in trying to take up his wife. I only did it out of pure benevolence, and I certainly never expected her to put on airs with me. It is just a little bit impertinent. Don't you think so yourself?"

"Oh, I shouldn't submit to it for a single moment," answered Heriot; "I can't think why you do. These Vidals evidently don't know their proper place, and ought to be put back into it without delay. The next time he comes, you had better give him to understand as much, and then he won't come any more."

Lady St. Austell sniffed meditatively at her gold-mounted bottle of smelling-salts.

"H-m-m! But you see, I should miss him, poor fellow! He really is very nice."

"You don't say so! Has he actually succeeded in touching your heart, in spite of the inferiority of rank to which you are so alive?"

"Oh, that was you; I never said anything about their inferiority. No; I don't know that he has exactly touched my heart, as you call it, yet: but I fancy that if we saw more of each other we might perhaps arrive at—an understanding.

But it is never any use to talk about things of this kind with you, because you have no more feeling than a stock or a stone."

"You will allow that I am capable of friendship, however," Heriot began.

But he was prevented from explaining what bearing this alleged capacity of his had upon the matter under discussion by the entrance of no less a person than Lord St. Austell himself. That Lord St. Austell should enter his wife's drawing-room before dinner was quite an event. He very seldom acted in that way without some special reason, and the moment that Lady St. Austell, who stood considerably in awe of him, saw the grin upon his features, she felt sure that he had come to torment her—as indeed he had.

"I trust I am not indiscreet," said he, peeping into the semi-darkness which had now fallen upon the room. "Oh, it's only Mr. Heriot; I thought, perhaps, it might be somebody else. Mr. Heriot don't count, does he? He is something like me, out of the running. Ah, well! we shall all three be laid on the shelf soon—very soon."

"You don't generally behave as if you considered yourself shelved," retorted Lady St. Austell, out of whom innuendoes of this description never failed to get a rise. "It is a pity you didn't come in a little earlier. You would have seen that pretty Mrs. Vidal whom you admire so much."

"Then I'm very sorry I didn't come in a little earlier," responded his lordship. "I admire Mrs. Vidal immensely—almost as much as you admire her husband. But then I am so careful; I keep my admiration within bounds; I wouldn't compromise a lady for the world. Whereas you, I am afraid, really did rather compromise a lady—yourself, I mean—at Richmond the other day. Did I tell you what the Grand-Duchess of Saxe-Tugendheim said about you? She asked me whether what she had heard was true, and that you were very emancipirt. I wonder what she could have meant! Perhaps Mr. Heriot, who has been so much abroad, can enlighten us. I answered her Serene Highness that I really didn't know, but that I thought, if you had ever been afflicted in that way, you must have outgrown it. At what age does a woman generally cease to be emancipirt, Mr. Heriot?"

Heriot, who did not like Lord St. Austell, took no notice of the question; but Lady St. Austell, as her husband was very well aware, had a great dread of being looked upon coldly by high personages, and showed signs of uneasiness. "Some wretch must have been saying horrid things about me!" she exclaimed. "I can't think what you mean by my having compromised myself that day. I was particularly careful to do nothing of the kind."

"It seemed to me that you were," agreed her tormentor. "Didn't you break down a little towards the end of the day, though? It struck me that you became rather conspicuously invisible, and that your friend the author followed suit—all except his boots; I saw his boots."

"But that was after the Grand Duchess had left."

"So it was; and of course that made a difference. Still, the wretches who tell tales remained. You can't escape the eyes of these malevolent gossips, even when you are out of sight; and the mischief of it is that they laugh at you. One doesn't mind being accused of wickedness, and one can stand being called emancipirt—especially if one doesn't know what it means. But to be sniggered at by Tom, Dick, and Harry is not pleasant. I really almost think I should throw the author over, if I were you."

That ironical tone always alarmed Lady St. Austell. "Do you wish me to drop Mr. Vidal?" she asked, quite humbly.

"I? Oh, dear no! pray don't mind me. Nothing delights me more than to see you amused and making the most of your time; and, as I was saying just now, we can none of us hope to remain young much longer. All I would venture to suggest to you, in your own interest, is that you should not take up with newspaper men. They're not to be trusted. Now, here," continued Lord St. Austell, producing with evident relish the new number of the Anglo-Saxon—"here is a paper for which I believe your friend Mr. Vidal is partly responsible, and just see what he has the impudence to say about you."

Lady St. Austell took the paper and read the following paragraph, which formed one of a series of items headed "Social Scraps":—

"The evergreen wife of a well-known and highly-respected sporting peer was made the subject of some rather severe strictures by one of the Royal guests whom she had the honour of entertaining not long since. 'On devrait savoir vieillir,' and other audible remarks to the like effect, cannot have been very agreeable hearing for a lady who is popularly credited with having solved the problem of making the clock stand still."

"It isn't meant for me," gasped poor Lady St. Austell; "it's meant for Lady Glastonbury."

But her lord shook his head and grinned more than ever. He had come in for the express purpose of showing his wife this cruel paragraph, and the effect of it upon her was all that he had hoped it would be. "I fear," said he, "that there can't be any doubt as to who is meant. Lady Glastonbury, you know, is a widow, and the reference to myself is unmistakable. 'A well-known sporting peer'—I am certainly that; and I believe I may add that I am also highly respected. You, apparently, are not. You're only 'evergreen,' and some uncertainty seems to be felt as to the appropriateness of even that epithet. Too bad, upon my word, the way newspapers are conducted nowadays! I should have thought Mr. Pilkington would have been above publishing such scurrility; but nothing is sacred to a newspaper man. You have warmed a Vidal in your bosom (figuratively speaking), and he has rewarded you after the usual fashion of those reptiles. Well, I must be going now. Don't let this distress you. Il n'y a que la vérité qui blesse, you know, and of course these insinuations are palpably false."

And with that parting shot Lord St. Austell decamped gleefully.

The Court of Common Council have resolved to place a bust of General Gordon in the Guildhall.

The Corporation of Southampton have agreed to lend to the Dock Company, for the purpose of providing deeper water accommodation for the port, £220,000, receiving as interest and redemption £8800 a year for sixty years.

We understand that the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of London and Middlesex have consented to open a Bazaar and Art Exhibition, at the Vestry-Hall, Hampstead, on the 23rd inst., in aid of the Hampstead Home, Hospital, and Nursing Institute. The Lady Mayoress, Mrs. O. E. Coope, and other ladies are patrons of the Bazaar.

The Board of Trade have awarded a binocular glass to Mr. Philip L. Ferguson, the master of the ship Hudson, of St. John, New Brunswick, in recognition of his humanity in standing by the barque Minnie Gray, of Hull, which was abandoned at sea on Feb. 10 last, and sending a boat to the succour of the shipwrecked crew. The Board have also awarded an aneroid barometer to Mr. David Rickwell, the second mate of the Hudson, and £1 each to the four seamen who manned the boat in which the rescue was effected.

At the fourteenth annual festival dinner given last week in connection with the Railway Officers and Servants' Association subscriptions to the amount of £1973 were announced.

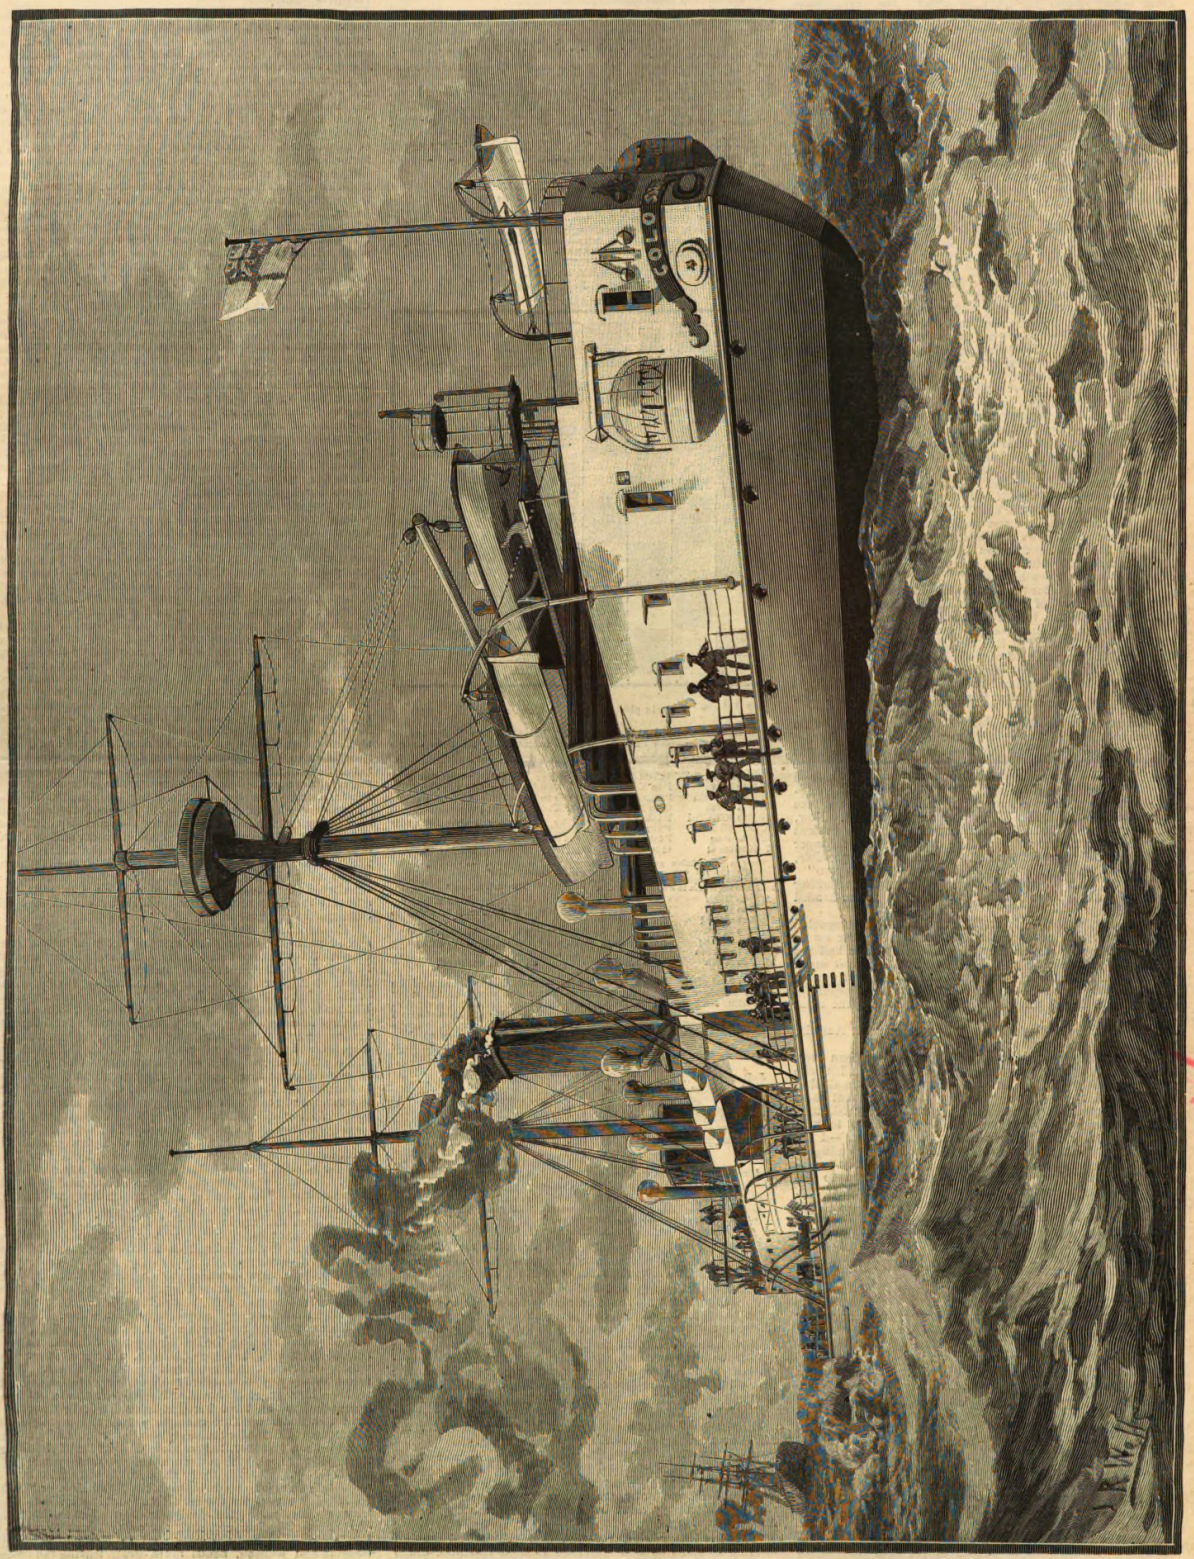
Lord Rosebery presided last week at the festival of the Hospital for Sick Children, and made an eloquent appeal for what he characterised as the great want of the age—viz., funds, in response to which over £1500 was subscribed.

Sir Austen H. Layard presided last week at a meeting in aid of the British Ophthalmic Hospital, Jerusalem, and remarked on the valuable character of the institution. Sir Richard Temple also addressed the meeting at some length.

A Volunteer Medical Staff Corps is about to be established, and official sanction has been given to the establishment of additional batteries of Artillery and new companies for the Rifle Corps connected with the Volunteer Forces.

A special map of Afghanistan and the adjacent countries has been published by Mr. T. R. Johnston, of Edinburgh, having on the same sheet maps of Europe, Asia, South-Western Asia, and India, and with notes explanatory of the whole question at present before the public relating to the Afghan boundary.

The Lord Chancellor presided over the annual general meeting of the City and Guilds of London Institute, which was held last week at the Mercers' Hall. In moving the adoption of the report, his Lordship expressed a hope that the spirit of liberality which had actuated the Corporation and City Guilds to do the great work which they had done would move them, as far as the means under their command allowed, to do whatever might be needful to ensure the complete success and the satisfactory development of their work.



HERAT, WESTERN AFGHANISTAN.

The capital of Western Afghanistan, the city of Herat, though now in a decayed and squalid condition, was anciently reckoned one of the most splendid cities in Asia. Its position, nearly midway between the Caspian Sea and the Indus, and in the central point of the old routes of commerce from Persia, India, and the Turkoman kingdom of Bokhara, once commanded a lucrative commerce. It was, at that time, the capital of Khorassan, which in the thirteenth or fourteenth century became subject to the Tartar monarchy. But the antiquity of Herat is far more remote; the valley of the Heri-Rud was probably one of the earliest seats of civilisation. Ethnological theory, indeed, traces the Aryan race, the assumed progenitors of the European nations, of the Persians, and of the inhabitants of Upper India, to the region marked on the map by the Paropamisus range of mountains, the Koh-i-Baba and Safed Koh, between Balkh (the ancient Bactria) and Herat. This is precisely the region now likely to become the subject of dispute between the Russian Empire and the British Protectorate of Afghanistan. Although no practical importance can be ascribed to such a view, it has some historical or archæological interest. The name of the Heri-Rud, the river of Herat, is plausibly derived from the original root-syllable identical in Latin, English, Sanscrit, Persian, and many other languages, which signifies a "ploughman," and which was the race-appellation of the Aryan, sometimes called the Caucasian part of mankind. Agriculture flourished on the banks of this river from time immemorial, when all the vast plains of Central and Western Asia were occupied by pastoral tribes; settled cultivators of the soil may have existed here before those in Chaldea, though not expressly mentioned in the Bible.

Herat was visited by Alexander of Macedon, in the year 327 B.C., on his conquering path from Persia to Bactria, before he invaded the Punjaub; it is described by Arrian as "the city of Artacoana, the capital of the nation of Arcians," who were subject to the Persian King. It was included in the Greek-Bactrian kingdom. In the first century of Mohammedanism, which falls in the seventh century of the Christian era, the whole of Khorassan, with part of Turkestan, came under the dominion of Bokhara. The commercial prosperity of Herat began at that period, and was maintained during the Middle Ages, under successive foreign dynasties, those of the Seljukian Turks in the eleventh century, and the Sultans of Khiva, till in the thirteenth century the Tartar Genghis Khan twice stormed and plundered this rich city, killing a vast multitude of its people. Notwithstanding this calamity, Herat, gaining a degree of semi-independence, and ruled by the native Princes of Ghor, still contrived to flourish in the breaking up of the Turkish monarchies of Central Asia. The writings of Persian and Arabian travellers describe its stately palaces and mosques, a Nestorian Christian church, famous colleges of learning, hospitals, public baths, delightful gardens, manufactories, markets, bridges, aqueducts, gates, and towers of defence; all which were seen and admired in 1506 by the Emperor Baber, who describes them in his journal. Mercantile industry, with the fertility and skilful cultivation of the land, watered by copious artificial irrigation, produced these signs of wealth; and, under the Tartar dynasty founded in 1381 by Tamerlane, Herat was the seat of viceregal government for all the provinces south of the Oxus, including a great part of Persia. The reigns of the Emperors Shah Rokh and Hussein Mirza, in the fifteenth century, and that of Baber, the founder of the Mogul Empire in India, were very propitious to the welfare of this great city. The population, of mixed Persian and Turkish race, seem to have readily accommodated themselves to any regular and pacific government. In 1510 their Turkish masters were overthrown by the warlike Ishmail, Shah of Persia, a zealot for the Shiah sect of Mussulmans, who persecuted the Sunnis of Herat, and punished their religious contumacy by erecting and favouring the rival city of Meshed. Herat was thus deprived of its Persian trade, and gradually declined in importance with the decay of the Turkish States north of the Oxus. In 1717 it was seized by the Afghans, a nation of rude barbarian highlanders, whose tyranny and rapacity have reduced Herat, as well as Candahar, from affluence to misery and obscurity, effacing the work of a high comparative civilisation.

The Afghans, who call themselves by the name of Pukhtun, and claim to be descendants of Saul, King of Israel, and a branch of the Jewish nation carried into Babylonian captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, constitute two thirds of the existing population of Afghanistan. Nearly a million of the inhabitants of the plains, especially in the western districts, are Tajiks and Kizilbashis, of Persian Khorassan, with some Turkoman admixture, and are a peaceable, orderly, industrious kind of folk; there are also the Jats, the Hindkis (Hindoo traders), the Hazara mountaineers, and some pastoral tribes of Tartar or Turkoman race. But the Afghans, who despise all trade and industry, devoting their energies to war, though incessantly divided by factions, have long been the provinces, Cabul, Candahar, and Herat, separately or in conjunction, during most part of two centuries past. Attempts have been made by Persia, doubtless with the secret connivance of Russia, to reconquer Herat, and have been opposed by the British Government of India. Nadir Shah captured the city in 1731, but it was retaken by Ahmed Khan, founder of the Durani reigning family of Afghanistan, in 1749. It was besieged by the Persians in 1837 and 1838, when it was defended ten months, with extraordinary valour, skill, and success, by a young English officer, Eldred Pottinger. In 1856, Herat was again captured by the Persians, after an obstinate siege; but this led to war between England and Persia; and the war, carried on in the Persian Gulf, forced the Shah to give up the city in July, 1857. The people of Herat were always unwilling to be ruled by the Ameer of Cabul. They were governed by another Afghan Prince, one of a rival house, till 1863, when Dost Mohammed, near the end of his life, besieged and conquered the city. It may be within our readers' recollection that, so lately as 1880, in our last Afghan War, after the British capture of Cabul, one of the sons of Shere Ali, the deposed Ameer, a Prince whose name was Ayoub Khan, made himself master of Herat. Ayoub raised an army there, marched to Candahar, defeating a British force on his way, at Maiwand or Kushk-i-Nakhud; but finally succumbed to the force brought from Cabul by General Sir Frederick Roberts. This example proves the great political importance of Herat for the safety of other parts of Afghanistan.

It is time, however, to give some description of the city and its neighbourhood, with reference to the present apprehensions for its safety. Herat is finely situated, in a broad valley extending from east to west, between the Safed Koh, or "White Mountain" range, and the Siah Koh, the "Black Mountains," where the Heri river (Heri-Rud) flows down from the highlands of Hazara. The lower part of the valley opens towards the Persian frontier; and the main road to Meshed, passing by Ghorian and Kuhsan, bends north-west, leaving the river at Kuhsan, the frontier town of Afghanistan. A Russian army which could traverse the Persian territory would easily march to Herat by that road. The hill country north of Herat affords more defensible positions, but can be traversed by several passes from Badghis, the region north of the Safed Koh, between the Heri-Rud and the Murghab, where the Russians have now intruded. There is the Robat Pass, through the Barkhut hills, to Kuhsan, the entrance to which, at Ak Robat, has actually been seized by them; the Chesmeh-Subz, lately described in our Special Artist's letter; and the Ardewan and other roads over the Kaito hills, from the head of the Kushk valley, leading immediately to Herat. It was to cover or to watch these roads that Sir Peter Lumsden recently moved his camp to Gurlin, which place is in the middle between the Kushk river and the Barkhut hills, about ninety miles north of Herat. The eastern part of Badghis, along the Kushk and Murghab rivers, was formerly a populous and thriving district, with the great road of traffic from Herat to Merv, Bokhara, and Samarcand, in one direction, and to Maimene, Balkh, and the Upper Oxus farther east. Ancient towns, of which our Artist saw the desolate remains at Chaman-i-Bed, at Kala-i-Maur, at Ak Tapa, at Penjdeh, at Maruchak, and at Karaoul Khaneh, sprang up in connection with the great commercial and metropolitan city of Turkish Khorassan. They are now reduced to fragments of walls, heaps of potsherds, and the "Tapas," square mounds which may have been the base of their citadels; around which the nomad tribes of Sarik Turkomans pitch their kibitkas, and pasture their flocks and herds.

Herat itself is still a city, and might again be made a prosperous city, under any regular and tolerable Government. It stands in a plain sixteen miles wide, four miles from the mountains on the north side and twelve miles from those to the south. This strip of plain is richly cultivated by the aid of numerous streams of water formed in artificial channels; villages, corn-fields, vineyards, orchards, and gardens cover its space; the river, two or three miles south of the town, is crossed by a brick bridge of thirty arches. The town is built in a quadrangle, 1600 yards long and 1400 yards broad, inclosed by walls 25 ft. or 30 ft. high, with thirty bastions on each face, rising from the top of a ridge or mound of earth which averages 40 ft. in height, with a moat inside and outside, which can speedily be filled with water. On the north side, within the walls, is a mound upon which stands the citadel, with massive towers of burnt brick, and there is an outwork defending the northern gate. The citadel is surrounded by a moat and rampart. The town is divided into four quarters by straight lines of bazaars, streets partially covered with brick arches, and occupied by shops, meeting in the centre at the Charsue, or "Four Streets," as this place is called, which is marked by a high dome; and here is the Charbagh, the Governor's Palace, which is more like a barrack. The lesser side streets are mere narrow alleys, dirty and wretched, with a crowded population, though large spaces are deserted. The houses mostly have domed roofs, and are two storeys in height. The city was reckoned in 1830 to have 45,000 or 50,000 inhabitants; but there has been a great falling off, and later estimates are under 20,000. It has some manufactures of silk yarn, leather, fur cloaks and caps, metal, earthenware, and beautiful carpets. The mines of iron, lead, and silver, in the neighbouring mountains, are now almost neglected. The townspeople are a motley mixture—Tajiks, Aimaks, Turkomans, Persians, Jamsheedies, Hindoos, Tartars, and Jews, with Afghans strutting about fiercely, each carrying a whole armoury of guns, pistols, swords and daggers stuck round his body. The principal mosque, the Musjid-i-Juma, built in the thirteenth century, is in a ruinous state, but must have been very magnificent, being 465 ft. long and 275 ft. wide, with six doors, 130 windows, and 414 pillars, and with costly decorations, long ago stripped off, sculpture, gilding, and mosaics of precious stones. Outside the city, a mile to the north, on the mound or hillock of the Mosulla, are the ruins of a vast and beautiful edifice, the mosque and sepulchre of Sultan Hussein Mirza Bairam, who died in 1498. It had twenty minarets, four of which are yet seen at a distance by the traveller approaching Herat; the buildings surround a court one hundred yards square, with cloisters, the walls of which are adorned with exquisite mosaics of floral and various fantastic designs; beyond is a large circular hall surmounted by a dome, lined with blue and gilt glazed tiles; and there are other grand apartments. Nearer to the town is another mound, the Thal-i-berghi, which was thrown up by Nadir Shah for his siege battery when he attacked Herat in 1731. There are five city gates, which have memorable associations with important events in Persian, Turkish, Tartar, and Afghan history. The past glories of Herat may be exaggerated, but it is quite probable that about the end of the twelfth century, when London had its first Lord Mayor, Herat was a much greater city than London. It then contained "twelve thousand retail shops, six thousand public baths, caravanserais, and water-mills, three hundred and fifty colleges, schools, and monastic institutions, a hundred and forty-four thousand inhabited houses; and was regularly visited by caravans from all parts of Asia."

Herat is distant from Merv, by way of Sarakhs and the Heri-Rud, nearly 220 miles, and about the same distance from Meshed, the present Persian capital of Khorassan. The distance to Candahar is 369 miles, by a tolerably easy route, through Subzewar and Furrah, and crossing the Helmund at Girishk, the place to which the British troops advanced in the campaign of 1880. We shall have a railway completed, in the year after next, from India to the verge of the plain of Candahar, passing by the British frontier military station of Quetta; but Russia will probably by that time have extended her railway from the Caspian to Sarakhs, or even to Merv, and the facilities of access to Herat would then be about equal. The military possession of Herat, or the establishment of a protectorate in case of an insurrection there against the Ameer of Cabul, would undoubtedly give Russia the means of obtaining a predominant influence in Afghanistan, which could only be checked by securing British influence at Candahar; but there would be no necessity for direct annexation. The turbulent, factious, and fanatical disposition of the Afghans has in all ages made them very undesirable subjects. It is far better policy to rely on their spirit of independence and warlike habits, and encourage them to resist foreign aggression on their cherished freedom, which they have defended against the mightiest of Asiatic Empires. At the same time, they may be persuaded to allow the peaceful work of civilisation and commerce to go on, much to their own profit, among the quiet and industrious population of Southern and Western Afghanistan. If only peace could be secured, laying aside schemes of political ambition, the railway might be prolonged to Candahar, and thence possibly to Herat; bringing great benefit not only to those provinces, but to the whole of Central Asia; while India and England would gain their due share of the reward in a considerable increase of trade.

THE GREAT HIGHWAY OF CENTRAL ASIA.

Mr. Simpson, our Special Artist with the Afghan Boundary Commission, while travelling in October last from Teheran eastward to the banks of the Heri-Rud and the Murghab, observed with much interest the condition of the northern part of the Persian dominions, and the once flourishing province of Khorassan, of which Meshed is the present capital. As we have remarked in our account of Herat, those countries of Central Asia, including the old Turkish Kingdoms of Bokhara and Khiva, and Samarcand, the ancient Tartar capital, were formerly much more populous and wealthy than is now apparent from any visible signs except the remains of stately buildings in their chief cities. The desolating inroads of wild Turkoman tribes, following the overthrow of the great monarchies of the olden time by their tremendous wars against each other, have thrown much of those territories out of cultivation. The commerce which once flowed regularly to and fro between the East and the West, and from beyond the Oxus and beyond the Indus, bringing the products of China and India to Ispahan and other splendid Persian cities, or to Bagdad and Aleppo, on the way to Europe, has taken another direction. At the same time, there is no fear, in the present age, that a Genghis Khan or a Tamerlane will again lead the ferocious hordes of Northern Asia along the westward route to threaten the borders of civilisation; the conquests of the Russian Empire march from west to east. Our Artist, riding with Sir Peter Lumsden's Staff, day after day for about five weeks, from Teheran to Sarakhs, had leisure to contemplate the altered state of "the Great Highway of Central Asia." He writes, concerning this route of his long journey, "A European unaccustomed to the East might consider that it had no claim to be called a road, for it has almost none of the characteristics of western highways. It is only a track formed by the traffic of at least two thousand years. At regular intervals there are serais, which are large buildings where travellers with their animals and merchandise can find safe shelter and accommodation. The road is the same now as it was in Alexander's time; at least, the changes are but small. Mud has been the building material here from the earliest period, and the villages could not be very different: they bear a strong family resemblance to much that is seen in the Assyrian sculptures. The camel has continued to be the beast of burden, and will be so till the road is made passable for wheeled vehicles, or till the railway comes, which it is sure to do sooner or later. It is said that the Arabs like to march during the day. The Turks and Persians, on the contrary, prefer the night. On our way we find that kafilas or caravans begin the march as the sun sets, and reach their serai next morning. The pilgrims, as a rule, do the same. As we start on our early march before daylight, we meet pilgrims and long flocks of camels just coming into the place we left. On this account, I have treated the Illustration as a moonlight scene—and it thus represents exactly what we have seen morning after morning on the march—and have introduced a party of pilgrims to Meshed, going the opposite way to the camels. The camel-drivers will call out to the pilgrims, as they do to us, to ask a blessing for them at Meshed, and the pilgrims answer that, if spared, they will do so. In the background is a Persian village—its gate will be securely shut, and the people all asleep; in the foreground is one of the shelter-towers which are scattered all round every village."

H.M.S. COLOSSUS.

Every serviceable addition of new ships to our Navy, in spite of the perplexing controversies of scientific and nautical experts about the floating and fighting capabilities of some recently constructed, must be hailed with satisfaction by the anxious British public. We present an Illustration of the Colossus, a steel ship, armour-plated with 18 inches thickness of armour, carrying four 42-ton guns in two turrets and four 6-inch guns, resembling the Inflexible in her general arrangement. The Colossus is the first steel ship built in Portsmouth Dockyard, where her keel was laid down in June, 1879; she is now in the reserve division at Portland. The dimensions of this ship are, length between perpendiculars, 325 ft.; extreme breadth, 68 ft.; draught of water, 25 ft. 9 in.; displacement, 9150 tons. Her engines are of 6000 indicated horse power, and she carries 950 tons of coal. The complement of officers and men is 345. The Majestic, built at Pembroke, is a sister ship to the Colossus.

Mr. Carlos Cooper, barrister on the Norfolk Circuit and Recorder of Thetford, has been appointed Recorder of Lynn.

Mr. Elliot Stock, of 62, Paternoster-row, has published fac-similes of the first editions of "The Pilgrim's Progress," Herbert's "Temple," and the "Compleat Angler." These volumes are excellently printed, and are issued at a low price.

An unavoidable delay in the publication of the fifty-third annual edition of "Dod's Parliamentary Companion," which has just been issued, has enabled the editor to bring up the information to a very recent date, and to give on an extra leaf the results of the latest elections.

The annual benefit performance of the Royal General Theatrical Fund took place at Drury-Lane Theatre, by permission of Mr. Augustus Harris, on Thursday week. In accordance with the invariable custom on these occasions, the programme consisted of a sort of theatrical pot-pourri, in order to enable the largest possible number of actors and actresses to lend a helping hand to a charity which has such special claims upon their encouragement and support. The theatre was well filled in every part.

Sir William V. Harcourt, M.P., on Thursday week in Westminster Hall, presented to Police-Constable Cole the Albert Medal bestowed on him by the Queen for his courage in carrying the parcel of dynamite from the crypt at Westminster into the hall. Over 700 of the Metropolitan Police and some members of Parliament were present. Having warmly eulogised the conduct of Serjeant Cox, as well as Serjeant Cole, the Home Secretary called from the ranks Serjeants Garner and Snell, and commended their courage in the capture of burglars at Shoreditch. He then made some general remarks on the Metropolitan Police, praising its discipline and efficiency, and asserting that, as a protector of order and as a defender of life and property, it was a force which had no superior, and perhaps no equal, in the world.

QUETTA, THE MOST ADVANCED BRITISH MILITARY STATION TOWARDS AFGHANISTAN.

THE BOLAN PASS TO AFGHANISTAN: TAKING GUNS ACROSS THE BOLAN RIVER.

FROM SKETCHES BY LIEUTENANT C. M. GONNE, R.A.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

Aix-les-Bains, whither the Queen has gone for her health, is, as Lord Macaulay's favourite "fifth-form schoolboy" could tell us, the oldest of the Roman colonies planted in Gaul, as Marseilles is of the Greek, if indeed the Phoceans were true Greeks. It is remarkable that Aix-les-Bains should have preserved to this day the reputation which, as Aquæ Sextiæ, it had for mineral waters, when it was first colonised by the Romans; for those waters are said to have "gone off" very much even in the days of the Emperor Augustus. There is the better chance, therefore, that Leamington, which has been making great efforts to come into fashion again, and Bath may some day regain their old prestige. But then the heavenly situation of Aix-les-Bains!

Easter time is still devoted, as it always has been, to pleasure taking; but, happily, the people in these days take their pleasures in a more orderly fashion than formerly. There is doubtless room for improvement still, but the grossness and cruelty common during the last century would not now be tolerated. Bull-baiting was then fashionable, and even statesmen patronised the sport; ponds used for hunting ducks with dogs were common round London; prize-fighting attracted all ranks of the people. Cock-fighting was highly popular, and, worse still, cock-throwing, a sport that consisted in tying a cock to a stake as a mark for sticks. Some of the gentry of the day followed other and worse amusements, which were practised all the year round. The club of Mohocks attacked passengers in the streets at night and committed the foulest cruelties. They thrust swords into the legs of their victims, flattened their noses, put respectable women into barrels and rolled them down the streets, and slit the noses of watchmen. This was sport in the eighteenth century. And the habits of the people corresponded with their amusements. Statesmen took to hard drinking without reproach, and among the poor the taste for gin spread like a pestilence. The brutality of the age may be seen in its penal laws, in the foul state of the prisons, in the treatment of lunatics, who were tied with chains and slept on straw, in the heads that figured on Temple Bar, in the disembowelling of traitors, in the punishment of the pillory, and in the flogging of women in the streets. No wonder that when the laws sanctioned by the State were brutal, the amusements of the people should be brutal also.

This week being Easter week, there is, as usual, a glut of horse-racing and steeplechasing from Monday to Saturday (both included), from Kempton Park in the South, to the Eglinton Hunt Meeting (Irvine) in the North, to say nothing of the Paris Spring Meeting in the Bois de Boulogne, across the "silver streak." The most interesting events hitherto have been the Prix du Cadran (at Paris), which Archiduc won in a canter from his only opponent, the sometime "nobbled" Fra Diavolo; the dead-heat (the second of the season), at Kempton Park, between Lyddington and Van Ayr on Monday; and the brilliant running of Ptolemy at the same place on the same day, though he was only second to Fireball, to whom, however, he conceded a year and nearly two stone and a half. The importance of Ptolemy's performance lies in the fact that he is a three-year-old in the same stable as Paradox, the present first favourite for the Two Thousand and Derby (bar Melton, perhaps, for the latter); and through him a "line" is obtained for measuring the capabilities of Paradox and Luminary.

The Thursday before Easter is called "Maunday" Thursday, supposed to be a corruption of "Mandate" Thursday, the day which was anciently termed "dies mandati" in Latin. What the "mandate" was, whether it applied to the institution of the Lord's Supper or to the "new commandment" given to the disciples on the day to which our present Thursday before Easter corresponds, is disputed; but the latter explanation appears to be the more generally received and to harmonise the better with the "washing of feet" and the giving of gifts observed on that day at various Christian Courts and elsewhere in Christendom.

According to his irate and impetuous countrymen, now he is no longer in power, the mistakes of M. Jules Ferry are legion. He considered the coal-mines of Kelung of such paramount value and importance that Admiral Courbet must occupy that place at once, coûte que coûte; but letters and despatches now declare that though coal is abundant at Kelung, it is worthless, or at all events not adapted for French steamers, so that the fleet off Formosa has to be supplied with South Wales coal, which by the time it reaches that distant port has cost at least £5 per ton. The suddenness with which this discovery has been made, however, militates against its authenticity.

About forty large historical portraits of great value were sold last week at the Hôtel Drouot, in Paris, and the manner in which they were collected is quite a romance. One day in 1855, M. Aragon, a well-known lawyer, received a visit from a lady, who announced herself as descended from a Royal house and very rich. She wished to know whether she could obtain a decree annulling her marriage, on the ground that her husband had deceived her as to the quarterings on his paternal escutcheon, but accepted M. Aragon's dictum that such a pretext for escaping from the marriage bond was futile, and would only expose her to ridicule. A few days afterwards she sent him, by way of fee, two full-length portraits of her kingly ancestors, which he hung up in his study and admired so much that he determined they should form the basis of a collection. With this object in view he traversed the highways and byways of Italy and Spain, and frequented the great sales, always in quest of portraits of kings and princes of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries. One of his first discoveries was that the portrait of a Dominican monk belonging to the Archbishop of Cambray was, in reality, one of Ferdinand I., Emperor of Germany in 1556. A very little cleaning revealed that one of the hands held a sceptre, and the other a crystal globe surmounted by a cross. The picture was first thought to be a Holbein, but proved to be by Porbus. Similar strokes of luck and much diligent search made M. Aragon the owner of portraits of Charles V., Cosmo de Medicis, Don Sebastian of Portugal, a Catharine de Medicis in a crimson robe, Marie Stuart in a white one, Isabella of Portugal, the mother of Charles le Téméraire, and a lovely Catharine de Cornaro. Among his acquisitions there was a Maurice of Nassau, clad in such a cuirass as can hardly be seen even in the Hôtel Cluny; and a pale dreamy-looking Philip II., dressed in black and painted by Sanchez Coello. Another remarkable purchase made by M. Aragon was of three portraits, by Rubens, of Henri Quatre, his wife, Marguerite de Valois, and their daughter, Isabella of Bourbon. Just before the death of the Comte de Chambord, a group of Legitimists wished to buy these three canvases by subscription and present them to him. Among the gems of the collection were portraits of Frederic the Wise, Elector of Saxony, and his wife, surrounded by their Court, painted on panels of wood, by Cranach, who was the faithful friend and follower of that Prince throughout all his changes of fortune.

The turf, both French and English, had losses to deplore last week. On the 1st inst. died M. A. Staub, owner of that good mare Stockholm (winner of the Goodwood Stakes, Goodwood Corinthian Plate, and the Queen's Plate at Lichfield last year), of Péripétie, winner of the French Oaks in 1869, of the once good horse Le Destrier, of Son Excellence, of Escogriffe, and other horses known by repute, if not by personal appearance, in this country, including Diaprée (engaged in the Epsom Oaks of this year, but not nominated by M. Staub); and on the 2nd inst., died Mr. R. R. Christophers, hon. secretary of Tattersall's, and sometime owner or part owner of Plebeian (winner of the Middle Park Plate, beating Galopin, in 1874), Madeira (second to Petrarch for the Middle Park Plate in 1875), and other notable animals, including an unnamed son of Plebeian and Madeira, who is thus disqualified this year for the Two Thousand, the Epsom Grand Prize, and the Doncaster St. Leger, &c., but is not engaged in the Derby.

Sun-dials have been replaced by clocks in the towers of most English churches, and the old-fashioned time-piece has too frequently been destroyed. A better fate, however, was reserved for the sun-dial from St. Mary's, Alverstoke, for it has been sent out to Stellenbosch, in South Africa, where it is set up on the north side of the church with an inscription giving its history. The date on it is 1749, the year of Goethe's birth, and the reason it has taken so long a journey is that the clergyman at Stellenbosch is an Alverstoke man, and asked the Rector if he could not give him a stone of the old parish church as a memento and link with the mother country.

Of course, public buildings must, like the humblest cottages, have their special cleaning days; and it is easy to understand that on such days the charwomen and scrubbers must not be incommoded by an influx of visitors. But some care should be taken to suit the wishes of the public, and not to close their galleries at the very season of the year when it is sure to be most convenient for them to attend. Yet, from April 2 until Easter Monday the National Gallery was closed. Many people take holidays in the week preceding Easter, and the Saturday before Easter Sunday has become, by tacit recognition, almost as general a holiday as the Monday following. With the additional attractions of the recently acquired pictures, the Trafalgar-square exhibition offered fresh enjoyments for pleasure-seekers. But a cleaning-out disappointed them; and it is difficult to understand why this should not have taken place a few days before or a few days after what must of necessity be the busiest time of the year. Let us hope that in future arrangements can be made encouraging to those who love to spend their leisure in the refining atmosphere of an art-gallery.

The interesting match for the championship at billiards was decided last week, and Mr. John Roberts, jun., "realised the stakes" of £200 and vindicated his right to be called, as well as considered, the champion, by making 3000 points, the number of the game, against Mr. W. Cook's 2908, thus winning, as he was expected to do, by 92 points. It was supposed that he would win by considerably more; but not only did Mr. W. Cook "play up" with indomitable pluck and rare skill, but there are a few other matters to be observed. Mr. Roberts was suffering from what is playfully known as a "game" leg, and may be said almost to have got up from a sick bed to meet his engagement, and, though you do not hold your cue with your foot, you do play billiards to a very considerable extent with your legs. A bad corn even, nothing worse, will make a vast difference in a man's play. Moreover, oddly enough, though Messrs. Roberts and Cook passed one another frequently in scoring, it is noteworthy that the former "came" whenever he was wanted, playing with a rapidity and decision that are all his own; made in one innings the greatest break (129) that has ever yet been made for a championship match on a championship table, and in another almost as many (126); and not only won the match but managed to be ahead, though only by a little, at the conclusion of the play on each of the three nights. Mr. Cook's highest break was 107; but he made his fifties, sixties, seventies, and even eighties, in a manner worthy of his old form. Mr. Roberts has now "beaten the record" once more. Mr. Cook, however, though vanquished, was not dismayed; and immediately issued another challenge for the championship. Another ex-champion, Mr. Joseph Bennett, has also challenged Mr. Roberts, who is, therefore, not to rest on his laurels, but is likely to have a lively time and "more worlds to conquer."

Horse-racing on the flat was confined last week to Nottingham, where nothing of much note took place, though the first "dead-heat" of the season was a little curious, because there were only two runners. Mr. R. Peck's "aged" horse, Poste Restante, carrying 10 st., ran a dead-heat, distance one mile, with Baron de Hirsch's three-year-old filly, Glimmer, carrying 8 st. 9 lb.; and the riders were that "par nobile fratrum," Messrs. F. Archer and J. Snowden, respectively. The race was for the Robin Hood Cup, and the dead-heat was not "run off," though the chances had been thought to be no less than 11 to 8 on the "old 'un."

Mr. Alfred De Rothschild is well known as the possessor of one of the finest collections of pictures, china, furniture, and faïence in the world. A portion of it he inherited from his father, but his own sound judgment, refined taste, and immense wealth have helped to the completion of a collection which may be described as wellnigh perfect, inasmuch as it includes magnificent representative specimens of every description of artistic bric-à-brac. The choicest pictures by Cuyp, Romney, Gainsborough, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Paul Potter, Greuze, Boucher, Watteau, Ruysdael, and other great masters; china of the most artistic periods, from Sèvres, Dresden, and Chelsea; Henri II. delft, Limoges enamels; furniture, designed by artists, and mounted by brass-workers with the delicate touch of Roman jewellers, are all to be found in profusion at Seamore Place and Halton. But, however grand a collection may be, its charms are enhanced by a full and descriptive catalogue. This Mr. De Rothschild has now compiled for presentation to his friends, and the book is worthy of the treasures it describes. Two quarto volumes, sumptuously bound in dark-blue morocco, emblazoned with his monogram, and containing photographs, with full and lucid descriptions, of the lovely objects, form a work which is at once a revelation to the art student, a vision to the bric-à-brac hunter, and a valuable édition de luxe for the drawing-room table of those who, like the writer of these lines, have been fortunate enough to have received one of Mr. Rothschild's rare and costly gifts.

A fine game is racquets, at which Oxford and Cambridge "tried conclusions" last week. In the double match, on the 31st ult. "best of seven games," at Prince's Club, Messrs. H. E. Crawley and L. Sanderson (both of Trinity College) won for Cambridge against Messrs. E. H. Buckland (New College) and J. H. B. Noble (Balliol College) for Oxford, by four games to two, making the total since the first year (1855), after which there was an interval of two years, sixteen for Cambridge against thirteen for Oxford. The single match, on the 1st inst., also at Prince's Club, "best of five games," was won "in a canter," as sporting people say, by Mr. H. E. Crawley (who was "facile princeps" of the four representatives) for Cambridge, winning three games running, and making, on the whole, since the first "single" match, in 1858, thirteen for Light Blue against fifteen for Dark Blue (who won ten years in succession, from 1869 to 1878, both included). Cambridge has now won the "double" game ten years in succession, from 1876 to 1885, both included. It is noticeable how excellence in cricket seems to combine with excellence in racquets, to judge from the names of Messrs. R. D. Walker, A. Lyttelton, Mitchell, Ivo Bligh, A. J. Webbe, C. T. Studd, and many another "quos scribere longum est."

In these days, when ladies particularly demand that their costumes shall possess some striking originality, every public occurrence of interest is looked to, to supply a novelty for dresses, bonnets, or jewellery. The wars that are progressing in Egypt and China have suggested the latest fashion in Paris. Bullets are now worn. Real or imitation bullets are eagerly sought for as buttons; while to carry the illusion further, and make all things match, swords and guns in miniature are the favourite brooches, hair-pins, and ornaments of the French fair sex. Even the most unwarlike ladies in the capital may be seen disporting themselves like living batteries of tiny armaments.

Captain Eyre Crabbe, an officer well known in Southampton and its neighbourhood, has written a few touching lines to the mother of a private in the Grenadier Guards, which must have made her heart swell with pride in spite of her sorrow. This soldier had been out skirmishing just before the battle of Abou Klea, but had returned safe to the square before the enemy charged. During that charge he fought bravely, joined in the cheer when it was over, and was in the very act of giving the man next him a drink from his own bottle when a stray bullet shot him straight in the heart, and he fell back into Captain Crabbe's arms. He drew the poor fellow back into the square and laid him down, but it was all over, and then turned round to his commanding officer and said, "I have lost my best lad!" The ready courage and unselfish kindness of the British soldier in the hour of battle are admirably exemplified in this drama of life and death.

A clever story has been recently published called "A Dog with a Bad Name"; but, according to a writer who has taken advantage of the holiday season to utter his jeremiad, all dogs ought to have a bad name with sensible people. It is terrible to be told that the cases of hydrophobia are innumerable, and a little startling to read that there is sufficient justification even for the extinction of this "friend of man." The plague of dogs is said to be spreading everywhere, and at seaside places "they are quite a terror." It is rather difficult to understand why, if everyone is afraid of dogs, there should be such a "disgusting mania" for keeping them, and a mania especially exhibited by women. Possibly "Cave canem," who lives under daily fear of a mad dog, would prefer encountering a mad bull. His dread, however, is no excuse for inaccuracy, and he may be reminded that it is not difficult to obtain the statistics of hydrophobia.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, and Prince Albert Victor Edward of Wales, arrived in Dublin on Wednesday. They travelled on Tuesday evening from London to Holyhead, taking leave of the Duke of Edinburgh, Princess Louise, and the Duke of Cambridge, at Euston Station; they stayed at Holyhead from midnight till half-past five in the morning, when they embarked on board the Royal yacht Osborne, and arrived soon after eleven in the forenoon at Kingstown, Dublin Bay. They were saluted by the guns of the Channel Squadron lying there. On landing at Kingstown, their Royal Highnesses were received by Earl Spencer, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and Countess Spencer; and an address of welcome from the Town Commissioners was presented to them. The train speedily conveyed them to Dublin, where a similar address was presented by the Chairman of the Citizens' Reception Committee, Mr. Richard Martin, in default of the City Corporation. The High Sheriff of the county of Dublin, Mr. E. C. Guinness, also read an address from the magistrates.

The reception of the Royal party at Dublin was enthusiastic. The Royal train arrived at Westland-row Terminus shortly before one o'clock. The station, which has recently been enlarged at a great expenditure, was very handsomely decorated. A platform, capable of accommodating about 600 people, was erected, and it may be interesting to state, as an indication of the desire of the people of Dublin to be present at the arrival of the Royal party, that as many as 10,000 applications were made for seats to the secretary of the company. It was found impossible, however, to accommodate more than the number above stated. Immediately on the arrival of the train at Westland-row the Royal party alighted amidst the most enthusiastic cheering, a military band playing the National Anthem. The presentation of the address from the Citizens' Committee was then proceeded with. A committee of the citizens representing all classes and various creeds was organised to welcome the Prince of Wales. Mr. Richard Martin, D.L., came forward and said:—"May it please your Royal Highness, as president of the Citizens' Reception Committee, who represent a vast number of our fellow citizens of all shades of opinion, I have the honour to present to your Royal Highness an address of cordial and respectful welcome to Dublin. The address was then read. That part of it which ventured to assure the Prince that it would be a great gratification to her Majesty's loyal subjects in Ireland if a permanent Royal residence should be established in the country, and if some member of the reigning House should see fit to make a home there, was rapturously received, and the Prince's reply was equally acclaimed. The Prince, in reply, said he would convey to the Queen their expressions of devotion and attachment. The furtherance of the welfare of all classes, his Royal Highness added, was an object dear to him, and he trusted that the efforts of the Commission on the Dwellings of the Poor would tend to their improvement. The kindness with which the citizens had received him encouraged him to look forward to his visit to a country where courtesy and hospitality were the characteristics of the people. The route of the Royal Party, escorted by a squadron of the 16th Lancers, was by Westland-row, Lincoln-place, Nassau-street, Grafton-street, College-Green, and Dame-street—that is, through the major part of the principal thoroughfares to the Castle. Wherever the carriages and four and Royal outriders appeared, the air rang with cheers.

In the afternoon the Prince and Princess, Prince Albert Victor, Lord and Lady Spencer, and suites, with the military escorts, proceeded to the Spring Cattle Show of the Royal Dublin Society, where many thousands of the élite of the county received them with unbounded enthusiasm. Here his Royal Highness replied to another address of welcome. While the address was being read by the noble President, the Duke of Leinster, the Princess of Wales and Lady Spencer stood up at the front of the Royal box, in full view of those present. The Prince and Princess remained for nearly two hours, during which time the prize cattle were exhibited before them; and subsequently they witnessed an interesting leaping competition, for which over one hundred horses were entered. This portion of the day's proceedings was of the most brilliant character.

The Royal party, followed shortly after by the Lord Lieutenant, returned to the Castle by a different route, receiving everywhere the warmest greetings.

In the evening there were illuminations and fireworks.

THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY QUESTION.

Lord Dufferin's conferences with the Ameer Abdurrahman at Rawul Pindi have been continued daily in private since our last. On Monday, a grand review of twenty thousand troops was held in presence of the Viceroy of India, the Ameer of Afghanistan, and the Duke of Connaught. In the evening Lord Dufferin entertained the Ameer at a State banquet, and the Ameer, when his health was toasted, made a speech, wishing prosperity to the British Government and to all who serve the Queen. On Wednesday, there was a ceremonious Durbar, and another military review. Military preparations are continued, and a contingent of fifteen thousand Ghoorkhas is offered by the Maharajah of Nepaul.

General Sir Peter Lumsden and the Boundary Commission are still in the border country north of Herat. A few of the Sketches by our Special Artist, Mr. W. Simpson, yet remain to be published. We have already mentioned the felt tents of the Turkomans, called by the Russians "kibitkas," which were used in the camp at Bala Murghab for the accommodation of the troops of the Indian escort. The process of erecting one of these "kibitkas" is illustrated by a Sketch in the present Number. The lower part is formed of a series of cross pieces of wood, fixed together, so that, like the action of a pair of scissors at each crossing, they can be extended or contracted at pleasure, according to the diameter required. This part, with the framework of the door, is first put up, and held together with belts made of wool. The crown of the tent has a circular piece of wood pierced with holes; into these holes are placed the ends of one or two long pieces of stick, and then the crown is erected, and held there by tying the lower end of the sticks to the top of the circular framework. Having fixed the crown with one or two of the sticks, sticks are then placed all round the tent, to support the roof. When this is done, the whole is covered with thick felts, which are strapped on with belts and ropes. A small piece of felt forms a hood to cover the crown; this can be moved by a rope, so as to make an opening on any side desired to let out the smoke or let in light.

QUETTA AND THE BOLAN PASS.

The military forces of British India, under General Sir Donald Stewart, Bart., G.C.B., Commander-in-Chief, are to be assembled with all speed at Quetta, the valuable frontier station among the mountains between Scinde and Candahar, in the Khelat region of Beloochistan. The British Government, some years ago, made an arrangement with the Khan of Khelat by which it acquired the occupation of Quetta, and has made it the centre of a military district, and head-quarters of a division of the Indian Army. It is approached from Scinde either by the Bolan Pass, or by the route of the railway now being constructed from Sibi through the Hurnai valley, and round the northern side of the Takatu range to the Pishin valley, terminating at the foot of the Gwaja Pass on the edge of the plain of Candahar. This railway, which will pass north of Quetta, about thirty miles distant, is not expected to be finished before the autumn of next year; and the Bolan Pass must therefore be used for the present movement of troops and stores. A temporary railway is now to be laid down in the Bolan Pass, from Pir Choki as far as Sir-i-Bolan, and from Darwaza to Quetta, but the gradients are too steep for a railroad the whole way. We are indebted to Lieutenant Gonne, R.A., for the Sketches of Quetta and the Bolan Pass. The town of Quetta, or Shal, stands in a valley some twenty miles long by five broad, almost entirely surrounded by lofty mountains. On the west rise the Chiltaltan and Meshalak ranges; on the north the Takatu hills; on the east and south-east are imposing mountain masses. The valley is open on the south and on the north-west between the northern limit of the Chiltaltan mountains; at the southern spurs of Takatu there is a gap four miles wide. Through this gap three important roads find their way into Quetta; the Hurnai road, north of the Takatu hills, winds through a succession of defiles in a south-easterly direction to Sibi, and so to India; the old high road is westward to Candahar; and the main road in the same direction across the northern spurs of the Meshalak range, by way of the Ghazaband Pass, which there gives access across these hills. To the north of the gap a difficult route leads, by way of the Murgha Pass, over the Takatu range to the Hurnai and old Candahar roads. The road through the Bolan Pass, leaving Quetta on the south, traverses the mountains on the south-east by the pass, and debouches on Sibi by Pir Choki and Dadur. Thus Sibi may be said to be the starting-point of the two great roads connecting Quetta with India.

The town is surrounded by a mud wall, with two gates, the southern and the eastern. A fort has been constructed on an artificial mound, from which an extensive view of the neighbouring valleys is obtained. Strategically, this place is of the greatest importance, being situated at a vital point on the southernmost route between India and Afghanistan. Its occupation secures the command of the Pishin valley, checks the unruly Bugti, Marri, and other tribes, keeps open the roads of the Khoja and Gwaja Passes over the Khoja Amran range, and facilitates a rapid advance on Candahar.

It was Quetta which formed the base of operations of the Southern column during the Afghan campaign of 1878-80, and it was from Quetta that the British troops advanced to Candahar, which they occupied after only a faint resistance. The valley of Quetta is between five and six thousand feet above the sea, and in summer the climate is pleasant, the heat being tempered by cool breezes from the hills. In winter there is considerable cold. Some years ago it was computed that the town contained about four thousand inhabitants, most of whom were Afghans, but the population has since greatly increased. Quetta is 140 miles from Candahar, and nearly 400 miles from Herat.

The troops garrisoning the Quetta district, which includes the Bolan Pass and some places east of it, as well as the Pishin valley, are composed of regiments from the armies of the three Presidencies, although Madras is only represented by a single battalion. According to the latest returns of the distribution of the Anglo-Indian Army—supplemented by the force at that time employed on the Zhob Valley Expedition—the Bengal troops serving in the Quetta district were 906 British infantry, 5974 native infantry, and one battery of Royal Artillery, with 109 men. The Bombay troops were more numerous, consisting of 2133 British infantry and two batteries of Royal Artillery, with 219 men. The Bombay native troops numbered 4222 infantry, 624 cavalry, and one mountain battery, with 168 men. The Madras native regiment mustered 820 men. The Quetta division had, therefore, a total of 3039 British infantry, three batteries of Royal Artillery with 328 men, 11,016 native infantry, 624 native cavalry, and one battery of native artillery with 168 men. This gives a nominal grand total of 15,175 men and twenty-two guns (there being only four guns to the native battery), which may be taken as representing an efficient force of 14,500 men. But we had a considerable force actually in the field carrying on operations of war in the Zhob valley, and in addition to the 15,000 men already specified. That expedition consisted of 1259 British infantry, one English battery with 110 men, 3973 natives, and one native mountain battery with 167 men. The Madras army was represented by a contingent of 164 sappers. There were consequently in the Zhob valley 1369 English and 4304 native troops, including cavalry with ten guns, besides the large number already mentioned as stationed in the Quetta district. When the expedition returned, these 5673 men were, with the exception of some Bengal cavalry, distributed within the limits of the Quetta command and in Scinde. All the artillery was also retained, so that we have within the region between the plain of Scinde and the Khoja Amran range an army of more than 20,000 men with thirty-two guns. A very considerable part of this corps is stationed at different places in the Pishin valley, which is thirty miles nearer Candahar than Quetta; but, according to a quite recent statement, there were at Quetta alone 800 British infantry, 5000 native infantry, and 1200 native cavalry. To the Quetta division has also to be added the garrison of Scinde. This force, distributed between Kurrachee and Jacobabad, numbered, at the same time as the figures previously given relate to, 1428 British infantry, 3397 native infantry, 1015 native cavalry, and two batteries of Royal Artillery with 208 men. This gives an additional total of 6138 men and twelve guns. The Indian Government can therefore dispose of a force between the lower portion of the Indus and the Pishin valley of more than 26,000 men and forty-four guns; and of that army 6462 are Englishmen. The movements now in progress will show how easily this force might be increased.

The Bolan Pass, commencing on the Indian side at the edge of the Cutch Gundava Desert, at Dadur, a few miles west of Sibi, to which there is a railway open for traffic from Shikarpore on the Indus, ascends by a succession of narrow gorges and rocky defiles the valleys of the Bolan river for about fifty miles. The fall of this stream is exceedingly rapid, the difference of level in that distance being 3751 ft., and it is therefore liable to very sudden floods or freshets, which have often caused fatal accidents to travellers, and by one of which in 1841, a detachment of the Bengal army lost its baggage and forty-five men. In ordinary seasons the river is but shallow; the road formerly as rough as possible, over the round loose stones forming the bed of the river when full; but a good road for wheeled carriages has now been completed, frequently crossing the river. There is no bridge, and one of our Illustrations shows the difficulty of getting guns across the stream; another is that of the operation of blasting rocks to make the military road. At Drubbee and Kundi, not far from the lower entrance to the pass, it expands into small inclosed basins, surrounded by hills 500 ft. or 600 ft. high; it thence turns due north, and becomes very steep; higher up, at Kista and at Beebi Nani, there are wider openings, and a road from the latter place strikes off due west to Khelat. The road on to Quetta, in a north-westerly direction, rising high above the river, is more and more steep; and at Sir-i-Bolan, forty-five miles from the eastern entrance, is 4494 ft. above the sea-level. Ten miles farther, over the brow of the Hala mountain range, at an elevation of 5793 ft., it reaches the dreary table-land of the Dasht-i-Bedaulat, which extends to the hills overlooking Quetta. It must, in any case, and in spite of roadmaking improvement, be a laborious route for a military force encumbered with artillery and waggons; and it is to be regretted that the railway from Sibi to the Pishin valley, and thence down to the Candahar plain, designed and commenced some years ago by Sir Richard Temple, was not completed at the time. The cost of the present gathering of Indian forces at Quetta would have been considerably lessened if that railway had now been available, instead of the Bolan Pass.

THE EASTER VOLUNTEER REVIEW.

The annual review and field manœuvres of the Volunteer Corps of London and the Home District took place on Easter Monday, in fine weather, and with the usual success. At Brighton, nearly twenty thousand Volunteers were assembled, forming three divisions—the first commanded by Major-General the Hon. W. Fielding, the second by Major-General Sir Drury Lowe, and the third by Major-General Gipps. The first two divisions consisted each of two brigades, and there were three brigades of the third division. The commanders of brigades were Colonel A. C. Hamilton, R.E., Colonel Panter, Colonel J. S. Hand, Colonel Gordon Ives, Colonel G. H. Moncrieff (Scots Guards), Colonel G. R. Fitzroy (Coldstream Guards), and Colonel Lord Bury. The Duke of Cambridge inspected the troops, and saw them march past the flag and salute, on the White Hawk Hill, near the Brighton race-course; after which they executed the manœuvres of a battle on the ground to the north-east, between the Falmer Hill and Newmarket Hill. The attacking force numbered 11,500 men, being composed of the first and second divisions, and was under the command of Major-General R. White; it began operations from the northern slope of Falmer Hill, and its object was to prevent the opposing force, which was imagined to be that of an army invading England by the Sussex coast, and having landed at Newhaven, from getting possession of the town of Brighton. Major-General Monck commanded this hostile force, which numbered only the 7300 men of the third division, but which was much superior in artillery, and which held a most advantageous position on Newmarket Hill. The action began at two o'clock with a movement of General White's right wing round the south-west extremity of the Falmer Ridge, in order to cross the valley and get hold of Upper Bevendean. This object was achieved, cutting off the enemy from Brighton. On the other hand, General Monck sent down part of his force, supported by his powerful batteries, to check the movement of Colonel Ives' brigade, forming the left wing of General White's army, across the rising ground at the north-eastern or upper end of the valley. By this means General Monck protected himself against being cut off from his base of operations at Newhaven, while he succeeded in maintaining his position on Newmarket Hill. The engagement lasted two hours, with no other result than has been described. The bugles sounded "Cease firing!" and the troops halted on the ground they occupied, while the umpires rode over the field to examine how they stood, and to report to his Royal Highness the Field-Marshal Commander-in-Chief. The troops afterwards marched back to the Level at Brighton, from which they had marched out at half-past nine in the morning, and the trains began, at six in the evening, to convey most of the Volunteers home to London. Some battalions had left town on Good Friday, and passed the night at Cuckfield and Lindfield and other villages near the Hayward's-heath railway station, while others came by the Horsham road; and on Saturday, in the march on to Brighton, there was some interesting opposition in their manœuvres to counteract each other's approach to the rising ground near Ditchling, and to the slope of the South Downs on the Lewes and Brighton road. This was, perhaps, as a military exercise, the most useful and instructive part of the whole series of operations.

At Dover, in like manner, but on a smaller scale, four thousand Volunteers, mostly Kentish, but with several London corps joining them, and with detachments of cavalry and infantry from the regular troops in garrison at Dover, Walmer, and Canterbury, all under the command of Major-General the Hon. P. R. B. Fielding, performed the manœuvres of attack and defence of a position at Guston, almost under the guns of Fort Burgoyne, on the road from Dover to Deal and to Canterbury. The forces were about equally divided, Colonel Goodenough commanding the attack and Colonel Tredennick the defence; but the latter was stronger in field artillery, and was protected by the fort, so that the attack was finally repulsed. The march past took place on the drill-ground in front of Fort Burgoyne.

At Aldershott, two Volunteer Corps, the 11th and 21st Middlesex, were combined with the regular troops of that camp, under General Luard, in a smart little action on the Fox Hills. At Sheerness, the 2nd Kent Artillery Volunteers, from Woolwich, who were occupying the fort at Garrison Point, had some good firing practice at the targets moored 2200 yards and 2500 yards from the shore, under the direction of Lieutenant-Colonel Hughes. At Portsmouth, the 3rd Hants Rifle Volunteers, under Colonel W. H. Sayer, about seven hundred strong, divided into two opposing forces, executed some manœuvres in the country towards Petersfield; and the 1st Hants Artillery, under Colonel Godfrey Twiss, had a field-day on the downs near Finchdean.

FIGHTING IN AFGHANISTAN.

A Reuter's telegram from St. Petersburg on Thursday states that General Komoroff attacked the fortified position of the Afghans on both banks of the Khushk River on the 30th ult. An engagement ensued, and the Afghans, whose force consisted of 4000 men, with eight guns, were defeated and dispersed with the loss of about 500 killed, the whole of their artillery, two standards, the entire camp, with the park of artillery and provisions.

The Russians lost one Turkoman officer, killed; Colonel Nikschitsch and three subaltern officers were wounded. Of the Cossacks and Turkoman soldiers ten were killed and twenty-nine wounded.

THE LATE QUARTERMASTER C. EASTMEAD.
KILLED IN THE SOUDAN.

MAJOR F. M. WARDROP,
3RD (PRINCE OF WALES'S) DRAGOON GUARDS.

THE LATE CAPTAIN F. J. ROMILLY, R.E.,

BRITISH OFFICERS IN THE SOUDAN.

Among the personal acts of gallantry during the late campaign in the Soudan, one which attracted public notice was that of Major Wardrop, accompanied by three or four troopers of the 19th Hussars, on Feb. 13, during the retreat of the British force, under Sir Redvers Buller, from their abandoned camp at Gakdul, near Metammeh, to the Wells of Abou Klea. It will be remembered that, when the encumbered march of the troops and convoy was harassed and threatened with attack by large bodies of the enemy, reckoned altogether to number about five thousand, these four or five British horsemen boldly rode out through the bushes and among the hillocks which afforded a little cover, and turned upon the nearest approaching masses of Arabs, making them believe that a formidable cavalry force was about to charge them, with such effect that they desisted from immediately molesting the march of Sir Redvers Buller. Major F. M. Wardrop, of the 3rd (Prince of Wales's) Dragoon Guards, was attached to the General's Staff, and had previously rendered good service in the Intelligence Department, in the advance from Korti across the Bayuda Desert.

The other Portraits this week are those of two officers whose deaths are to be regretted among those killed in the more recent engagements near Souakim, under Sir Gerald Graham; Captain Romilly fell in the defence of the zereba on Sunday, March 22, and Quartermaster Eastmead in a skirmish on the next day.

Captain Francis J. Romilly, of the Royal Engineers, was eldest son of Mr. George T. Romilly, and grandson of the late Lieutenant-Colonel Romilly, R.E. He was born March 10, 1849, obtained his commission and passed out of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich in July, 1870. He went to India, and joined the Madras Public Works Department in 1873; in 1879 he was ordered to Bangalore, and was employed on special work in the autumn of 1881. He was stationed at Tranquebar, Tanjore, Negapatam, and Coimbatore. At the time of the first Egyptian Campaign, in 1882, he volunteered for service with the Queen's Own Madras Sappers; but, enough officers being available, his services were not required. In February, 1885, he was ordered to join the Madras Sappers and Miners, who form part of the Indian Contingent in the Soudan. They started from Bangalore on Feb. 24, and arrived at Souakim on March 13. Captain Romilly was killed while superintending the construction of General Sir John McNeill's zereba on the 22nd ult. He had married a daughter of Mr. Dennis de Berdt Hovell, of Boreham Holt, Elstree, Hertfordshire. We learn that Captain Romilly was greatly esteemed for his high professional acquirements, and his geniality and kindliness made him generally popular. He leaves a widow and three young children.

Quartermaster Charles Eastmead, who was killed in action on the next day, was one of the very few non-commissioned officers of the Royal Engineers promoted from the ranks. He enlisted in the Army in 1857, and served as a Sapper throughout the Indian Mutiny campaign, including the siege operations at Lucknow, and also through the New Zealand campaign of 1863-4. As Sergeant-Major, R.E., he was well known in the Chatham garrison. He was promoted to a commission as Sub-Assistant Commissionary in the Ordnance Store Department, in March, 1878, and was made Quartermaster in the same year.

Mr. Dunn, the Chief Constructor of the Navy, inspected several large Atlantic steamers at Liverpool yesterday week, and decided upon the details of their armaments as cruisers.

Lord Rosebery, who was the principal speaker at the annual meeting of the National Reform Union at Manchester last week, advocated the establishment of an English trading company for the development of the Soudan. As to Afghanistan, the Government had good hopes of a peaceful solution, but they were prepared to defend our honour and interests.

Mr. Ouless, R.A., has painted a memorial portrait of Sir Edward Baines, the cost being 600 guineas; and last week it was formally handed to Sir Edward, who has for two generations been connected with Leeds. The recipient of the portrait has attained the age of eighty-five years, and has rendered good service in connection with the Yorkshire College and the Yorkshire Union of the Mechanics' Institutes. The portrait is to be placed in the Mayor's Parlour at the Leeds Townhall.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

The advance of Lieutenant-General Sir Gerald Graham, with eight thousand of his troops, from Souakim to Tamai, on Wednesday last week, did not lead to a battle. Osman Digna's force, at the approach of the British, retired from Tamai to Tamanieb. Our troops occupied Tamai on Thursday; but there was little water, and that of bad quality, the wells having been purposely filled up or polluted by the enemy. Sir Gerald Graham advanced only two or three miles farther, to Teselah Hill, north-east of Tamai; but there was no sign of the enemy, who seems inclined to avoid a decisive engagement. On Friday afternoon the troops began their return march, under General Fremantle, and next day arrived at the camp near Souakim. All operations in the direction of Tamai, to the south of Souakim, are for the present abandoned, and the whole force is now concentrated between Souakim and Handoub, to the west, for the purpose of covering the construction of the railway by Messrs. Lucas and Aird's navvies. The railway works will be pushed on as fast as the climate and the supply of material will permit. It was expected this week that part of the troops would advance, under the personal command of General Graham, to occupy Handoub. The force would consist of the Coldstreams, the Australians, and a squadron of General Hudson's Indian Cavalry; and in their absence, their position at the first zereba would be taken by the Scots Guards. There is great disappointment among the troops at the change in the enemy's tactics, and at the prospect of an indefinite guerrilla warfare.

Our Special Artist with Sir Gerald Graham's army at Souakim, Mr. Walter Paget, has sent us his first Sketches. Those engraved and published this week represent incidents of the first actual fighting performed by that force, on Friday, March 20, in the reconnaissance near the village of Hasheen, about six miles west of Souakim, beyond the old zereba constructed by Baker Pasha last year. Hasheen is in a plain surrounded by the hills, and covered with tall mimosa-bushes. General Graham, with the greater part of his force, advanced to this place, leaving the Surrey Regiment in Baker's zereba, with guns in the neighbouring redoubt. He found the enemy swarming over the hills. They were attacked by the Royal Marines, the Berkshire Regiment, and the Sikhs, and were driven off the hill south of Hasheen, but managed to regain it; and the Bengal Lancers were then ordered to charge them. A small party of the Arabs, directed by an old sheikh on a camel, waving his spear and shouting, got round the Indian Cavalry, and crept under the horses, cutting and hamstringing their legs. The Bengal troopers lost four or five of their men, and had to retreat, pursued by the enemy to the number of nearly four thousand, of whom eight hundred were riflemen. But here they encountered the Brigade of Guards, drawn up in a compact square, which met them with a steady fire within twenty yards, while it fell slowly back, to give the Bengal Lancers an opportunity of reforming and charging again. It was at this time that Captain Dalison, of the Guards, was killed. Meanwhile, to the right of the British position, where new redoubts were being constructed, another large party of the Arabs descended from the hills on the north side of the plain; when the 5th Lancers, 20th Hussars, Mounted Infantry, and a troop of the Indian Lancers swooped down upon them and almost exterminated the band, most of them being shot down by the carbines of the cavalry, who swept over them as they lay on the ground endeavouring to cut at the horses' legs. Only seven of the whole body made their escape. This work was not performed without loss: two officers of the 5th Lancers were severely wounded, while a Sergeant-Major and four privates were killed. While this brilliant charge was being made, the artillery opened a heavy fire upon two large bodies of the enemy, of which one, some two thousand strong, was retreating in front, while the other, of double that strength, was on the left rear of the British, having arrived on the scene of action from Tamai. At one o'clock the Second Brigade and the Indian Infantry were ordered to fall back on the Guards, and at two o'clock the whole force began their march back towards the hill occupied by the 70th Regiment. The Indian Brigade this time formed the advance. They were followed by the 46th and Marines, while the Guards, still in square, with the Artillery, ambulance, and transport in their centre, brought up the rear. The position was by no means a pleasant one, for the enemy swarmed around us, and the square, encumbered with its impedimenta, had to fight its way over ground covered with dense bush, the Arabs closing in on all sides, but chiefly in the rear and left flank. For half an hour the Scots Fusiliers and Coldstreams had to endure a very heavy fire from the almost invisible enemy, halting every two hundred yards to fire volleys into the scrub. Having reached the first ridge, where the 70th had now completed the redoubts and zerebas, a halt was made for lunch. The soldiers were much exhausted after marching and fighting for nine hours and a half under the blazing sun, and a long halt was given them before they started on their return to camp. The new zerebas and redoubts were left to be finished by the Royal Engineers, and guarded by the Indian troops and others, who were suddenly attacked on the following Sunday, March 22, and suffered considerable loss in defending the place.

EDUCATION.

Yesterday week the annual conference of the Midland Counties Sunday School Association was opened at Coventry, delegates being present from Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Walsall, Worcester, Nuneaton, and many other places. Alderman White, of Birmingham, presided. Mr. Edward Towers, of the London Sunday School Union, read a paper on Recreations and their Influence on Sunday School Work, and a discussion followed. In the afternoon the conference was continued; and in the evening a public meeting was held, Mr. Thomas Lee, M.P., the Rev. Guiness Rogers, and others delivering addresses.

At Norwich on Monday was held the annual conference of the National Union of Elementary Teachers. The president (Mr. R. Wild) gave an address strongly condemning the system of payment by results. The annual report of the executive was received and adopted; the treasurer's report and balance-sheet were also approved. On Tuesday the subject of the training of teachers was discussed, and the question was left open for another year.

Mr. O. V. Morgan opened on Monday the eighth annual Sunday Scholars' Exhibition, in the Basnet-grove Board School, Lavender-hill, Battersea, held "for the encouragement of skill and industry during leisure hours."

The weather on Good Friday, though cold, was bright and sunny, and the holiday was largely taken advantage of.—The Easter Monday Bank Holiday was enjoyed by an enormous number of persons in London, with milder weather and an absence of the cutting winds of the previous days. The various places of entertainment and the public institutions were crowded, while there was no lack of recreation in the parks and open spaces.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

The oldest playgoer cannot recall an Easter so rich in novelties of every description. Times must indeed have changed when this season of the year does not produce a single burlesque or extravaganza—Easter pieces they used to be called—and finds "Passion Week" dedicated to the theatre almost wholly devoted to drama, comedy, and farce.

"THE LAST CHANCE."

Let me take the drama first, and turn your attention to the Adelphi, where Mr. George R. Sims reigns supreme, and is gradually obtaining a stronghold which is wellnigh impregnable. "The Last Chance" is one of the most curious plays that I have ever witnessed, for it convinces the spectator in spite of himself. It is a play constructed on an entirely novel principle; its story is neither very interesting nor very clear; there is little call on the assistance of actor or actress; the attention is distracted from the main purpose of the play by an excess of detail unconnected with the story; and yet the individuality of the author is so assertive throughout his work that he carries along this stupendous achievement on his broad shoulders to success. The author, the stage-manager, and the scene-painter appear to have put their heads together and to have built up a play that could be independent even of such clever artists as Mr. Charles Warner, Mr. James Fernandez, Miss Louise Moodie, and Miss Mary Rorke, and might rely for its success on the unexampled skill of Mr. Sims in swift character-painting and on an enormous managerial outlay in beautiful scenery and elaborate mechanical effects. When people talk of the new Adelphi play they will not allude to Mr. Warner as the young fellow who, unjustly cast out of his inheritance, is reduced to beggary, and dug wages at the London Docks; they will not pay much attention to the Russian adventuress, Miss Louise Moodie, who queens it over everybody until she is "hunted down" by a Polish spy she had sold to slavery; they will pass by with little interest the depressed heroine who goes mad for no apparent purpose, and is found dying in the snow, no one exactly knows why; but when they come to the character-sketches and realistic tableaux introduced by Mr. Sims their tongues will be loosened, and they will have plenty to say. The walls of London will soon be placarded with pictures of the wretched labourers waiting to be hired at the dock gates; enormous posters will whet the appetites of the expectant playgoer, showing the luckless hero being smashed down into the hold of a merchant-vessel by a bale that has slipped off a crane; the intending tourist during the spring and summer months will have his daily ride to town on the knifeboard of the omnibus cheered by peeps at Haddon Hall, and the delightful Derbyshire district represented with such faithfulness on the stage of the Adelphi Theatre; but no pictures or posters will be able to convey any idea of the bright and cheery fashion in which Mr. Sims acts as showman, and patches together the disjointed fragments of his disconnected tale. From the moment that the curtain rises until it falls there is no dull moment. When one pleasant character steps off, another one equally amusing steps on. The eye is always pleased; the mind is never fatigued. Whilst watching this drama by Mr. Sims, we are unconsciously reminded of his own contributions to contemporary journalism. He possesses the extraordinary faculty of saying in five lines what another could ill express in five pages. He can dash off a picture in a second that another would labour over for an hour. He can run on from abstruse politics to domestic economy without disturbing our sense of propriety. He is as interesting when he discusses Mr. Henry George arriving at Euston Station on a political mission, as when he is telling us how he buttons his boots or gets his shoes polished. A thin line of stars alone divides the partitions of this active and many-sided mind. He "dockets" his facts and "pigeon-holes" his fancy. The new drama is a play constructed on the same extraordinary plan. Its scenes and acts are divided but by a thin line of stars. It jumps from one interest to another just as Mr. Sims' paragraphs do. It is the "Mustard and Cress" of the stage, and will succeed only whilst this particular author signs it, for he has a strong personality, a wide influence, and has the hold upon his hearers that can only be gained by genius. For my own part, I do not think it would be well for the stage if all our plays were written after this pattern. I do not like to see the actor subordinate to the scenery, or the main motive obscured by detail. I prefer a telescope to a kaleidoscope. But for all that, "The Last Chance" has attraction in plenty for the thousands who are not critical but content. We meet on the stage of the Adelphi Theatre plenty of clever and amusing people; we see dozens of marvellous scenes; and, to put it even from the lowest point of view, we get plenty for our money. It may be that Mr. Sims will, by his own power, head a reform the end of which we do not see at present. He is as original and revolutionary as was Mr. Robertson in another branch of dramatic art; and, like Mr. Robertson, he is as dangerous as a guide. Plenty of writers tried their hands at Robertsonian comedy and failed, it would be as unsafe to construct dramas of the future on the model of "The Last Chance." Mr. Sims is the lynch-pin of modern realistic drama, and when that tumbles out we know pretty well what will happen. Meanwhile, London is provided with a new drama, and the Adelphi can advertise a fresh success. Critics may differ as to the interest of the play, but there can be no two opinions concerning the excellence of the panorama.

REVIVAL OF "THE SILVER KING."

And if one cared to note what varieties there can be in the style and character of modern drama, it is only necessary to journey as far as the Princess's Theatre, where Mr. Wilson Barrett has recently revived one of the very best plays of its class, "The Silver King," a play that owes its success to the clever collaboration of Mr. Herman and Mr. Henry A. Jones, a play that starts on one of the finest motives that has recently occurred to a dramatist in any country. For years past we have got our best dramas from France, but France has given us no play so good as "The Silver King." If she were wise she would take it, adapt it, and play it in preference to any "Théodora" that was ever written. "The Silver King" is, on the whole, far better acted now than it was at the outset. Mr. Barrett is as good as ever—intense in his passion and interesting in his pathos. Mr. Willard, if anything, better than ever. Miss Eastlake has improved her conception of the faithful Nellie Denver by innumerable graceful and artistic touches, and the addition of Miss Emmeline Ormsby to the cast is a very great gain. At these times, when laughter is often so forced, it is pleasant to find a play in which can occasionally be enjoyed the luxury of a "good cry." The pocket-handkerchiefs are freely used in "The Silver King," and the good, honest people are none the worse for a shower of tears.

"UNDER FIRE."

From drama we come to comedy. Great expectations had been formed of the new play written by Dr. Westland Marston for Mr. Thorne's company at the Vaudeville. The veteran dramatist is a charming writer, observant, shrewd, well-informed, and epigrammatic. He has also had the experience of a lifetime in connection with the stage. But, alas! his comedy seems as distasteful to the present age as the tragedy of Bulwer Lytton. They are both presented forty years too late. The multiplicity of theatres and the eager supply of new plays exhaust the only subjects that English dramatists can successfully treat, and the consequence is that Dr. Marston is, in a measure, forestalled by younger and more daring authors. Only recently, in Mr. Mark Quinton's "In His Power," we see what misery can be inflicted by the innocent suppression of a hidden passage in a woman's life. The woman who has married a man who idolises her does not care to tell him that she has been married before to a scoundrel who has deceived and deserted her, and is now levying black-mail on the strength of her secret. But after such a motive as this, the secret of the heroine in Dr. Marston's "Under Fire" is a very unsatisfactory and uninteresting one. All the harm she has done has been to sing at concerts for her daily bread and to be the unhappy daughter of a man who is a convict. On the strength of this skeleton in the lady's cupboard, a female friend also levies black-mail, hoping to get the lady of title turned out of society for her parent's misdeeds; and we actually see the humiliating spectacle of a mother going down on her knees to her daughter and imploring the child to embitter her existence with the man she does not love in order to save her mother from social ostracism. With such a heroine it is impossible to sympathise, for heroines of good plays should be irreproachable. Buzzing about this feeble candle-light of interest, we have various social moths who burn their poor wings, and merely make the candle gutter to no purpose. Miss Amy Roselle and Mrs. Canninge are cleverly contrasted in the best scene in the play—a sharp duel of words between two women of the world; but Mr. Thorne is not happily circumstanced as a rustic lover; and such clever actors as Mr. F. Archer, Mr. Charles Sugden, and others work very hard to no purpose. There is some admirable writing in the new play; but unless the audience catches on to the interest of a comedy, good writing goes for very little nowadays.

The determined spirit of Mrs. Langtry and her cheerful good-nature under a cloud of adverse circumstances have at last been rewarded. She has made a great and genuine success as Lady Ormonde in the well-worn play called "Peril." It is not strange that such should be the case; for it may be safely said that Lady Ormonde has never been so well played or understood before, never with such delicacy of handling, such finesse, and such a well-bred air. It is a most difficult character to interpret. There is danger of making Lady Ormonde too prudish or too meretricious. Mrs. Langtry avoids both extremes, and makes the wife of the English baronet a refined woman, who from mere carelessness plays with fire, and gets out of her scrape with as much modesty as tact. The opening comedy scenes of the play are charmingly acted, and Mrs. Langtry astonished everybody by her fine attack of the great scene, and by the wonderful "back fall" that astonished everyone in America. Mrs. Langtry well deserves her success, for she has smiled under adversity and determined to win her laurels in spite of fate. In many respects, the play has never been better acted. The Sir Woodbine Grafton of Mr. Beerbohm Tree is a revelation—a wonderfully amusing character-sketch that will bring the young actor a new chorus of praise. Ravel in his best days could do no better. And it would be difficult to find a better doctor than that admirable actor Mr. F. Everill. The cast gains by the good services of Mr. Coghlan in the character of Captain Bradford, and the play thus happily cast seems on the fair way for a new spell of life, though so recently presented at the Haymarket.

Comedy, and comedy of the best—light, amusing, pure, and wholesome—is once more to be found at the St. James's Theatre, the admitted head-quarters of this agreeable form of entertainment. Some people may object that "A Quiet Rubber" and "The Queen's Shilling" are not English comedies because they are derived from a foreign original. If that be the case, there will be very few plays to see, for even Sheridan and Goldsmith kept their eyes and ears open before they wrote. The public care very little for this eternal wail about originality, and would far rather have a good and amusing play that was founded on somebody else's idea than a bad original one founded on no idea at all. Why, for instance, should we be deprived of Mr. Hare's marvellous study of senility as Lord Kilclare; or of Mr. Kendal's charming young Lancer who gets into such scrapes when love leads the way; or of Mrs. Kendal's fresh, gay, and lovable Kate Greville; or, again, of Mr. Hare's Colonel Daunt, merely because there were such plays as "La Partie de Piquet" and the "Fils de Famille." But little trace of French origin occurs in either work. Mr. Coghlan and Mr. G. W. Godfrey have done their work extremely well, and have prepared for the playgoer not only amusing plays, but such as bring out some excellent and clever acting. The audiences seem as delighted to get back to modern stories as are the artists eager to interpret them, and it is not likely that any change of programme will be required in King-street for a considerable time to come. The cheery little inn servant in "The Queen's Shilling" is now capitally played by Miss Lydia Cowell, who has an excellent chance of distinguishing herself in so finished a school of acting as this—the best we have in this country.

The new first part at German Reed's Entertainment has been provided by Mr. H. P. Stephens and Mr. W. Yardley, and a very clever little play it is. "Hobbies" is the name given to the sketch of the private life of an amateur scientist, who spends half his fortune in trying to invent new-fangled machines that range from pneumatic tubes to mechanical dogs. A love story is cleverly interwoven in the amusing description of a silly old gentleman, excellently played by Mr. Alfred Reed; and it may be safely said that the services of Miss Fanny Holland, Mr. Allan, Mr. Dudley North, and Miss Marion Wardroper have never been so usefully or pleasantly employed. The lyrics, which are specially good of their kind, have been set to music by Mr. George Gear, who for many years has been connected with the music of this popular entertainment. Mr. Corney Grain is never at a loss for a subject for satire. This time he has pitched on the drawing-room reciters and "song cyclists" and "vocal recitalists," who are so popular just now, and cleverly hits off their eccentricities. His song in imitation of the "tenor with the soul," who attracts a lot of silly women to the piano, is capital; and so are his serenades and nigger melodies. It is wonderful with what spirit and variety this entertainment is kept up; and it is pleasant to find the entertainers retain their youth, good looks, and bright spirits. Years pass away, but the old friends at German Reed's are just the same, and prepared with a cheery welcome. C. S.

A long and honourable service of over twenty years in London has not dulled the success of the "Moore and Burgess Minstrels," which remain one of the chief holiday attractions in the metropolis. For at the St. James's Hall there is no east wind or piercing blasts such as may be found on Hampstead-heath. It was a wonderful sight to see the large hall in Piccadilly crammed on each of the special Easter performances, and to watch the interest that attended the delivery of each song and glee. There is a curious connection between negro minstrelsy and hymnology, and who shall say how these minstrels have benefited from the modern religious revivalism? Apart, however, from the madrigals and part-songs so admirably sung, there have been some special features introduced this Easter. Prominent amongst them is Mr. W. F. Sweatnam, a comedian who has attained great popularity in America, and deservedly so. Quainter humour has not been heard for a long time. His monologue is funnier in idea than Sothern's Dundreary. Mr. George Moore is as funny as ever as the "bones" of the troupe, and the whole company has been provided with new jokes, all of which tell with the audience. But the minstrels can be patriotic as well as sentimental and funny. A great hit has been made by the singing of the new national song, "The Soldiers of the Guard," written by Clement Scott and W. C. Levey, which was received so enthusiastically the other day at the Criterion Theatre.

We are glad to see a matinée announced to take place at St. George's Hall on the afternoon of Wednesday, May 6, for the benefit of Miss Edith Heraud. Mrs. Kendal, Mr. J. L. Toole, Mr. Charles Warner, Mr. Henry Neville, Mr. George Grossmith, and a host of celebrities have promised to appear. We trust that the public will respond to the appeal of an artiste who for many years occupied a high position upon the boards, as well as achieved for herself a considerable literary status, but whose career has been cut short by a terrible malady, which for five years has defied the first medical treatment in the country for its alleviation.

MUSIC.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.

Mr. Rosa entered on a new London season on Monday evening at Drury-Lane Theatre, this being his third occupancy of that house. We have already given an outline of the arrangements for the season just opened (which is to extend over eight weeks), and have now to speak of the commencing performances. That of the opening night consisted of Wallace's "Maritana," the bright melodiousness of which retains its hold on the public ear. Of so familiar a work, and of its performance by artists who have often before been heard in it, brief notice may suffice. Madame Georgina Burns, who sustained the title-character, acted with spirit, and gave her music with great effect, as did Mr. Maas that of Don Cæsar; Mr. Ludwig's Don José having been also a repetition of an important feature of the evening, which included Miss Marian Burton's expressive delivery of the music of Lazarillo. The part of the King was effectively sustained by Mr. Burgon. It is now nearly forty years since "Maritana" was first produced, in the same theatre, where it was heard last Monday evening with evident pleasure by a large audience.

On Tuesday evening "Carmen" was given, with (as on previous occasions) the powerful performance of Madame Marie Roze in the title-character, in which she sang with her well-known charm of voice and style, and acted with real dramatic power, especially in the final scene, in which Carmen's jilted lover, José, stabs her. The last-named character was (also as before) very effectively sustained by Mr. B. McGuckin, who has made rapid progress as a stage vocalist, both in acting and singing. The character of Michaela found, as heretofore, a charming representative in Miss C. Perry; Mr. L. Crotty repeated his excellent performance as Escamillo, the bull-fighter; the Gipsy girls, Frasquita and Mercedes, found competent representatives in Misses Bensburg and M. Burton; and Mr. Snazelle as Dancaïro, and Mr. C. Lyall as Remendado, were picturesque representatives, respectively, of the Captain and Lieutenant of the smugglers. The scenic effects were excellent, and the incidental ballet action was well sustained, this department being under the able and skilled direction of Madame Katti Lanner. On both the occasions referred to the orchestral and choral performances were worthy of the reputation of Mr. Rosa's company. Mr. Randegger conducted ably in each instance. Of subsequent performances we must speak next week. "Nadeshda," the new romantic opera composed by Mr. A. Goring Thomas, is to be produced on Thursday next, with Madame Valleria in the title-character.

ROYALTY THEATRE.

"François, the Radical," produced on Saturday evening, is an adaptation by the author of "The Candidate" of a French comic opera entitled "François, les Bas Bleus," the music of which is by M. Firmin Bernicat, a young composer who died before he could witness the great success of this, his best work, which indeed was not quite completed in some of the details of the score, these having been filled up by his friend, M. Messager. The plot is very slight, and serves chiefly to give occasion to some very smart political allusions and epigrammatic dialogue, and some very bright and tuneful music, in which there are indications of a power that would doubtless have produced works of more importance had the composer not died prematurely. There is no occasion to dwell at great length on the few incidents of the piece—how François, a public letter-writer and would-be poet, at the epoch of the French Revolution, is in love with Fanchon, a street ballad-singer, and is beloved by the sister of a Marquis, he writing songs which the gets François to touch up, one of them being rendered so ultra-revolutionary that the Marquis's safety is endangered, until François claims the authorship, having discovered that Fanchon is the long-lost daughter of the Marquis. The storming of the Bastille raises François to power, the Marquis and his sister, disguised as venders of lemonade, are in search of Fanchon, who has resumed her occupation as a ballad-singer. Her discovery leads to a happy termination, including her union with François. The first act is altogether the strongest, the remaining portion requiring—what it has probably now received—some revision and compression. Some of the musical numbers produced a very favourable impression, particularly the songs for Fanchon—"I've songs for all the seven ages," "The little sailor," "When love once blooms," and "Let all be drinking"—her duet, "The writing lesson" with François, their love-duet, and the female chorus, "Take these roses"—not to mention other instances. Miss Kate Santley sang and acted well as Fanchon. Mr. Deane Brand, as François, achieved a genuine success by the display of an excellent tenor voice. Mr. Ashley was amusing as the Marquis, as was Mr. G. Honey as Jasmin; Miss Mulholland was a good representative of the Countess, the Marquis's sister; and minor parts were sufficiently well sustained—indeed, the performance was generally efficient.

The Royal Albert Hall Choral Society's performance of "The Messiah" on Good Friday, conducted by Mr. Barnby, was an especially fine one, and drew a very large attendance. Madame Albani sang the soprano solo music with exquisite taste and expression; and Miss Hilda Wilson justified the prominent position she has recently obtained by her fine delivery of the contralto music. Mr. Abercrombie and Mr. W. Mills were, respectively, efficient in the tenor and bass solos. It is scarcely necessary to say that the sublime choruses were impressively rendered. Dr. Stainer presided, as usual, at the organ.

Madame Frickenhaus (pianist) and Herr Ludwig (violinist) announce a series of four chamber concerts, to be given at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, on the evenings of May 14 and 28, June 11 and 25.

The London branch of the United Richard Wagner Society has issued a circular stating that a reserve fund has been established for the purpose of perpetuating the principles to which Wagner's life was devoted, by ensuring the periodical representation of his works "under conditions identical with those which he himself had inaugurated in 1876." Bayreuth has been selected for the performances. It is presumed that in England there must be many admirers willing to assist in this work, and the London branch is intended to serve as a rallying point for the followers of Wagner resident in this country. With this in view, lectures, readings, and conversaziones are to be given this year. The society has 181 branches and agencies in Europe and America, with a total of 5124 members. The Earl of Dysart is president of the English branch, the committee consisting of Mr. Walter Bache, Mr. A. Birnstingl, Mr. J. Cyriax, Mr. A. Forman, the Rev. H. R. Haweis, Mr. A. J. Hipkins, Mr. F. Praeger, Mr. F. Schuster, Mr. C. Dowdeswell, and Mr. B. L. Mosely.

The Queen has granted permission to Mr. A. J. Caldicott, director of the music at the new Albert Palace, to introduce the chorale, "Gotha," composed by the late Prince Consort, into the ode (the words of which are by Mr. Barrett) to be performed at the approaching inaugural ceremony.

The Hereford Musical Festival of this year will take place on Sept. 8, 9, 10, and 11. The oratorio music in the cathedral will be—on the Tuesday morning, "Elijah"; Wednesday morning, Gounod's "Redemption"; evening, Spohr's "Last Judgment"; Thursday morning, Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise"; and on Friday morning, "The Messiah." There will be secular concerts in the County Hall on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, the programmes of which will include two new compositions—Dr. Smith's "St. Kevin's" and Dr. Harford Lloyd's "Death of Baldwin." A closing concert of chamber music will be given on the Friday evening.

FRANZ ABT.

This celebrated musical composer died at Wiesbaden last week. He was born at Eilenburg, in Prussian Saxony, in 1819, and was intended for the Church, which destination he changed for that of the musical profession. He earned great distinction by a very large number of vocal compositions, most of which are songs chiefly for a single voice, others being for several voices. Many of the former obtained great popularity. Abt also wrote some pleasing cantatas. His music is distinguished by fluent melody of an eminently vocal character.

THE VICEROY OF INDIA.

We present a Portrait of the Right Hon. the Earl of Dufferin, who went to India last October as Viceroy, and who is now engaged in negotiations of great importance with the Ameer Abdurrahman, ruler of Afghanistan, and in administrative business needful for the great military preparations to support British policy with reference to the safety of the Afghan frontier. Lord Dufferin's eminent services to the British Empire, as a most popular Governor-General of Canada, and as Ambassador to Russia and to Turkey, besides his special performances as political agent in settling the affairs of the Lebanon some twenty-four years ago, and two or three years ago in making inquiries and reporting upon the condition of Egypt, and the needful or desirable reforms to be attempted there, have earned him the highest reputation. The Earl of Dufferin is an Irishman, and a great-grandson of the accomplished Richard Brinsley Sheridan. He is Frederick Temple Hamilton Blackwood, only son of the third Baron Dufferin, in the Irish peerage; and his mother, the late Dowager Countess Gifford (by her second marriage), was a clever lady authoress, eldest daughter of Mr. Thomas Sheridan, and heiress to the wit, talent, and genial temper of her family, which her son has inherited in his turn. Lord Dufferin was born at Florence in 1826, succeeded to the peerage on his father's death in 1841, was educated at Christ Church College, Oxford, but took no honours or degree, leaving the University early; he entered public life as a Lord-in-Waiting in Lord J. Russell's first Administration. He was attached in 1855 to Lord J. Russell's mission to Vienna; and was sent by Lord Palmerston as British Commissioner to Syria in 1860. He was Under-Secretary of State for India from 1864 to 1866, and in the War Office, subsequently, for a few months. Under Mr. Gladstone's Administration, which commenced in 1868, Lord Dufferin was Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for four years, and then assumed the direction of the Government of Canada, a post which he held until 1878. He was subsequently Ambassador at St. Petersburg from 1879 to 1881, and was appointed to Constantinople in April, 1881. The following year he went on a special mission to Egypt. He was created in 1871 a Peer of the United Kingdom, as Earl of Dufferin and Viscount Clandeboye. The noble Earl became known as an author in 1860 by his "Letters from High Latitudes," a lively narrative of a yachting tour to Iceland; his speeches also have been published; and he has written several pamphlets upon Irish questions. Lord Dufferin married, in 1862, Harriet, the eldest daughter of Captain Hamilton, of county Down, and added the name of Hamilton to his own by Royal license. His eldest son, Archibald, Lord Clandeboye, was born in 1863, and is expected to enter Parliament at the next General Election.

Our Portrait of Lord Dufferin is from a photograph by Messrs. Elliott and Fry, of Baker-street.

Lord Randolph Churchill, after an absence from England of four months, arrived at Charing-cross station from India on Tuesday morning, and was met by several friends. His Lordship appeared to be in excellent health.

Mr. Clement Scott's lecture entitled "The Stage and the Age," recently delivered before the members of the Playgoers' Club, has been published, handsomely printed, in a neat wrapper, by Mr. Samuel French, of the Strand.

The Spring Show, under the auspices of the Royal Dublin Society, was opened on Tuesday at Ball's Bridge. The feature of the show was the exhibition of young bulls; and amongst 124 yearlings there was scarcely one indifferent animal. In the Herefords, the Queen sent over a beautiful bull, Gladiator; and, among all the exhibits, her Majesty took three first prizes.

Part third of the "Ornamental Arts of Japan" (Sampson Low, Marston, and Co.) contains nine superb plates in chromo-lithography, besides two in monochrome, accompanied by descriptions of lacquer work, metal work, enamel, carving, &c. Part fourth, completing this magnificent work, will be issued in July.

Messrs. Fores, of Piccadilly, have issued a clever etching by Walter Cox, after J. Watson Nicol. It represents a couple of jesters singing a duet, and their solemn countenances are in ludicrous contrast with their professional costume, one with upturned eyes, while he twangs his instrument, the other gravely scanning the notes on the sheet of music before him. It is a capital work.

AN OLD SONG.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, April 7.

For the sake of record it may be useful to state that during the past week French politicians have given a striking instance of their devotion to party interests, and their neglect of those of the country. The reason of the prolongation of the ministerial crisis, which ended only this morning, has been the pretensions and intrigues of the powerful group of the Republican Union, which demanded a predominant place in the Cabinet for members of its own party, and, above all, control over the forthcoming general elections. These manœuvres caused the failure of MM. De Freycinet and Constans, who were successively called upon by M. Grévy to form a Ministry; and, finally, since the twenty-four hours of patriotic frenzy which accompanied the fall of M. Ferry, so little have we heard of Tonquin that it seems almost to have been forgotten.

The new Ministry is composed as follows:—President of the Council and Justice, Brisson; Interior, Allain-Targé; Foreign Affairs, De Freycinet; Finances, Clamageran; Public Instruction, Goblet; War, General Campenon; Marine, Admiral Galiber; Commerce, Pierre Legrand; Public Works, Sadi Carnot; Agriculture, Hervé-Mangon; Posts and Telegraphs, Sarrien. This Cabinet comprises seven deputies, three Senators, and one Minister who is not in Parliament—namely, Admiral Galiber. In political tendencies it is hostile to the Opportunists—that is to say, to the Ferry party—and in its composition the group of the Radical Left is largely represented. The new Prime Minister, M. Brisson, accepted office very reluctantly, and only after M. Grévy had tried every possible resource was he at last induced, and almost forced, to take upon himself a responsibility which he is said to fear. The Reactionaries call M. Brisson the Red Dauphin, "le Dauphin rouge," in allusion to his long-cherished plan of succeeding some day M. Grévy at the Elysée. M. Eugène Henri Brisson was born at Bourges in 1835, of a legal family. He studied law at Paris, became an active Republican under the Empire, and a still more active Freemason, held a post in the Crédit Mobilier, wrote in the Opposition newspapers, and in 1870 he was elected Deputy for Paris. In 1876 M. Brisson was again elected member for Paris, on the presentation of the Radicals, and in 1881 he succeeded Gambetta as President of the Chamber. He is an austere man, of small talent as an orator; indeed, he has hitherto been famous principally for his silence, reserve, and severity of countenance. M. Brisson never smiles. He has never compromised himself, for the simple reason that he has avoided all situations where there was any grave responsibility to be incurred. We now see him at work for the first time, and starting with the advantage of a reputation, unique in France, for integrity of character, gravity, firmness, and implacable justice.

At the Chamber this afternoon M. Brisson read his declaration and programme to the general satisfaction. The cabinet, he said, was one of conciliation and union, whose object was to strengthen France and the Republic. As regards China, the Ministry would insist upon the execution of the treaties and the respect of the rights of France, and that, if negotiations were not sufficient to attain this end, the Ministry would pursue it with arms; not, however, changing the character of the present expedition without the consent of Parliament. The forthcoming elections, M. Brisson said, would be free, loyal, and sincere. The more that manifestations of universal suffrage were spontaneous and independent, the stronger the Republic would be and the more strongly cemented would be the union between the Republicans. After reading this declaration, M. Brisson demanded the voting of the 150,000,000f. required for pursuing the Tonquin Expedition.

The Times telegram, relative to the conclusion of peace between France and China, was much talked about in the lobbies this afternoon.

A new picture exhibition, which is to be annual, has been opened in the Rue de Sèze by the Société de Pastellistes. To judge from the success which the exhibition is having amongst the public and amongst the critics, the delicate art of pastel seems likely to recover the high favour which it enjoyed in the eighteenth century, when Rosalba Carriera, Latour, Perronneau, and Madame Vigée Lebrun applied pastel with such exquisite results to portrait-painting. Our modern artists not only employ pastel for portraits, but also for landscape and all kinds of subjects. The late J. De Nittis, for instance, is represented by a series of views of Paris and scenes on the Parisian race-courses, in which the figures are lifesize; Raffaelli paints in pastel and on canvas the movement of the boulevards and squares; Duez depicts marines, gardens, meadows, just as J. F. Millet and Troyon reproduced in pastel some of their most famous pictures, such as "The Sower," "The Angelus," &c. The new exhibition is really most interesting, the more so as, side by side with the modern pastels executed yesterday, we are shown some hundred and fifty choice works by the famous pastellistes of the last century.

The reports of the Parliamentary Committee appointed to inquire into the situation of French Art-Industries give amongst the causes of the present crisis a preponderating place to the modern craze for curiosities, bibelots, old furniture, and objects of all kinds. The furniture-makers are forced to copy the furniture of the Renaissance and of Louis XIV., XV., and XVI., and constantly very fine copies are sold by dealers in England as authentic old pieces. In jewellery and silversmiths' work, Paris, thanks to this demand for old work, has become a great centre of counterfeit work. In enamels and ivories, it appears, the counterfeiting reaches fantastically picturesque degrees. The enamels, made to order by the Parisian artists, are bought at modest trade prices by unscrupulous dealers, taken to Amsterdam to be treated, and then sold for fabulous prices to collectors. Gothic and Renaissance ivories are treated in the same way; and in every branch of art-industry, progress and originality are shown by these reports to be paralysed by the craze for old things. The counterfeiting of old work puts an end to serious production, and is of profit only to the intermediary, and not to the maker. On the other hand, owing to the disdain in which modern work is held, workmen and artists belonging to the industries which are affected by counterfeiting no longer find work, and have to change their trade. Hence it is to be feared that, unless this unreasonable craze for old bibelots and worm-eaten furniture goes out of fashion very soon, Paris will gradually see the disappearance of those art-industries which have hitherto been her glory and her fortune. The Emperor of Germany and his family yesterday week attended Divine service in the Imperial Castle, where, later, a family dinner was given.—Prince Von Bismarck's seventieth birthday was celebrated by national festivities in Germany on the 1st inst. His Highness was honoured by a visit from the Emperor and all the Princes of the Royal House at eleven a.m., and received deputations throughout the rest of the day. More than a thousand congratulatory telegrams and letters were received by him. Prince Von Bismarck has taken possession of Schoenhausen, the estate presented to him by the German nation.—The death is announced of the German General Vogel Von Falkenstein, who was born in the same year as the Emperor, and had therefore reached his eighty-eighth year.

After a protracted discussion, the Jersey States on Tuesday rejected a bill for expelling the Jesuits from the island.

The Danish Rigsdag was prorogued on the 1st inst. by the King. His Majesty also issued a decree provisionally authorising the expenditure by the Government of such sums as may be necessary for carrying on the public service.

The King and Queen of Sweden passed through Vienna last Saturday en route for Bucharest. Their Majesties will there await news of their second son, who is lying ill with typhoid fever at Constantinople. Should the tidings received be favourable, the King and Queen will return to Stockholm; otherwise, they will continue their journey to Constantinople. The Emperor called upon the Royal travellers at the Hôtel Impérial, and King Oscar returned the Kaiser's visit shortly afterwards.

The Russian Imperial family arrived at St. Petersburg last Saturday from Gatchina. They attended the solemn Easter Mass celebrated at midnight in the church of the Winter Palace.

The United States Senate has confirmed most of President Cleveland's nominations to offices abroad.—Mr. Henry Irving concluded his New York engagement last Saturday night before a crowded audience. He was given a farewell banquet on Monday evening at Delmonico's, attended by about two hundred prominent persons, and sailed for England on Tuesday in the Arizona.

Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner for Canada, on Monday received a cable message from the Canadian Government stating that troops were being transported to the North-West by the "all-Canadian" route, north of Lake Superior, with satisfactory speed. Batteries from Quebec and Kingston had arrived at Winnipeg, and other troops were following them closely. It is stated that the number of the disaffected Indians is 2000. The United States Government is actively co-operating with Canada in the suppression of the rebellion.

President Barrios, of Guatemala, has been killed in a battle between his troops and those of San Salvador, in which the latter were completely victorious. An armistice for a month has been agreed upon. At Aspinwall 10,000 persons are homeless, and the losses caused by the burning of the town are estimated at 4,000,000 dols.

From Hong-Kong we learn that the British flag has been hoisted on Port Hamilton, an island of the Corean Archipelago. This latest acquisition of territory, although small in area, is of both significance and importance in other points more essential to the interest of the country. Situated between two diminutive islands due south of Corea, this harbour will, in fact, constitute a new coaling station in the Far East.

THE CHURCH.

On Tuesday morning the Archbishop of York preached in Beverley Minster, on the opening of the enlarged organ, which was played by Dr. Naylor, organist of York Minster, and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was sung by a choir of one hundred voices.

At Exeter Cathedral on Tuesday the Dean and Chapter unanimously elected Dr. Bickersteth Bishop of Exeter, in the room of Dr. Temple, transferred to London; and on Wednesday the enthronement of Dr. Temple took place in St. Paul's Cathedral.

The Bishop of Southwell has reopened the ancient church of Furningley, after complete restoration, the expense of which was borne by three of the parishioners.

The Rev. Joseph Cooper Lintott, Vicar of St. Luke's, Camberwell, has been appointed by the Bishop of Rochester to the Vicarage of St. Philip's, Battersea.

Dr. Durnford, Bishop of Chichester, was yesterday week seized with illness while officiating in the cathedral of the diocese. In the evening, however, he had considerably improved.

The services appropriate to Good Friday in the metropolitan churches were attended by large and devout congregations. At the early celebration of the communion at St. Paul's Cathedral, a man advanced to the altar, seized the chalice containing the consecrated wine, and dashed it to the ground. He was proceeding to commit further outrages when he was arrested and removed to a police station. He has been sentenced to a month's imprisonment. The Easter Sunday festival was celebrated with its usual heartiness and joyousness in St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, and the other London churches.

The Bishop of Rochester, in an address to his clergy on confirmation, says:—"Occasionally, and almost more frequently in the poorer than the richer parishes, I have regretted to observe a growing tendency to showy finery in the dress of the female candidates. Mock pearls in the humbler class, white satin shoes in the higher—which on a bleak March day makes one tremble for the poor girl's health—should gently but firmly be eschewed. Nothing would distress me more than to have to send a candidate back for showy or tawdry apparel. But for example's sake it may be necessary for me to do it."

The Church of St. Saviour, Bath, has been enriched by the filling of the great east window with painted glass from the studio of Mr. Taylor, of Berners-street. The window is of seven lights, and represents six subjects in the life of the Saviour, being the gift of Mrs. Beaumont, in memory of her husband.—A handsome three-light painted window—subject, "The Good Shepherd"—has been erected in the parish church of Illogan, Cornwall, to the memory of the late Rector, the Rev. J. G. Wulff, and his wife, by the Rev. and Mrs. Vyvyan Popham. The work, which is worthy of note both for artistic treatment and colouring, was supplied by Messrs. Lavers, Westlake, and Barraud, of Endell-street, Bloomsbury.

Subscriptions must be paid in advance, direct to the Publishing Office, 198, Strand, in English money; by cheque crossed the Union Bank of London; or by Post-Office Order, payable at the East Strand Post Office, to Ingram Brothers, of 198, Strand, London.

OBITUARY.

EARL CAIRNS.

The Right Hon. Sir Hugh MacCalmont Cairns, Earl Cairns, Viscount Garmoyle, and Baron Cairns, of Garmoyle, in the county of Antrim, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, died at Lindisfarne, Bournemouth, on the 2nd inst. This great lawyer and statesman was born in December, 1819, the second son of Mr. William Cairns, of Parkmount, in the county of Antrim, by Rosanna, his wife, daughter of Mr. Hugh Johnson; was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; called to the Bar by the Middle Temple in 1844, appointed a Queen's Counsel in 1856, and made a Bencher of Lincoln's Inn in the same year. He was Solicitor-General from February, 1858, to June, 1859; and Attorney-General from July to October, 1866, when he became a Lord Justice of Appeal. On Feb. 29, 1868, and again in 1874, he was raised to the Woolsack as Lord High Chancellor of England. He had been previously created, Feb. 27, 1867, a Peer as Baron Cairns, of Garmoyle. His Lordship was Chancellor and LL.D. of Trinity College, Dublin, and received (honoris causâ) the degree of LL.D. from Cambridge in 1862 and of D.C.L. from Oxford in 1863. Before his elevation to the Bench he sat in the House of Commons as member for Belfast, 1852 to 1866; was knighted in 1858; and made Viscount and Earl, Sept. 27, 1878. He married, May 9, 1856, Mary Harriet, eldest daughter of Mr. John M'Neile, of Parkmount, in the county of Antrim, and leaves surviving issue, Arthur William, Viscount Garmoyle, now second Earl Cairns, born Dec. 21, 1861, three other sons, and two daughters, of whom the elder, Lady Lilias Charlotte, is wife of the Rev. H. Nevile Sherbrooke.

COLONEL DE COURCY.

Colonel Nevinson Willoughby De Courcy, C.B., late Royal Marine Light Infantry, died on the 31st ult., in his sixty-second year. He was second son of the late Captain Nevinson De Courcy, R.N., K.T.S., by Mary, his wife, daughter of Mr. William Blennerhassett, of Ballyseedy, and was grandson of Admiral the Hon. Michael De Courcy, third son of the twenty-fifth Lord Kingsale. He entered the Royal Marines in 1841, and retired as Colonel in 1877. He served in Japan, 1864 to 1866, and in the Ashantee war, 1873-4. Colonel De Courcy married, 1866, Maria, youngest daughter of Mr. William Cooke, Madras C.S., and leaves one son.

COLONEL COLE.

Colonel Arthur Lowry Cole, C.B., late 17th Regiment, died on the 30th ult., in his sixty-eighth year. He was eldest son of the gallant Peninsular commander the Hon. Sir Galbraith Lowry Cole, G.C.B., by Frances, his wife, daughter of the first Earl of Malmesbury; and was grandson of the first Earl of Enniskillen. He commanded the 17th Regiment at the siege of Sebastopol, and at the assault on the Redan. For these services he received the Crimean medal with clasp, the Turkish medal, the Medjidieh (fifth class), and the Companionship of the Bath. He married, in 1854, Elizabeth Frances, daughter of Vice-Admiral Villiers Francis Hatton, and leaves issue.

Dr. George Pearce, late of the Madras Medical Service and Hon. Physician to the Queen, on the 28th ult., aged eighty-eight.

Dr. Robert Aston Coffin, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Southwark, on the 6th inst., at Teignmouth, after a long illness.

Mr. Alan Ker, for many years a Puisne Judge of Jamaica, at Kingston, in that island, on the 20th ult., aged sixty-five. Called to the Bar in 1842, was Attorney-General of Antigua, 1851 to 1854, and was subsequently Chief Justice of Nevis and Chief Justice of Dominica until 1861, when he was made a Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Jamaica.

General Sir James Edward Alexander, C.B., F.R.S. Edin., K.C.L.S., of Westerton, Bridge of Allan, on the 2nd inst., at Ryde, at the age of eighty-two. He served in the first Burmese, the Persian, Turkish, Portuguese, and Kaffir wars; in the African Expedition in 1836-7 he penetrated to the interior of that continent, and with the North-American exploring and surveying party, in 1847-9, explored the forests of New Brunswick. He afterwards served in the Crimean war, and commanded the troops in the province of Auckland, New Zealand, for some time during the Maori war of 1860-1. He received seven war medals, and was awarded a distinguished service reward.

AN OLD SONG.

It may also be said that the singer, though not an old lady, but an amiable young one, is accompanying her voice with a rather old-fashioned instrument. We do not so often hear, in this generation, as our grandfathers and grandmothers used to do, the light melodious twang of the guitar, or that of the more stately harp, which used to go so harmoniously with a vocal performance. "In the days when we went gipsying, a long time ago," in the pleasant woodland picnics of summers that shone more brightly "when we were young, as we once hae been," the guitar, being a portable instrument, was much in favour by way of enlivening outdoor social festivities with pleasant music. It could, again, be very easily carried at night under the short cloak which a gentleman might wear, and not make an eccentric figure, some forty years since; and it was then found most convenient for the purpose of a serenade. "Meet me by moonlight alone," is an air which some good ladies, now elderly matrons, can possibly remember to have heard played and sung beneath their windows. There are romantic personal reminiscences, and tender feelings not yet wholly extinguished, in many a living breast, associated with the tones of the guitar, though connoisseurs of music esteem it a poor tinkling toy. As for the old song which this lady is singing, it may be any one of many old songs, now too seldom heard—those of Moore, Byron, Haynes Bayly, Mrs. Hemans, L. E. L., and other true lyrical poets, set to music which was tuneful, rich in original melody, and often most affecting. It is doubtful whether the present age has provided itself with new songs better than those of old.

Lord Leigh presided at a meeting of the general committee for the restoration of St. Michael's, Coventry, recently held at St. Mary's Hall. A discussion took place concerning the disposal of the peal of bells, which, if retained, would require the erection of a second tower. The monetary question was the difficulty in the way, and Mr. Woodcock, of Coventry (who is a subscriber of £10,000 to the Restoration Fund), said, assuming that a good tower could be put up for £8000, he was prepared to give half of it. It was resolved, in order to ascertain the money which would be required, to invite tenders for the work from Mr. Thompson, of Peterborough, and a sub-committee was appointed to select the stone.

THE COURT.

Queen Victoria, with Princess Beatrice, arrived at Aix-les-Bains on Wednesday evening, the 1st inst., and drove at once to the Villa Mottet. The railway station was gaily decorated for the occasion, and a guard of honour, composed of a detachment of dragoons from Chambéry and of the Garde Mobile, from Paris, was in attendance. But, at the express desire of her Majesty, there was no official reception. The Queen and Princess Beatrice drove to the Col du Chat on the 3rd inst. The Princess afterwards walked out with Lady Churchill. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Princess, attended by the Dowager Marchioness of Ely, drove to the Château Bordeaux. Last Saturday morning the Queen and Princess Beatrice drove to the Maison du Diable, the residence of Lady Whalley. The Princess afterwards walked out. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Princess drove out, attended by Lady Churchill. The weather was beautifully fine. Divine service was held at the Villa Mottet on Sunday morning, in the presence of the Queen, Princess Beatrice, and the ladies and gentlemen of the household. The Rev. D. Lancaster M'Anally officiated, assisted by the Rev. D. Lact. Her Majesty, accompanied by the Princess, has taken several drives in the beautiful neighbourhood, including Marlioz, Bourjet, St. Innocent, &c. On Monday and Tuesday, morning and afternoon, the Queen drove out, accompanied by Princess Beatrice. Her Majesty daily receives a large number of telegrams, and a special office has been established to enable them to be received and delivered with the greatest rapidity. The Queen enjoys excellent health.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, Prince Albert Victor of Wales, and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud arrived at Sandringham on Tuesday for the Easter recess. Prince George of Wales arrived there on Thursday morning from Greenwich, having completed his studies at the Royal Naval College, and passed his examination for the rank of lieutenant. Their Royal Highnesses were present at Divine service on Good Friday. The Rev. F. Hervey, M.A., Chaplain to the Queen, Domestic Chaplain to the Prince, and Rector of Sandringham, officiated and preached. On Monday the Prince and Princess, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor and Prince George, arrived at Marlborough House from Sandringham. In the evening the Prince and Princess, with Prince Albert Victor and Prince George, were present at the Prince's Theatre, and witnessed the performance of Mrs. Langtry as Lady Ormonde in "Peril." On Tuesday evening the Prince and Princess of Wales, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor, started on their visit to Ireland, and received their first public reception on landing at Kingstown the following morning. Prince George of Wales will join the Excellent, gunnery-ship, at Portsmouth to-day (Saturday), to go through a course of training—first in torpedo, next in gunnery, and lastly in pilotage.

The Duchess of Edinburgh, accompanied by the Russian Ambassador and attended by a suite, honoured the performance at the St. James's Theatre with her presence on Monday evening.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, April 8.

After a substantial rebound as the result of a belief that the difficulty with Russia was in prospect of being arranged, we are once more filled with misgiving, and some of last week's advance is now being lost. On balance, however, the gain is considerable, and we may hope that diplomacy may yet devise a peaceful settlement. But waiting this result, investments must drag, and it is very difficult to find employment for money for short periods. While the Bank of England rate of discount is 3½, the actual working rate is not more than 2½, and short loans are quoted 2.

A considerable movement has taken place in Grand Trunk Railway stocks, the "bears" having been frightened into buying back on the publication of the working statement for February, which showed some improvement upon the January return. More recently, the prices have gained ground in connection with a report that the accounts will show that the dividends proposed do not adequately represent the earning result of the period covered, as a large sum has been applied to special account. As to this point, it is now made no secret that of £100,000 spent in renewals to the extent of £60,000 has been charged to the past half-year, and that the dividend on the first preference is reduced to that extent. The directors will probably explain in their report how it is that while in recent half-years reserve funds and "plums" have been applied in aid of dividend, the very bad half-year under notice has been made to bear such an exceptional charge. No doubt there are sufficient reasons, but do the directors enough appreciate the importance to shareholders of the dividends being kept as even as circumstances will permit? It is manifestly impossible for investors to keep in a company whose first preference stock falls from 119 to 47 within less than two years, and that on dividend result only.

That Russia has resolved to tax the coupons of her internal loans is openly stated and accepted; but it is not yet officially announced. If it take place, it is evidence of the necessitous condition of the Russian Treasury; but it is no violation of contract. The purely foreign loans, such as the sterling issues known here, are not likely to be touched, and it is held by all countries that national stock is as open to be taxed as any other source of income. Foreign holders of Consols pay income tax, and the performances of Italy and Austria in that direction are notorious.

It is further evidence of the more ordinary conditions of business which now prevail that the directors of the Bank of Germany have just seen their way to reduce the rate of discount from 5 per cent, to which it was raised on the 10th ult., to 4½ per cent. This relief is probably due to the extent to which German holders of Russian bonds have been able recently to borrow in London.

It is officially announced by cable that the Southern Pacific Railway Company have leased the Central Pacific Company on terms which, in the minimum, appear to secure to the ordinary stockholders of the former 2 per cent dividends. British investors are more concerned in Central stocks than in the Southern stocks. The Central Pacific Company have paid no ordinary dividend for a year past; but for some time previously paid 6 per cent. The Southern Pacific Company are also not paying dividend on ordinary capital. Under these circumstances, the security for the leasing terms is in need of explanation.

It is expected that, during the present Session of Parliament, Lord Kimberley will be able to get an Act to permit the creation of India stock in exchange for Eastern Bengal Railway Annuities. The terms of conversion are not yet indicated.

T. S.

In the course of a pawnbroking case, heard at Bow-street Police Court on Tuesday, it was alleged that a gang of persons has been engaged in manufacturing sovereigns and articles of jewellery of what was called "mystery gold," a composition of platinum, tin, and copper, which stands the ordinary acid tests and weighs as much as pure gold.

THE MAGAZINES FOR APRIL.

The Cornhill is chiefly remarkable for the commencement of a new fiction, "Court Royal," by the author of "Mehalah." So far as it has proceeded, it is the story of a little girl left in pawn with a Jewish broker by her mother, after an unsuccessful attempt to drown her, and known by the number of her ticket as "Six Hundred and Seventeen." Anything more glaringly improbable can hardly be imagined, unless it be the pawnbroker's own character and style of speech. So forcible, however, is the language, and so vivid the presentment of the situation, that the reader's attention is invited from the first, and, once fairly begun, the tale is not likely to be laid aside. "Rainbow Gold" is continued with its accustomed remarkable cleverness. There are also entertaining papers on the "Fire Brigade" and on "Antediluvian Monsters," the latter contending that animals now exist—chiefly, indeed, among the cetacea—equal in bigness to any that the earth has seen. "Mrs. Willmington's Garden Party" is a light little comedy-story of a class abundantly represented in the Cornhill.

The continuation of Mrs. Ritchie's "Mrs. Dymond," in Macmillan, contains a beautiful portrait, in the authoress's best style, of a French socialistic enthusiast, simple-minded and gentle-hearted, but of highly refined intellect, at once practical and unpractical. The young engraver, the worldly publisher, and the feeble old colonel—a fine man in decay—are also admirably depicted. "March in Magna Græcia" is full of picturesque sketches of the wild scenery, old towns and castles, and partly Saracen population of Apulia. "The Astrology of Shakspeare" teems with interesting citations proving the indebtedness of poetry to astrology, with the outlines of which Shakspeare must have been well acquainted; but his serious belief would be too hastily inferred from his employment of popular language and popular notions. Mr. Morley, in his review of Mark Pattison's memoirs, seems to us forgetful of the maxim that every man must have the defects of his qualities. Pattison's special mission to maintain a high and pure standard of scholarship almost required the sensitive and fastidious temperament which, so much to Mr. Morley's dissatisfaction, impaired his capacity for "fight" and "mastery."

Longmans' Magazine is strong in fiction with the continuation of Mr. Black's picturesque "White Heather," and the commencement of a new story, "Prince Otto," by R. L. Stevenson—a pure ideal romance, and, as such, occupying a quite exceptional position among the serial fiction of the day. The style is very beautiful: the plot is not yet sufficiently developed for criticism. There is nothing else of much account in the number, except Mr. O'Donoghue's panegyric of Irish popular poetry. The specimens adduced amply prove his case; but he must forgive us for deeming that Irish poets have greatly profited by learning to write English.

Blackwood also is chiefly dependent upon its fiction—the continuation of "The Waters of Hercules," and the commencement of a new and not unpromising tale, "Fortune's Wheel." The only other contributions of mark are memoirs of two soldiers—the unfortunate Venetian condottiere, Carmagnola, and Sir Herbert Stewart.

The English Illustrated Magazine is as rich in illustration as usual; but contains little of literary interest except the continuation of Bret Harte's story "A Ship of '49," which has all the indescribable originality and peculiar power of the gifted author's earlier fictions. The most remarkable of the illustrations are Mr. Crane's quaint, but fanciful and taking, designs for "The Sirens Three."

The interest of the Fortnightly Review is mainly political. Colonel Hozier and an anonymous field-officer expatiate on the enormous military strength of England, and the way in which it is allowed to remain useless for want of a little judicious outlay in the right direction. Mr. Caillard treats of Albania and the Albanians from personal knowledge, and throws out the idea that annexation to Austria would not be unpopular with the people. Mr. Broadley forcibly dwells on the danger to English interests in North Africa from French intrigue. Perhaps, however, our neighbours will think they have enough upon their hands already in Tonquin. Mr. Jephson advocates the abolition of the Irish Viceroyalty; and Mr. O'Hara thinks that a new era would dawn for Ireland if the landlords were bought out on fair terms. Possibly; but it is a weak point in Mr. O'Hara's scheme that it involves the advance of one third of the requisite two hundred and ten millions by the British taxpayer, who is assured that he will recover the amount out of the savings contingent upon the abolition of the henceforth unnecessary police. Who is to pay the retired policemen's pensions Mr. O'Hara does not inform us.

The varied contents of the Nineteenth Century include a statesman-like paper on the Afghan difficulty by Sir Henry Rawlinson, two diametrically contradictory deliverances on the advantages of an alliance with Turkey, strategic considerations by Mr. Archibald Forbes on the proper line to be adopted in case of invasion; and observations by Mr. Andrew Lang on the extraordinary resemblances found among the ghost stories of all countries, civilised and savage. More interesting than any of these are Mr. Stannard's reminiscences of General Gordon when in command of the Engineers at Gravesend, which contribute to heighten the popular estimate of his disinterested unselfishness and his strange power over men. His was a character which owed nothing to circumstances or education, a natural force impossible to replace. M. Joseph Reinach admits that the cause of England in Egypt has become the cause of Christendom, and offers the alliance of France in return for "a financial scheme based upon principles of justice and equity," which he omits to define.

The Contemporary Review contains several articles of importance, especially Mr. Matthew Arnold's "Comment on Christmas," beautifully written, but beyond the range of our commentary. Professor Dowden writes admirably on Shakspeare's women; Mr. R. L. Stevenson sets up a high standard of rhythmical finish, in style involving, we fear, the frequent sacrifice of matter to manner; and therefore not likely to be acknowledged by robust writers; Sir John Lubbock puts the objections to a second Khartoum expedition with great force; and Mr. Fowler attributes the present low prices mainly to the influence of railways and telegraphs in diminishing the cost of carriage and augmenting supply.

The National Magazine, which appears in a primrose-coloured cover in honour of Lord Beaconsfield, has simultaneously improved the quality of its articles—mostly political, and distinguished by real vigour of expression. By far the most remarkable of the non-political contributions is a racy paper, by the Rev. G. F. Browne, on "Archæological Frauds in Palestine," rendering full justice to M. Clermont-Ganneau's services in their detection, but exposing his ill-feeling towards his antiquarian confrères.

The principal article in Harper is one of especial interest to English readers—a beautifully illustrated account of Sandringham, with full, but not over-full, particulars of the daily pursuits of the Prince and Princess. "Some Richmond Portraits" perpetuate charming faces; and a tour in North Germany, and a collection of Chinese porcelain, provide ample material for illustration. The most interesting contributions to the Atlantic Monthly are the continuations of Miss O'Meara's account of Madame Mohl's salon, and that of the Tennessee fiction, by "Egbert Craddock," who now appears to be a lady. Besides the continuation of Mr. Henry James's "Bostonians," one of his best works, the Century contains three articles of special interest. Mr. Howells sketches Mediæan Florence with great power, but with considerable injustice to Lorenzo De' Medici, who could hardly be expected to give up the power he had inherited from his father. Mr. Roosevelt, depicting the ignorance and venality of the New York State Legislature in the most vivid colours, nevertheless leaves an impression that the better elements are in a fair way to prevail. Admiral Porter's narrative of the capture of the defences of New Orleans, assisted by graphic illustrations, shows how heavily armed fortifications may be silenced by a cloud of mosquito-like mortar-boats.

Temple Bar is chiefly remarkable for a paper on Georges Sand—not over accurate, since it makes "Jacques" and "Consuelo" to be written in the year after her breach with Alfred De Musset; and a singularly cavilling and carping one upon George Eliot, who is gravely censured, among other things, for having sent copies of her books to Mr. Lewes's friends before she was herself acquainted with them. The Gentleman's Magazine and Belgravia provide plenty of entertaining reading: the best things being the continuation of Cecil Power's "Babylon" in the latter, and Mr. Grant Allen's pretty scientific story, "Professor Milliter's Dilemma."

The Art-Journal is of average quality, the number not being at all strengthened by the steel plate of "The Courtship of William II. of Orange." Mr. Joseph Hatton contributes an interesting article on "Club-land."

The Magazine of Art has an excellently illustrated article on the rivers and coast of Suffolk, two portraits of Peg Woffington, with an interesting account of that famous actress, and a capital engraving from the powerful picture called "The Petition," by Jooselin De Jong.

The principal serials of the enterprising firm of Messrs. Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co., besides The Magazine of Art, are—Cassell's Magazine, The Quiver, Cassell's Saturday Journal, Greater London, Royal Shakspere, Familiar Wild Flowers, Book of Health, Old and New London, Illustrated Universal History, Popular Gardening, Picturesque Europe, Picturesque America, Life and Words of Christ, Little Folks' Magazine, Cassell's Popular Educator, and Our Own Country.

Among Fashion Books received are—Moniteur de la Mode, Le Follet, The Season, Ladies' Treasury, Ladies' Gazette of Fashion, World of Fashion, and Myra's Journal of Dress and Fashion. A word of praise may justly be given in passing to an illustrated list of Spring and Summer fashions, issued by Messrs Spence and Co., of St. Paul's-churchyard.

We have further to acknowledge the receipt of Time, The Red Dragon, The Scottish Geographical Magazine, London Society, The Argosy, The Month, Good Words, The Army and Navy Magazine, Household Words, Eastward Ho! The Antiquarian, Chambers's Journal, All the Year Round, Merry England, Irish Monthly, Leisure Hour, Book Lore, United Service Magazine, Fores's Sporting Notes and Sketches, The Theatre, St. Nicholas, Harper's Young People, Illustrated Science Monthly, Technical Journal, Baptist Magazine, Christian Treasury, Sunday Talk, Babyhood (an excellent periodical, published in New York), and The Rosebud.

PESHAWUR, NORTH-WEST FRONTIER.

The frontier town of British India, Peshawur, eighteen miles from the eastern entrance of the Khyber Pass to Cabul, was founded in the sixteenth century by the Mogul Emperor Akbar, and under the reigns of his successors became an important city. It has nearly sixty thousand inhabitants at the present day, of whom not above seven or eight thousand are Hindoos, the great majority being Mohammedans, with some Sikhs and other natives of the Punjaub. It is the capital of a large administrative district of that province, extending fifty or sixty miles, situated west of the river Indus, and bounded on three sides by the Khyber, Mohmund, Swat, and Khattuk hills, with a population of nearly half a million. It is connected by railway with Lahore and with Calcutta. The country around is fertile, well watered, and cultivated for grain and various fruits. There are manufactures of woollen cloth, silk, and carpets, and these employments are made to contribute to the discipline and support of the Government prison, as is shown in our Illustrations, which include also two views of the cloth-market and the silk-market in the town. The prisoners whose figures are here introduced, some weaving striped druggets or "durrees," others making carpets at an upright loom, are criminals under sentence for robbery and other ordinary offences. Several of them belong to the hill tribe of Afreedis, whose wild habits formerly caused the Punjaub Government much trouble. They are dressed in blanket clothing of their own manufacture; and it would be well if they carried similar industry to their native hill villages after their release.

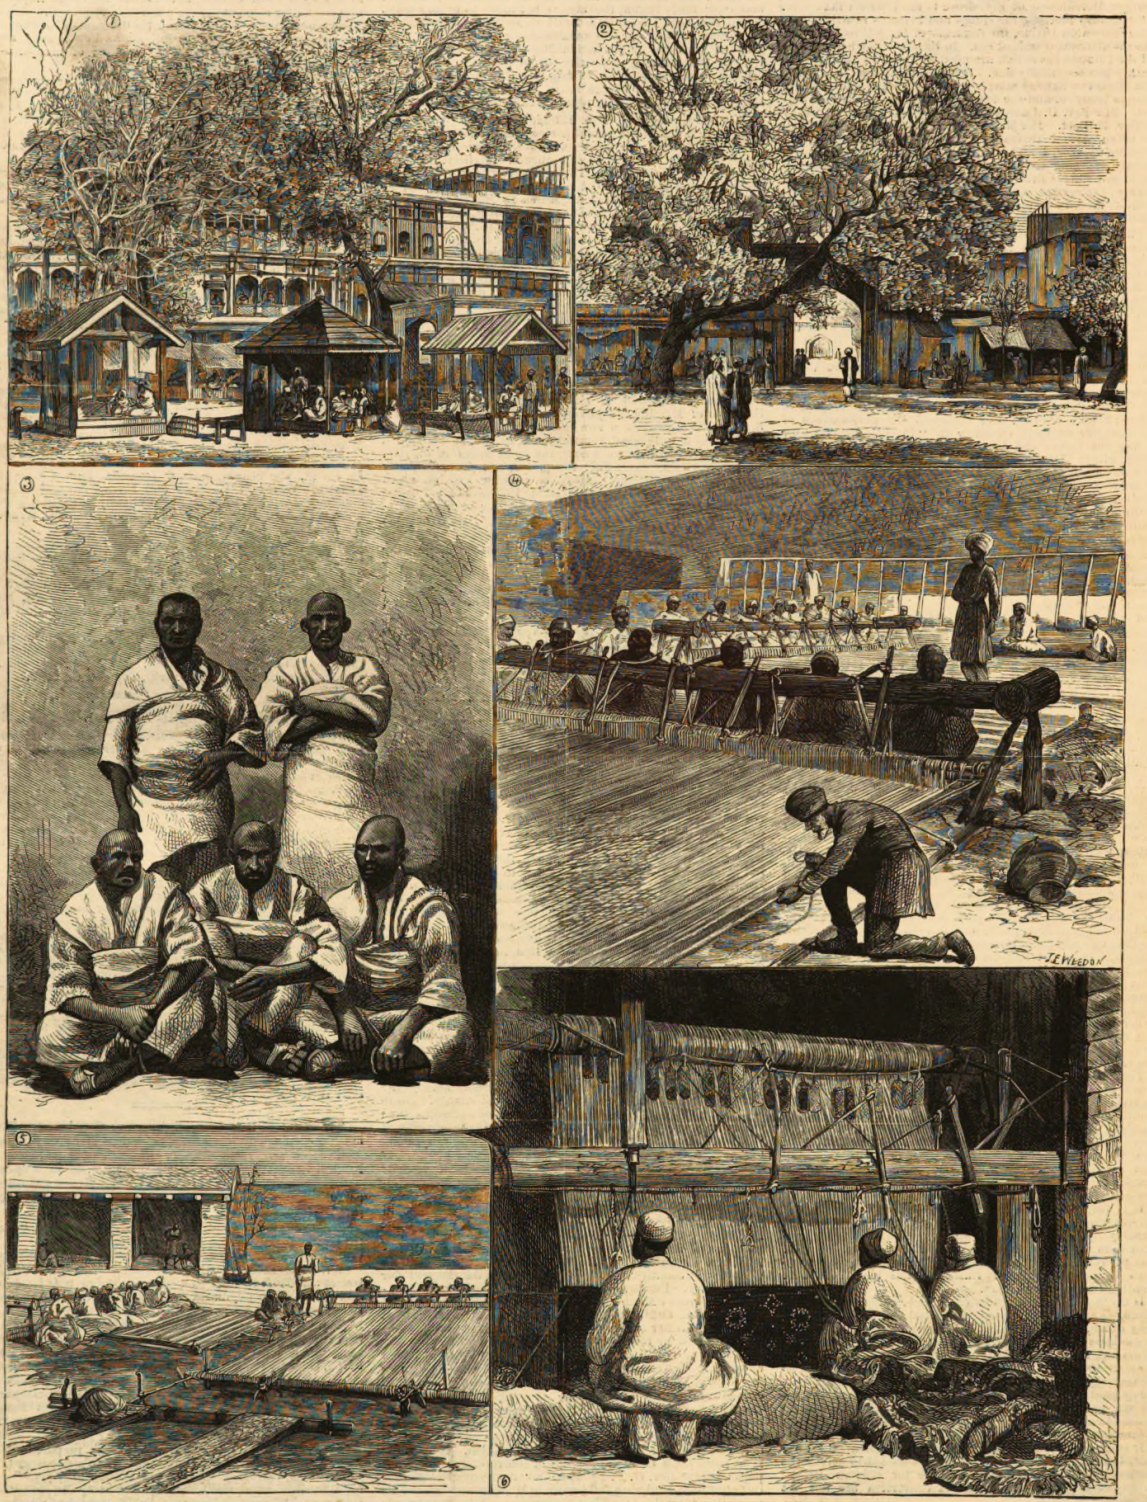
The Great Eastern Company's new section between Fordham and Mildenhall has been opened throughout for traffic.

The new gallery of Cetacea (whales and dolphins) at the Natural History Museum, South Kensington, has been opened.

It is stated that the project for an International Exhibition, to be held in Edinburgh in 1886, has been received with general approval.

Sir Stafford Northcote, M.P., on Tuesday opened the new premises of the Exeter Literary Society and addressed the company on the great value of literary taste and development.

Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, M.P., Postmaster-General, at Reading last week, alluded to his proposals for cheap telegrams, and said he hoped to popularise the parcels post, and to adapt it to international use.



The secretary of the Institute of Civil Engineers is instructed to say that after the dinner of the members on the 29th inst. there will be an informal private view of the Inventions Exhibition, more particularly of the electric lighting arrangements.

Mr. George Anderson, lately one of the members for Glasgow, has been presented with an address and a cheque for £1500, as a mark of the appreciation of the citizens of Glasgow for his faithful devotion to duty during the seventeen years he represented the constituency.

An excellent variety entertainment was prepared at the Royal Victoria Hall and Coffee Tavern, Waterloo-road, for Easter week, including the "Night Watch in Egypt"—the usual science lecture and ballad concert being discontinued in its favour. These will, however, be resumed next week, and be continued during the rest of the season.

The Revenue Returns for the financial year, as well as for the quarter ending on March 31, were published last week. The receipts for the quarter were £29,371,714, an increase of £2,533,227 as compared with the same period in 1884, while the revenue for the year was £88,043,140, a net increase of £837,926.

SKETCHES ON BOARD THE CUNARD STEAM-SHIP ETRURIA.

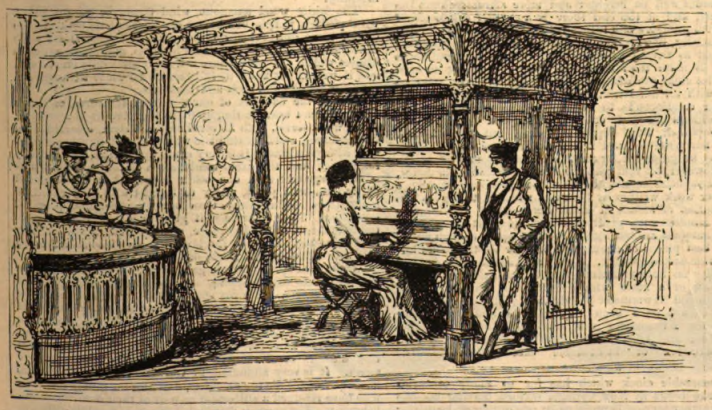
SMOKING SALOON.



In September, 1884, Messrs. John Elder and Co. launched from their yard at Govan a large steel screw-steamer for the Cunard Company, to supplement their service of express steamers between Liverpool and New York. The dimensions of the vessel are:—Length over all, 520 ft.; breadth, extreme, 57 ft. 3 in.; depth to upper-deck, 41 ft., and to promenade-deck, 49 ft.; with a gross tonnage of about 8000 tons. She is entirely built of steel throughout, and is divided into ten water-tight compartments, most of the bulkheads being carried up to the upper-deck, and fitted with water-proof and fireproof doors, giving access from one part of the ship to the other. By this arrangement the danger of fire spreading, should it break out in any division of the ship, is removed as far as possible, and greater safety is obtained by being able to isolate any apartment for sanitary purposes, or in case of damage to the hull and the compartment being flooded. The special care taken in providing for the safety of the ship and the lives on board entitles her to rank as a transport of the highest class, and she is entered on the Admiralty list, being specially constructed for the requirements of the "service" for mercantile auxiliaries in the time of war. She has five decks in all, including the promenade-deck, which extends over the breadth of the vessel for nearly 300 ft. amidships, and would be reserved for the use of first class passengers. The first class accommodation forms a special feature, and occupies the whole of the main and lower decks, with the exception of the portion set apart for the use of the crew. Altogether, accommodation can be provided for 720 first class passengers, the largest part of which is arranged for two-berth state-rooms only, which are replete with all fittings usual in the highest class of passenger steamers—a number of the rooms being fitted en suite for family use. The engines are made to indicate upwards of 14,000-horse power. They are compound, having three inverted cylinders—one high pressure 71 in. in diameter, and two low pressure each 105 in. in diameter. The high-pressure cylinder is placed between the two low-pressure cylinders, and all are adapted to a stroke of 6 ft.

The Etruria, of which we give an Illustration, besides a few Sketches of the ordinary passenger accommodation, drawn by an Artist who accompanied her trial-trip, is one of the steam-ships of different lines now selected by the Admiralty for temporary Government service as armed cruisers, and probably, in some instances, for the transport of troops. It was announced a week or two since that the Government had, in view of possible hostilities, secured four of the most modern, swiftest, and largest steamers in the British mercantile marine for warlike purposes. Messrs. Laird Brothers, of Birkenhead, who have been intrusted with the work by the Admiralty, have already begun the alterations that are found indispensable to convert the National Line steamer America into a ship-of-war. Built under the supervision of the Admiralty, all the great Atlantic liners are well adapted for the service for which the America, the Etruria, the Oregon, and the Alaska have been chosen; but as the primary object kept in view during their construction has been to produce the best possible mercantile steamer, before they can be armed considerable modifications are necessary. The primary requirements of the Admiralty are that the ships placed on the list should have adequate stability, and be divided into numerous water-tight compartments. In order to fit them for war service, the decks must be cleared of all the handsome provision made for passengers; the state-rooms, sleeping-berths, saloons, baths, and lavatories, with their elegant decorations and upholstery, must be removed; but all this can easily be replaced when the splendid "Liners" return into their owners' hands. The America will be armed with four five-inch Vavasseur guns, two on the forecastle and two on the poop; six 64-pounder guns, on the main deck, three on each side of the ship; six Nordenfeldt machine-guns, three on each side, on the upper deck; and four pinnaces for torpedo service. The intended armament of the Etruria cannot yet be precisely described. Mr. Mitchell, of the Admiralty, is superintending the equipment of the vessels in the Mersey.

THE STEAM-SHIP ETRURIA, ENGAGED BY THE ADMIRALTY FOR AN ARMED CRUISER.

Our Artist's Sketches of the luxurious interior arrangements for passengers, which were inspected and enjoyed on board the Etruria by the visitors during her pleasure-trip from Glasgow to the Irish coast, will find a significant contrast in the stern severity of naval and military living afloat, when the ship is prepared for Government service. There will be no pianoforte-room for ladies of musical accomplishments, or billiard-room and smoking-room for gentlemen desirous to kill their idle time on the voyage. On the lower deck, the sleeping bunks will give way to hammocks, slung up at night, which can be taken down and rolled up during the day, so as to make ample space for a large number of troops, with good ventilation and room for drill and exercise; mess-tables will be fitted between decks for the soldiers to eat their meals. The Oregon, another ship of the Cunard Line, considered one of the swiftest steamers yet launched, having run across the Atlantic outward in six days ten hours, with nine minutes to spare, is now being taken in hand by the Company's own workmen, under their superintendent Captain Watson, in the Alexandra Dock at Liverpool. We may still hope that none of these noble vessels, built for peaceful traffic and travel over the Atlantic, will be required to encounter the cannon of an enemy's fleet or batteries, and that they will soon be restored to their original use. The Admiralty have arranged with the Cunard Company to employ two ships for at least six months, and Government will have the power of purchasing them, if their permanent acquisition be desired.

NOVELS.

Excellent authority might be given for stating that the Dutch colouring which is among the most striking characteristics of Near Neighbours: by Frances Mary Peard (Richard Bentley and Son), is very accurately, as it certainly is very vividly and attractively, laid on. The story resolves itself into the study of a single character, the character of a young woman, who is no doubt an angel, but a very provoking angel, such a perfect being, such a scrupulous self-analyst, such a weigher of scruples, so regardful of trifles, so self-conscious, so inclined to make mountains out of mole-hills, that practical persons will have no patience with her, and will think that to conduct the affairs of life on her principles is to make much ado about nothing, and to behave as if time were no object, as if a "man could be sure that his life would endure for a thousand long years." It is true that, by the omnipotent interposition of the novelist, she marries her gawky professor within a reasonable period; but it would have served her right if she had been obliged to remain "on the shelf" all the days of the years of her life, though she had lived to the age of "Old Parr" or of Methuselah. Self-sacrifice is all very well, but it should be practised within sensible limits: no woman is bound to sacrifice her happiness and another's for a "feckless" being like the heroine's brother, for whom a strong-minded housekeeper should at once have been provided, until he found, as he soon does find and was sure to find very speedily, an equally strong-minded and a "managing" wife to take care of him and manage him and to rule and bully his family. It is almost a sin to encourage or indulge such a father as the heroine's brother; such a man is only fit to be dressed like a "buttons," and set to open the door to visitors who come to call on his family, as the father of the famous painter, Mr. J. W. M. Turner, used to open the door to the patrons and friends of his distinguished son. Readers, however, have good cause to rejoice that the writer of this blameless novel, which is complete in two by no means over-laden volumes, takes a different view of things; for when once you have got over the exasperating scrupulosity of the heroine and the pettiness of the reasons advanced for her self-sacrifice, a very interesting, picturesque, and touching tale awaits your perusal, fixes your attention, commands your admiration. The most moving incidents are two: a sleighing adventure which has a tragic end, and a flood, which has both tragic and other results. In each case the Dutch colour is, of course, conspicuous; and in each case the author displays descriptive and other powers of no common order.

The Scottish folk who figure in a subordinate capacity are the most entertaining as well as the most profane, if they are not the most interesting, among the personages introduced into Once For All: by Max Hillary (Sampson Low and Co.), which, though it has not much substance and not much variety, is a very readable story indeed. There is a very sweet portrait of a young girl, possessed of great wealth and beauty, and so blest by nature in the matter of phrenological "bumps" that nothing could ever "spoil" her, who is struck blind in a thunderstorm; and that is almost the only stirring occurrence in all the three volumes. The thunderstorm and its dreadful consequences are described with a considerable command of graphic force; but the strength of the novel lies chiefly in the sketches of character and in the dialogue, which is sometimes of the sentimental kind, sometimes full of playful banter, sometimes amusingly argumentative. One of the principal characters, however, a baronet who is in love with the blind heroine, is scarcely consistent with the author's conception of it: we are expressly told that the baronet was a gentleman, and he is evidently under the influence of manly and generous impulses at times, yet he is made to stoop to meannesses which such a man, according to psychological and conventional rules, could never have condescended to put in practice, either in love or war, whatever wickedness he may have been capable of. It is mean, no doubt, to turn a man out of his farm for not voting according to your dictation or wishes; but there is nothing cowardly about it, as there is about slandering a rival behind his back to win his lady-love from him, and suborning a worthless woman to become false witness in your favour. How a penniless but well-born and well-connected young musician, who has the usual objection of the musician to have his hair cut, and who is endowed with the soul of a man and the face of a woman, falls in love with the rich heroine, to whom he gives a few lessons and who is suddenly struck blind, as aforesaid; how the musician's love is returned by the heroine, and how by scandalous misrepresentations she is induced to promise that she will marry the inconsistently portrayed baronet;—that is the main purport of the story, which is very affectingly and passionately told in parts. The conclusion of it must be left to be imagined or to be discovered from personal investigation. There is also a subordinate or episodical love-story of the sprightly and comic sort; and, altogether, the novel may be described as a tale or tales of love, music, and treachery.

A very noble note is struck in The Shadow of a Crime: by Hall Caine (Chatto and Windus), which is a semi-historical novel, with a godlike hero, though he be but a Cumbrian dalesman, for its most prominent character. "Around a pathetic piece of jurisprudence," says the author, "I have gathered a mass of Cumbrian folk-lore and folk-talk with which I have been familiar from earliest youth." The familiarity is plainly to be perceived, without any personal knowledge of Cumberland on the reader's part, from the perfect ease and unmistakable confidence with which the author walks in paths and among scenery whither it is delightful to follow him. The piece of jurisprudence to which he refers appertains to an obsolete portion of the criminal law whereby a prisoner, who refused to plead, might be sentenced in the olden time to the singular and awful punishment of the "peine forte et dure." The prisoner, however, who died without opening his lips under this terrible torture, was understood to preserve thereby his property, or the property of his family, from confiscation, so that, if he had relatives depending upon him, he could preserve his or their estates, or both, to them by his resolute silence and his fearful sufferings. This the hero of the novel under consideration is bold enough to profess his intention of doing; and that is the cardinal incident of the story. His resolution, happily for the nerves of the reader, but unhappily for artistic completeness, is not put to the supreme test; but a compromise is effected whereby he is sentenced to a less appalling death for a vulgar murder. This unworthy compromise, though it gives the hero an opportunity of showing his calm contempt of death, cannot be accepted without protest, for it is an injustice, to mention so noble a character in the same breath with so ignoble an accusation, foully false as the charge is known to the reader from the very first to be. On the whole, however, the novel is one which it does the author great honour to have written, and which it should do a reader appreciable good to read. There have been novels in which the incidents have been more stirring, in which the interest has been more continuously sustained, in which the style of writing has been equally powerful with less exaggeration, in which the narrative has been less discursive, in which the lofty ideal has been worked up to with a closer regard for the fitness and worthiness of the surroundings; but it is very seldom indeed that there appears a novel so fine in conception, so heroic in tone, so healthy in its associations, so attractive, and so natural in its descriptions, so altogether good, sound, and improving.

A certain sort of modern society, with what may perhaps be called—for want of a better word—its pet crazes, and with more or less recognisable portraits of celebrities who live and move and have their being therein, is hit off with great brilliancy and, one would be inclined to say, uncommon verisimilitude, in Affinities: by Mrs. Campbell Praed (Richard Bentley), which is very appropriately described as "a romance of to-day." At the outset we make the acquaintance of a gentleman who, not being in the very best state of health, is strangely affected by some wild strains of unearthly, mystic music, which haunt him; who falls into some sort of trance, as he sits in his dress-clothes waiting to go down to dinner at the house whither he has come to pay a visit; who in that trance sees a mysterious, a tragic vision, wherein persons and things are indelibly impressed upon his senses; and who, when he arrives in the drawing-room on the way to dinner, is startled to find himself "told off" as the escort of a young lady whom, with her large dreamy eyes and other peculiarities, he recognises at once as the principal figures in his mysterious, tragic vision. It appears, too, that she, being a young lady of fortune, has a house (though she does not reside there much, if at all, oftener than the Queen resides in the apartments which, according to the veracious Mark Tapley, she shares "by virtue of her office with the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House") which, as regards its curious architecture, eccentric furniture, and general arrangements, corresponds exactly with what the gifted gentleman saw in his trance before dinner. It is useless, therefore, to suggest that ill-health and an empty stomach would fully account for the gentleman's day-mare; what he saw had real existence, and, as the conjurers say, there was "no illusion"; and readers, therefore, have nothing for it but to surrender themselves to the novelist and submit themselves to be regaled with two volumes of occult science, psychic force, astral bodies, mesmeric influence, dominating energies, and all the rest of it, until the very dream which was dreamed at the beginning of the first volume comes true to the minutest particular at the end of the second. Be it added that the story is very well put together, the dialogue clever and impressive of its kind, the narrative written with much vivacity, the interest—such as it is—maintained with spirit.

Some stories, like the popular "Called Back," without any very remarkable literary excellence to recommend them, take the reading world by storm in consequence chiefly of one original, telling, fascinating incident; and to the category of such stories it is not improbable that Charley Kingston's Aunt: by Pen Oliver (Macmillan and Co.), may have to be added. At any rate, the story depends for its interest, not on the literary composition, which is strange, if not actually faulty, and not on the tale of love which is unfolded, and is quite common-place, but upon a very original and ghastly occurrence. The story shows how a medical student, whilst engaged in dissecting a "subject," accidentally discovers that he is operating upon all that remains of his affectionate aunt, from whom he had once had great expectations, who married late in life a younger man than herself, who went with him to America, and had never since been heard of or seen by any of her friends until she, or what remained of her, was forwarded from the workhouse to the hospital, to be dissected by the disappointed nephew. The idea is very horrible and repulsive; but it is treated in a manner which reduces the horror and repulsiveness to a minimum. Beyond this shocking idea, there is absolutely nothing at all remarkable about the book, nothing new in what is said or done, for the most part; but there are some fairly interesting sketches of medical students, their mode of life (when they belong to the better, the hard-working, not the rowdy, sort), the persons with whom they have to do, and one of the best known of the institutions at which they may be taught, if they will learn; and, incidentally, some very important questions connected with cerebral lesion and complete or partial, chronic or temporary, loss of memory are touched upon. Everybody must recollect or have heard what a hit was made with the series of tales which it was pretended had been taken from the "diary of a late physician," though the author of them was a doctor of laws, not of medicine; and the story under consideration, very much curtailed, might very well take a place in that series, though there is reason to suppose that the author, on this occasion, has really some connection with the medical profession.

A very pleasant, wholesome, edifying story of true love is combined with a very unpleasant and even terrible, but at the same time pathetic and, it is to be feared, truthful picture of a loveless, mercenary marriage and its consequences in the three volumes entitled Straight as a Die: by Mrs. Edward Kennard (Chapman and Hall), a novel of excellent intention and, in many respects, of admirable execution. Perhaps there is scarcely sufficient substance and scarcely enough incident for a story of such length, but certainly the heroine is a most charming, graceful, and exemplary creation, and her sad fate is sketched both forcibly and touchingly. Fortunately, the tale is not all dark and gloomy: nothing could well be brighter and more attractive than the earlier part, and at the end there is a general dispersion of clouds, with glimpses of a future full of sunny promise. Such black treachery, however, as that which the heroine's mother is described as having practised against her sweet and noble daughter is more than flesh and blood can accept as even possible, let alone probable or natural; and a protest must be entered, with all deference, against the cruel sneer in which the writer condescends to indulge at the expense of our gallant soldiers for their conduct at Majuba Hill. It may be philosophical, such flippant jesting, but it is neither generous nor patriotic, and it shows ignorance of the effect which may be produced by panic on even the bravest of the brave. However, let that pass; it was the outcome, no doubt, of mere thoughtlessness. The title of the novel, and experience of a former work written by the same novelist, would lead to an expectation of scenes in which horse-racing and hunting would be handled with great skill and apparent knowledge; yet those subjects are but lightly touched upon, though one of the very best pieces of description has for its theme an improvised ride across country. The writer seems to be so good an authority on horsey matters, that it was probably a mere slip to talk of a mare which "combined the celebrated Touchstone and Newminster (sic) strains" (vol. iii., p. 246). No doubt it should have been "Touchstone and Birdcatcher strains," for Newminster was a son of Touchstone, and "Touchstone and Irish Birdcatcher" is commonly regarded as the "orthodox" or "fashionable" combination.

The venerable clock which has for so many centuries sounded the hours at New College, Oxford, having become unfit for further service, is replaced by one of new and superior construction from Mr. J. W. Benson's steam clock factory on Ludgate-hill. All the latest improvements have been introduced. The clock will strike the hours on a great tenor bell of 1 ton 3 cwt., and chime on eight smaller bells the well-known Oxford quarters.

A SPRING POSY.

It is frequently said that spring flowers are pale, and that there is no contrast of colour among them, but only a dull uniformity of half tints. This is somewhat of a libel on Nature, and shows a lack of intimate acquaintance with the wild flowers which the sun kisses into life as he shines out between the showers and gusts of boisterous wind that are the distinctive features of an English spring. What brighter and purer amber can we wish for than the golden velvet of the gorse, which, when seen in its full glory for the first time, so dazzled Linnæus that he fell on his knees and thanked God for the sight. And, then, its scent! What can be richer and more luscious than the odour of a bunch of gorse? If it were only as rare as the gardenia it would be as highly prized, always supposing that the prickles could be improved out of existence. Art and cultivation accomplish such wonders that perhaps some day we shall have a thornless gorse, specially grown for bouquets! Another deep-coloured spring flower is the purple orchis, which grows up, stark and strong, side by side with the primroses. Its tint is that of a purple stock or petunia, but, alas! the scent is anything but pleasant, and indoors it is scarcely bearable. Still, it is first cousin to the orchids, whose blossoms are just now Fashion's favourites, and has something of their curious charm. And is there any brighter blue than that of the dog-violet as it beams in the sunshine? And yet it is scarcely blue any more than it is bishop's purple, or lilac, or grey, or mauve. The exact colour is all its own, and most like that of the periwinkle; so if we are very hard put to it for a name, we can but borrow one from the great Worth and call it perveuche. He is an enthusiastic florist, and goes to Nature for his models, and, of course, that is how he discovered perveuche for the present season. There is no prettier flower to gather for a spring posy than the wild blue periwinkle: the leaves are so bright and glossy, and the blossoms look forth among them with such innocent faces. It is difficult to realise that the periwinkle, Vinca minor, belongs to the dog-bane family, that the milky juice of its stem is acrid, and its root bitter and astringent. And it seems almost incredible that our humble periwinkle is related to the oleander, and that the wood of the latter shrub, with its sweet-scented flowers, is terribly poisonous.

Professor Ruskin's description of spring flowers on the edge of a pine forest in the Jura is equally true of many an English "spinney," perhaps more especially of the beech woods that hang on the slopes of our rounded chalk hills, which are often intermingled with pines and larches. He calls them "Such company of joyful flowers as I know not the like of among all the blessings of the earth . . . coming forth in clusters crowded for very love. . . . There was the wood anemone, star after star, closing every now and then into nebulæ; and there was the oxalis, troop by troop, like virginal processions of the Mois de Marie . . . ivy light and lovely as the vine; and ever and anon a blue gush of violets, and cowslip-bells in sunny places . . . and the wild strawberry, just a blossom or two, all showered amidst the golden softness of deep, warm, amber-coloured moss."

The one omission in this delightful passage marks a great distinction between Alpine and English woods. Our beloved primroses, the joy of the land in early spring, are rare in most parts of Switzerland, and the oxlip and cowslip take their places, and grow in bountiful profusion. If we are to accept Mr. Grant Allen's theories as gospel, this may be altered in a few thousand years or so. Flowers take a long while to change their habits; but in the course of ages the cowslip, or primula veris, gives up developing its central stem with several blossoms on the top, and produces larger blooms, each with a single stem—that is to say, primroses. And what would our spring posy be without its wealth of primroses? They are the staple crop of our fields and woodlands during March and April, besides sending out a few harbingers to herald their coming in February, and leaving sundry loiterers, loth to depart, behind in May. Sweet and fresh, dewy and fragrant, softer than silk, more delicate in tint than anything that ever issued from mortal looms, they > expand their light and soul-like wings,

> Teaching us by most persuasive reasons
> How akin they are to human things.

In many woods and hedgerows where primroses will not flourish, wild hyacinths abound—blue-bottles, as the village children call them; blue-bells, as many of us say who are not sufficiently particular in marking the difference between the dainty hare-bells, which belong to the campanula tribe, and the bulbous sweet-scented hyacinths, which are the kindred of jonquils and narcissi. Here and there we gather white ones, but they are exceptions in our northern clime, and are found as far apart as in the woods at Cromer, and in those between Shanklin and Ventnor, in the Isle of Wight. There is in this latter neighbourhood a little hill that once was all woodland, where the blue hyacinths grow and bloom in such profusion that they form more than a zone of blue—a perfect cloud of blue discernible at a long distance, which can hardly be less lovely than the belt of gentians that Mr. Ruskin's friend saw on a mountain in the Tyrol one balmy spring morning.

The white wood anemone, wind flower or pasque flower, with pinkish purple blushes on the backs of its petals, is one of our most graceful spring flowers. It is only starry white in the sunshine, when it holds its head up, and opens out to its utmost width. At other times it droops gracefully on one side, and if we did not know its full face to be white we might add it to our list of pink buds and blossoms.

One of the choicest of our woodland treasures, so fragile that it will not bear binding up with other flowers in a nosegay, is the wood sorrel, with its coral root and stem, emerald green triplet leaves, and delicate little white bells, all lightly pencilled over with pale lilac. It is very small and brittle, but perfectly fairy-like; and the exact combination of colour in its flowers is only reproduced in one other instance, an old-fashioned hardy semi-wild plant, rarely to be met with, but called by generations further away than our grandparents, pencilled geranium. Some years ago it grew in a thick fringe outside the old Church of St. Lawrence, near Ventnor, known to fame as the smallest church in England. It may also sometimes be met with in Bucks and Derbyshire.

Another of spring's darlings, which, however, blooms when the anemones are dropping and the cuckoo singing, is the sweet woodruffe. It loves shady woods, and has a preference for sandy soils, and wherever the lily of the valley grows wild it may be found also. The leaves grow in whorls, and have a strong heliotrope-like odour even in winter, and the blossoms, which spring from the tops of the uppermost whorls, are like tiny clusters of diminutive white jessamine, and almost as sweet. It is very abundant in Germany, and is gathered in large quantities for the chemists, and also for good housewives who have retained a still-room as part of their domestic establishment. The essence distilled from it is a subtly-delicious flavouring called mai-trank, and a small quantity of it poured on a lump of ice and a few pieces of sugar in a bowl, which is then filled up with a bottle of hock and two of soda-water, makes a summer beverage far more delicate than claret-cup, and quite as cooling.

CRÊPE IMPÉRIAL, for Mourning Wear. It is all wool, and yet looks exactly like crêpe, as it has the crinkled or crimped surface which is inseparable from that fabric. It is solid and most durable, being free from the elasticity of the more perishable silk crêpe, which it so closely resembles, and yet it is glossy. It is made up effectively into costumes for deep mourning, when it is not compulsory to trim with crêpe, and will wear as long as the manner elects to use it.—Extract from "The Queen, the Lady's Newspaper."

THE "LOUIS" VELVETEEN IS
"The favourite and most fashionable material of the day."
THE WEAR OF EVERY YARD IS GUARANTEED by the Manufacturer, and every yard of the genuine bears the name
"LOUIS."

Patterns and prices post-free from nearly all drapers throughout the kingdom.

The strictest examiner may try every test of touch and sight without discovering that these are other than the Genoa Velvets which they so closely resemble, while the peculiar arrangements resulting in the fast woven pile enable them to stand interminable and rough wear, which would ruin real velvets at four times the price. For Costumes and Trimmings it is unequalled, and, in fact, for all purposes in which Silk Velvet may be used we specially recommend the "LOUIS" VELVETEEN.
Every yard of the genuine bears the name "LOUIS."

PUBLIC DEBT OF NEW ZEALAND.
CONVERSION of £5,772,500 NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT FIVE PER CENT CONSOLS.—The Governor and Company of the Bank of England Give Notice that, on behalf of the agents appointed by the Governor of New Zealand in Consol, under the New Zealand Consolidated Stock Act, 1877, the Amendment Act, 1881, and the Consolidated Stock Act, 1884 (sir Francis Dillon Bell, K.C.M.G., and Sir Penrose Goodchild Julyan, K.C.M.G., C.B.), they are authorised to invite holders of the debentures of the above loan to bring in their debentures for conversion on the following terms, viz.:—
For every one hundred pounds of such debentures a new debenture will be issued for the same amount, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum for seven years, from April 15, 1885, to April 15, 1892, when it will be converted into £100 New Zealand Four per Cent Consolidated Stock, inscribed at the Bank of England, which will rank pari passu with the Four per Cent Consolidated Stock already created and issued, and redeemable at par on Nov. 1, 1929.
Applications for conversion will be received up to April 30 next, inclusive.
The interest upon the new debentures will be payable by coupons in the same manner as upon the Consol Debentures—viz., Jan. 15, April 15, July 15, and Oct. 15, at the Bank of England, the first coupon being for the dividend due July 15 next.
Consol Debentures, from which the coupon due April 15 next must be detached, may be deposited at the Chief Cashier's Office, Bank of England, for exchange on or after Wednesday, the 15th inst. They must bear all coupons subsequent to that due April 15 next, and must be left three clear days for examination. Receipts will be given for the debentures deposited, and the new debentures will be issued in exchange as soon after as possible.
The usual annual drawing for redemption of the Consols will take place on Tuesday, March 31; debentures deposited before that date will not be affected by the drawing. Holders of Consol Debentures drawn for redemption, in respect of which no application for conversion has been made, will be allowed to receive, in exchange for each drawn debenture, a new debenture as above, upon payment of the sum of £4 per cent, provided application be made before April 15 next.
By the Act 40 and 41 Vict., ch. 59, the revenues of the colony of New Zealand alone will be liable in respect of the stock and the dividends thereon; and the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, and the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, will not be directly or indirectly liable or responsible for the payment of the stock or of the dividends thereon, or for any matter relating thereto.
Bank of England, March 6, 1885.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood stated publicly in Court that Dr. J. Collis Browne was undoubtedly the inventor of Chlorodyne; that the whole story of the defendant Freeman was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See the "Times," July 13, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—The Right Hon. Earl Russell communicated to the College of Physicians and J. T. Davenport that he had received information to the effect that the only remedy of any service in cholera was Chlorodyne.—See "Lancet," Dec. 31, 1853.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Extract from the "Medical Times," Jan. 12, 1856:—"Is prescribed by scores of orthodox practitioners. Of course, it would not be thus singularly popular did it not supply a want and fill a place."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the best and most certain remedy in Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Consumption, Neuralgia, Rheumatism, &c.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a certain cure in Cholera, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, &c.

CHAPTER XXII.

PLAIN LANGUAGE.

Heriot with difficulty resisted a desperate inclination to burst out laughing. He did not feel very merry; but the spectacle of a woman cast down into the depths of dejection because somebody had asserted that somebody else had asserted the unquestionable fact that she was no longer young had in it that mixture of the pathetic and the ludicrous which is more apt to excite laughter than the broadest farce. Probably nothing on earth could have moved Lady St. Austell more profoundly than the publication of that horrid little anecdote. If he were to appeal to the better part of her nature—and it had a better part, though so entangled with the worse one as to be hardly separable from it—if he were to tell her that, by toying with an idle fancy, she might quite possibly bring misery upon others in comparison with which her own present vexation was the merest childishness, she simply wouldn't understand him. She would see neither the comic nor the tragic side of the business. In her defective mental vision the great things of life were small, and the small great. It would have seemed to her as impossible that a woman should break her heart over the unfaithfulness of a husband or lover as it would to Clare Vidal that a woman should feel all light to have gone out of the world because people had discovered that her charms were on the wane. Lovers are replaced, and husbands are forgotten, Lady St. Austell might have said; but who can give us back our lost youth?

Heriot thought of all this while he listened to Lady St. Austell's eager and agonised questions. Did he believe that Mr. Vidal had really had anything to do with the insertion of that monstrous paragraph in the Anglo-Saxon? Did he believe that the Grand Duchess had really made the speech reported by Lord St. Austell? Could it have been the Grand Duchess who had said "Il faut savoir vieillir"? or could it—dreadful thought!—have been an even more distinguished personage?

Heriot answered her and pacified her to the best of his ability. He was quite sure that Adrian had had nothing to do with the paragraph complained of, nor indeed with any words printed in the Anglo-Saxon save such as surmounted his own signature. "As to what the Princes and Princesses may have said, you ought to be a better judge of that than I. They are reputed to be very good-natured, however, and I doubt whether they would make 'audible remarks' about anyone who was entertaining them. If you want to know what I think, I suspect that the Grand Duchess's speech was an invention of Lord St. Austell's. Whether he is also responsible for the newspaper story, I can't say."

"He could not be such a malignant wretch!" cried the injured lady. But, upon further reflection, she admitted that he was malignant enough for anything, and seemed to derive a good deal of comfort from that conviction. That such horrors should have appeared in print was very sad, very painful; but it was something to be able to believe that Royal and Serene Highnesses had been as much calumniated in the matter as herself. "I think," said she, musingly, "that I will write a note to Mr. Pilkington and tell him that he will be held personally responsible for this reckless insolence. He knows that I can make things very uncomfortable for him if he offends me."

And it may be stated here that Lady St. Austell actually did this, and that in the next number of the Anglo-Saxon appeared the following disclaimer:—"We regret to find that a foolish (and, as we are assured, absolutely baseless) report of certain remarks said to have been made by a Royal personage at the house of a lady of distinction has caused serious annoyance in more quarters than one. It must be distinctly understood that the items printed under the heading of Social Scraps are what they purport to be, merely gossip: that is, current rumours, which may or may not be true. Personally, we dislike and deprecate the publication of such trivialities, which the public taste, or want of taste, appears, nevertheless, to demand.—Ed. Anglo-Saxon."

But the above extraordinary editorial utterance did not, of course, see the light until nearly four weeks after the day with which we are at present concerned, and Lady St. Austell was, for the moment, less anxious to be avenged upon the Anglo-Saxon than to convince herself and her hearer that her husband, and he alone, was to blame for this anguish.

"This," she said, "is quite of a piece with what his conduct has always been. No sooner do I become attached to anyone than he makes himself so disagreeable that I am obliged to break with that person. It was very much in this way that he began to go on about poor Johnny Spencer, and I do think it is rather needlessly cruel of him, considering that I never dream of making a fuss about his flirtations, which, as you know, are a thousand times worse than mine."

"It's abominable," answered Heriot; "but it can't be helped. So, then, you will have to drop Vidal after all, you think?"

"I would drop anybody or anything rather than be so persecuted; but perhaps I shall not be driven to it. I hope I may not; for I feel sure that the poor young man finds some

c nsolation in my society, and, as I was saying before this sickening interruption took place, he really is very nice."

"I think you had much better drop him," said Heriot.

"But why? You are a friend of his, and you always say that you are a friend of mine too: why should you grudge us any few stray hours of happiness that we can manage to secure in this disappointing world?"

"Well," answered Heriot, "I will tell you why. Firstly, because these stray hours would give no happiness worth speaking of to you, and probably none whatever to him. Secondly because they would certainly cause unhappiness to Mrs. Vidal, who is also a friend of mine, and who has some slight claim to be considered. I don't say that it isn't very foolish of her to be jealous of you: in my opinion it is. But the fact remains that she is inclined to be so; and therefore I want you to make a little sacrifice for once and spare her annoyance."

"She ought not to be encouraged to be so selfish," returned Lady St. Austell, pouting.

Heriot was too displeased to be amused. "Selfish!" he exclaimed; "and pray, what are you? Did it ever occur to you, I wonder, that there is anything shameful or contemptible in the kind of life that you lead? To such a woman as Mrs. Vidal, you may be sure that it would seem almost inconceivably so. To get through the time somehow to flirt as long as flirting remains possible, to use a coronet on your notepaper, to be gaped at by inferior mortals and to tremble at the frown of a German Grand-Duchess—what noble ambitions!—what an ideal existence! I don't know whether you believe in Christianity; most likely you think nothing about the matter; but I suspect that, if you were driven into a corner, you would hardly have the courage to call yourself an infidel. Your cynicism is only skin-deep, like your loves, or platonic affections, or whatever you may be pleased to call them. You have never looked things deliberately in the face, as Lord St. Austell has, and said to yourself that you will eat and drink, for to-morrow you die. If you were told that you would literally have to die to-morrow, you would be frightened out of your wits—you know you would. You would send off post-haste for the parson, and see whether something couldn't be done with bell, book, and candle. Well, now let me advise you, as a friend, to do a good action or two while you can, so as to have something in hand when that day comes. And while I am being so candid, allow me to ask you one more question. Have you any lurking idea that you can get Adrian Vidal to fall in love with you? If you have, disabuse your mind of it. He is in love with his wife; and if he were not, he would be no more likely to become enamoured of you than I am. Try to believe that, for it is the truth; and then, perhaps, you may find it a little more easy to set Mrs. Vidal an example of unselfishness."

This diatribe, which was not at all in Heriot's usual style, so astonished Lady St. Austell that at first she suspected him of having suddenly gone out of his mind. Then she thought she would quarrel with him; but her indomitable good nature got the better of this impulse, and she ended by laughing a little nervously.

"After that," said she, "I think I had better retire to my bed-room and reflect upon my sins. I am sorry to be obliged to send you away; but it is getting rather late and I am dining out to-night."

Heriot had no objection to being sent away. He did not want to weaken the effect of his outburst by further speech; and, as he withdrew, he flattered himself that he had at least made some impression upon her ladyship. Had he spoken with less heat, he might have chosen his words more carefully, and thus avoided producing an impression which was hardly calculated to further the end that he had in view. A few hours later, only two assertions out of his harangue remained in Lady St. Austell's memory—namely, that in Mrs. Vidal's eyes she was shameful and contemptible, and that it was out of her power to make Mr. Vidal fall in love with her. That being so, it was scarcely surprising that the dislike which she already felt for Mrs. Vidal should have been intensified, or that she should have determined to show that Mr. Vidal could be made to fall in love with her quite as easily as other people had been.

CHAPTER XXIII.

PODDLY JOKE.

It is a long lane that has no turning. The First of August came at last, as all days come, some slowly, some quickly, some bringing good things and some evil, according to the beneficent law of compensation which makes the world go round. Thus, what caused joy to Clare Vidal was matter for regret to others, and a sorrowful man was Mr. De Wynt when the day approached on which the house in Alexandra-gardens was to be closed to him for some months to come. He dined with his friends on the last evening, and played a succession of such mournful little dirges after dinner that Clare's heart was moved with pity, and she crossed over to the piano to try and comfort him.

"So it's all over, Mrs. Vidal," he said.

"Oh no, it isn't," answered Clare; "we are only going away for a short holiday, all of us. I suppose you are going, too."

"Yes; I shall have to go and stay with an uncle of mine, who says he means to leave me all his property, and who takes his equivalent out of me beforehand by making me trudge over acres of arable land with him every day. I don't call that much of a holiday, you know. And I shall be back in London again long before you are."

"We shall be back in the beginning of the winter," said Clare. "And perhaps," she added, "we may induce Georgina to come and stay with us again then."

"Yes, if she hasn't started for Greenland's icy mountains or Afric's coral strand by that time," observed De Wynt, ruefully.

"You must prevent her from doing that," said Clare.

"Oh, I can't, you know. What little influence I have with Miss Vidal is due simply to my careful self-effacement. If I were to assert myself, she would knock me down and jump upon me at once—so to speak."

"If you allow yourself to be jumped upon, jumped upon you will be," observed Clare. "You ought not to allow it. Shall I let you into a secret? If you want to increase your influence with Georgina, you had better treat her with a little less deference. Don't you know that men are born to command and women to obey?"

The little man put his head on one side and considered this. "Well," he said at length, "I shouldn't wonder if you were right. But, seriously, Miss Vidal is so much my superior that I can't quite imagine myself ordering her about."

"Mr. De Wynt," said Georgina, coming up at this moment, "You are to be at the Great Western Terminus at nine o'clock to-morrow morning, please, to say good-bye to Mr. and Mrs. Vidal; and after that, you can drive with me to the Brighton station and take my ticket for me."

This, at all events, was an order to which no objection could be made, and it struck Clare as a hopeful sign that Georgina, who was so very well able to take care of herself, should think it necessary to secure an escort from Paddington to Victoria.

But in truth her thoughts were, at this time, not quite so much at the service of her neighbours as usual, and it must be owned that as soon as she found herself seated in the railway-carriage, opposite Adrian, and speeding westward as fast as an express-train could carry her, she straightway forgot those whom she was leaving. Indeed, she asked for nothing better than to forget. To forget London, and the butcher, and the baker, and the terrible cook—yes; and to forget other troubles than these, if only that were feasible. Her heart grew lighter with every league that was placed between her and the hated metropolis. The panacea which had suggested itself to Adrian suggested itself also to her, and it seemed to her that when once they were at Cardrew again, all would be well. Almost before she had realised that they were really off at last, they had left Swindon behind them and were tearing away again towards Bath and Bristol. Then, as the day wore on, came Exeter; then after some slackening of speed, Plymouth, where speed ceased altogether and the familiar jog-trot of the dear old Cornwall railway began.

Meanwhile, Adrian, who had been reading the papers a little and sleeping a good deal, had been furtively watching his wife's face in the intervals of slumber, and had in some measure read her thoughts. He, too, longed to forgive and forget; he, too, was not sorry to have bidden farewell to London for a season, and cherished hopes of happier days to come. So that here were two people eager to kiss and be friends, and the only question was which of them should speak the first word.

That neither of them did speak it was owing to the melancholy circumstance that neither of them felt disposed towards unconditional surrender. Each firmly believed the other to be in the wrong; and, though ready to forgive, could not conscientiously ask to be forgiven. And as there was no open quarrel between them, there could be no sudden peace-making; nor, as it turned out, any gradual one either.

The first few days at Cardrew were entirely delightful ones for Clare. The clamorous welcome of the boys, her mother's excited garrulity, Mr. Irvine's placid contentment, and all the old home sights and sounds from which she had been separated for so long, were sufficient to satisfy her soul for that length of time. But then she began to feel the difference that a year had made in her life. There were no more long walks with Adrian now—neither he nor she would have dreamt of proposing such a thing; instead of devising stratagems to escape the company of her brothers, she found herself striving to accomplish just the contrary result; there was a difficulty in getting through the hours which was quite new to her, and gradually her spirits sank to almost as low a level as they had reached in London. Indeed, a sense of disappointment, of something being wanting, extended to the whole party—even to Mrs. Irvine, who said she was afraid she must be growing old.

"Not that I haven't plenty of activity left in me yet; but I don't enjoy hurrying about as I used, and I suppose we must look upon that as a symptom. What will happen to Polruth when I die is more than I can imagine! One is bound to believe that the world will manage to get on somehow after one's death, just as it did before one was born; but I can't help thinking that for a time everything will be at sixes and sevens. There are those wicked Pentire lads, for instance, who will persist in going about robbing hen-roosts. They would have been in a reformatory long ago, if it hadn't been for me; and though you may say that that would have been a good thing for the community, it wouldn't have been at all a good thing for their poor mother. And that is only one case out of many. Without vanity, I do think I shall be missed."

Such sad forebodings were not of a nature to dispel the gloom which had fallen upon the household, and the arrival of Heriot did not greatly improve matters. Mrs. Irvine confided to him that she felt uneasy about her daughter, and asked him whether he did not think her looking ill and miserable; but he only replied that, though Clare did indeed seem to be a little out of sorts, it was best to take no notice of these vague maladies, for which rest and fresh air were the best cures. To him there was nothing vague in the nature of Clare's malady; but it was certainly one which notice was more likely to increase than to diminish, and he accordingly endeavoured to remain unconscious of it; in which effort, as a matter of course, he failed as signally as Clare and Adrian did in their attempts to behave as though they were upon friendly terms.

> In many ways doth the full heart reveal
> The presence of the love it would conceal;
> But in far more th' estranged heart lets know
> The absence of the love which yet it fain would show.

Mrs. Irvine, who was not a particularly keen observer, and had, besides, a happy faculty of ignoring what she did not wish to see, perceived nothing more than that her daughter was not in the best of health; but Heriot, as the young people knew, was less easily hoodwinked; hence the intercourse of these three, which had formerly been so pleasant, became a trifle strained and painful. However, they kept up appearances, avoided perilous allusions to by-gone days, went on excursions together, which all of them found rather long, and made frequent use of the boat, now commanded by Charley, in the absence of the more experienced Bob.

That strange perversity which leads us all to pride ourselves upon our proficiency in what we are most ignorant of caused Charley to fancy that he knew something about sailing, even as it had once deluded his brother into taking charge of a dog-cart freighted with valuable lives; and his eagerness to push a cruise somewhat beyond the well-known limits of Polruth Bay was not to be withstood by persons who were beginning to persuade themselves that they really didn't much care whether they were drowned or not. So one day Charley got out the ordnance map and pointed out upon it a diminutive creek, which, he said, could be easily reached in two hours with a fair wind, and which is known by the amazing name of Poddly Joke. Searchers after the picturesque in North Cornwall will be aware that the term Joke—or Choke, as some prefer to write it—is not of uncommon occurrence in those parts, as applied to an inlet of the sea (the derivation of Poddly awaits an interpreter); and admirers of Mr. Brett's pictures will be familiar with the colouring which renders such places remarkable. Poddly Joke, seen at low water on a fine day, has an attraction for the artistic eye—beyond that bestowed upon it by white sands, dark-blue sea, and a background of green hills—in the curious bloom which overspreads its rocks, and which, on closer inspection, is discovered to be caused by an incrustation of myriads of mussels; and as this phenomenon (at least so far as Charley Irvine and the present humble chronicler are aware) is peculiar to the Cornish coast, it seemed only right that a stranger like Mr. Vidal, should be made acquainted with it.

Adrian offered no objection to Charley's proposal; but perhaps neither he nor his wife would have consented so readily, could they have foreseen that at the last moment Heriot would be prevented by a slight attack of illness from accompanying them. Between four people conversation can always be kept up; but when there are only three in a boat, and when the attention of one of them is concentrated wholly upon navigation, the remaining two may under certain circumstances find the task of entertaining one another a little difficult. Yet there are conditions which seem to make silence natural, and as Clare and Adrian were wafted out of Polruth harbour by a light north-easterly breeze, they felt that there was nothing oppressive in the drowsy taciturnity which fell upon them. The weather, Charley averred, was precisely what it ought to be. The glass, it was true, had gone back a little during the night, and away to the south-westward the haze had a somewhat dark appearance, as though clouds might be massing up behind it; but the change, if there was going to be one, would certainly not come for another two tides, and the wind, supposing that it held, would serve them almost as well for returning as for going.

In the meantime, it was fortunate that all three occupants of the boat happened to be good sailors, for there was a long swell running, which increased after they had rounded Polruth Head, and which ended by giving Adrian matter for reflection. "How are you going to land us, Charley?" he asked, after a time.

"Oh, we shall run the boat up on the beach somewhere," answered Charley, airily.

"But my good fellow, you can't beach a boat just when and where you please, and with this swell, you might easily run her into a surf that would convert her into match-wood in precious quick time. Which way does the place with the sweet-sounding name face?"

"How on earth should I know? I've only been there once in my life, and it didn't occur to me to take its bearings at the time. West by south, or something near that, I should say."

"And the sea is at present running from the south-west, as perhaps you haven't noticed. I don't pretend to your nautical knowledge; but that looks to me very much as if the wind meant backing before long."

"Oh, well, if we can't land, we can't," answered Charley. "I dare say you'll be able to get a very good idea of the place without going on shore; and as for the wind backing, that'll be all the better for us. We shall only have to run home before it."

"Yes—if we don't get too much of it. Do you know, Charley, I think we might as well give this up for to-day. The sea is rising every minute, and there's a look about the sky that I don't altogether like."

"Why, what do you think is going to happen?" asked the other, contemptuously.

"I think it's going to blow, that's all."

"And if it does? Little do you know the sea-going qualities of the Midget! I'd undertake to sail her from Polruth to St. Ives in half a gale of wind."

"I have no doubt you would undertake a great many insane things with a light heart; but it don't follow that I wish my funeral to be undertaken just yet. I vote for getting about without loss of time."

"Bosh!" growled Charley, who had that fine belief in himself which distinguished the Irvine brotherhood, and who did not much care about being dictated to by Londoners. "What do you vote for, Clare?"

Clare had not paid much heed to the discussion. She was sitting with her back towards the disputants, her elbow resting on the gunwale and her cheek on her hand. She started and turned round on being addressed. "Oh, I don't care," she answered. "Do as you think best. Perhaps we had better go on, now that we have come so far."

"Clare doesn't know anything about it," cried Adrian, impatiently.

"Come to that, I'm not sure that you know a great deal about it yourself," retorted Charley.

For a moment Adrian was half inclined to quarrel with the boy, whose tone was disagreeably aggressive; but he reflected that, after all, the boat was not his, and he disliked rows. So, with something of a laugh, he said, "Take your own way, then; only don't blame me if three corpses are laid out on the shining sands to-morrow morning."

"I'll promise not to say a word if I'm one of 'em," answered Charley, his good-humour returning with the submission of his opponent. "It's all right, my dear chap. I ought to know something about this coast, seeing that I was born and bred here, and I've never drowned anybody yet."

"Never had the chance, perhaps," muttered Adrian; but he said no more, not liking to appear over-timorous, and at this moment the sun, which had become gradually obscured by a thin veil of mist, suddenly burst forth, as if to show that there was no ground for his apprehensions.

For a considerable time nobody spoke. Charley was whistling softly, and every now and then relinquishing the tiller to raise his hands as though he were holding a gun and take an imaginary shot at a gull over-head; Clare, who had brought a book with her, had opened it and was pretending to read; while Adrian, with his hands in his pockets and his head thrown back, was trying to hit upon something terse and original to say about M. Zola and his school in the next number of the Anglo-Saxon. He was not very successful, for the slow motion, the silence, and the salt-laden atmosphere were less adapted to stimulate the brain than to induce that pleasant vacuity of mind which commonly precedes slumber, and his thoughts wandered idly away in all directions until he ceased attempting to control them. But off Towan Head the breeze fell light, and then died away altogether, the sail flapping and cracking as the little boat rolled heavily in the ever-increasing swell.

"This is very disagreeable," remarked Clare, rousing herself and shutting up her book. "Are we likely to be becalmed much longer, do you think?"

"I don't think we are," answered her husband, with an upward glance.

The sun had vanished again by this time; the sky had changed from silvery grey to a dull leaden hue, and overhead detached streamers of scud were sailing up from the south-west. Even as Adrian spoke, a sudden puff of wind caught them and swept past, making a dark shadow upon the water, and bringing with it a few drops of rain.

"Just catch hold of those brails, Adrian, will you," said Charley, "and haul on them when I tell you. Clare, you might as well take the sheet, if you don't mind. No, not like that!—don't let it slip through your fingers!"

But, indeed, it was no such easy matter for a lady to retain command over the sheet, which was tugging against her like a live thing; for now the wind had overtaken them in good earnest, and the Midget was tearing through the water at a speed which soon made it necessary to shorten sail. The sea was covered with white caps, and what with the spray and the stinging rain, our three mariners, who had omitted to provide themselves with macintoshes, were wet through in five minutes. Adrian glanced at Clare, who looked a little startled, but did not seem to be frightened, and then at Charley, whose face expressed considerable uneasiness. The latter nudged him presently, and, pointing to a stretch of sand dimly visible through the rain and mist, called out, "Poddly Joke! Do you see?"

"I see Poddly, if that's its name," growled Adrian; "but hang me if I can see the joke! What the devil are you going to do, man?" he asked, seeing that Charley had relieved Clare of the sheet, and was now steering straight for the shore.

"Beach her," replied the other laconically.

"You can't, you lunatic!"

"Must," answered Charley, in a low voice; "it's our only chance. We couldn't live in such a sea as there'll be in another hour. As it is, I think we shall just manage it, because the surf can't be really very bad yet; but we shall get a ducking, of course.—Don't make a row, there's a good chap; I don't want to frighten Clare. You must look after her. You know what to do, and I've seen you swim."

Adrian was a good swimmer, certainly; but it seemed doubtful whether that accomplishment would stand him in much stead now. He moved forward a little and looked towards the shore, which they were rapidly approaching, and where he could make out the figures of three men, who were waving their arms and apparently shouting directions. Neither their voices nor their gesticulations, however, were intelligible, and if they had been, it would probably have been too late to profit by them. When Adrian heard the thunder of the breakers and saw the long stretch of white foam ahead, his heart stood still. But there was no use in talking about it. He hooked his arm firmly into Clare's and led her to the extremity of the bows.

"Listen, Clare," he said; "the moment you feel the boat touch you must jump—don't fall if you can help it—and run for your life. I shall keep tight hold of you. Do you understand?"

She nodded; and Adrian noted with a slight glow of pride that she neither trembled nor wasted her breath in needless words. If they were to be drowned, it would be no fault of hers, at all events.

They were in the broken water now; the bewildering whiteness of the surf was all round them; the boat was lifted high, and Adrian stiffened his muscles for a spring. But by bad steering they missed the crest of the wave which should have carried them on; it raced past them; the boat seemed to halt and stagger; and Adrian, knowing what must come, shouted, "Now, Clare!" and jumped over.

At the same instant he was knocked clean off his legs, and with a roar of waters in his ears and a confused sense of being swept into eternity, darkness closed in upon him.

When he came to himself, he was sitting upon the sand, surrounded by a little group, one member of which caught him by the arm as he tried to stand, and staggered dizzily. "You'm a bit mazed yet, Sir," said this stalwart individual. "'Twur the mast as knocked you silly; but 'tis only a bit of a bruise, and the young lady she 've got no hurt."

"It's all right, Adrian," chimed in Charley, whose dripping figure now came to the front. "That last wave snapped the mast, and I suppose it must have caught you on the back of the head as it fell. Clare and I were rolled up, none the worse, except that we had all the breath knocked out of us."

"What has become of the boat?" asked Adrian, still a little uncertain as to where he was and what had happened.

"Oh, the boat has gone to glory; and I'm bound to say that I rather think we should have followed her, if it hadn't been for our good friends here."

"Seemeth as us was sent down providential," remarked the first speaker. "If you'd ha' done as we telled 'ee, Sir, and bore away under the land yonder, we might ha' saved the boat; but 'tis sinful to complain when no lives is lost."

This was quite the view taken by the late occupants of the Midget, who were soon able to walk to a neighbouring farmhouse, where a change of clothing was found for them. Clare was a good deal bruised and shaken; but she did not think it worth while to mention this in answer to Adrian's inquiries, and assured him that a wetting was no new experience to her. He attributed her gravity and her brief replies to the natural effect of the shock which she had received, not knowing what a terrible moment she had passed through when she had seen her husband stretched, apparently lifeless, upon the shore.

She and he were left alone together before long, for Charley had set off to Newquay to procure a conveyance; and as they sat in the little parlour of the farmhouse, before the fire which had been kindled for them, it seemed as if now or never must be the time for them to compose their differences. Yet neither of them spoke for five minutes or so, and when Adrian at last opened his lips it was only to observe:

"That was a near thing, Clare."

"Oh, yes!" she answered, catching her breath. And then, with a sort of sob, "I thought you were dead!"

"Did you? And I let you go, after all. What should I have done if you had been drowned and I had been washed up alive? I'll tell you what, Clare; I'm going to give those three fellows ten pounds apiece. The price of a magazine article—h'm! Well, perhaps we ought to double it; but I am a poor man. What do you think? Are we worth more than fifteen pounds each?"

"I don't know," answered Clare, looking at the fire; "I don't think I'm worth much." She rose and crossed to her husband's chair, saying timidly, "Adrian, were you much hurt?" She passed her hand over the back of his head, where indeed there was a very respectable bump. "Oh, you poor boy!" she exclaimed, "it must pain you dreadfully! May I bathe it?"

Adrian burst out laughing, with tears in his eyes, and caught her by both hands. "May you? No, you may not; because it doesn't want bathing. Oh! Clare, don't you think we are a couple of fools?"

Clare dropped upon her knees beside him, and buried her face on his shoulder. "I have been so miserable!" she murmured, brokenly. "I want to make friends again. Will you?"

It is to be supposed that Adrian's answer must have been of a satisfactory nature; for when Charley returned, full of apologies for having been absent such an unconscionable time, he was assured, in the face of patent facts, by those whom he had kept waiting that he had not been away an hour.

At a meeting of the Royal National Life-Boat Institution, held on the 2nd inst. at its house, John-street, Adelphi, rewards amounting to £259 were granted to the crews of life-boats of the institution for services rendered during the past month, and payments amounting to £5030 were made on the 286 life-boat establishments of the institution. During the past three months the institution has contributed, by its life-boats and other means, to the saving of 223 lives from different wrecks, besides helping to rescue six vessels from destruction. Among the contributions lately received were £50 from her Majesty the Queen (annual subscription); £1000 from Miss F. A. Bass, to provide a new life-boat for Sidmouth to be named the William and Frances; £500 from Miss Harris, of Clapton, for a life-boat to be named the Escape; and £210 from Miss Howis, to defray the cost of three years' maintenance of her life-boat at Silloth. New life-boats have been sent during the past month to Plymouth, Silloth, Ferryside, Totland Bay, and Cloughey Bay, and it was decided to send a new one possessing all the latest improvements to Bridlington in lieu of the boat at present on that station.

PROBLEM No. 2142.
By A. HERMAN.

White to play, and mate in two moves.

In the person of Mr. Punch, a new chess champion appeared last week at the time-honoured "Divan in the Strand." Perched on a pedestal, with a handkerchief blindfolding his mirthful eyes, and one of Simpson's "Lavanagas" in his laughing mouth, Mr. Punch, as drawn by Mr. Henry Faunis cheerily challenges the wide, wide world, in the persons of many of the notabilities of the smaller world of chess. Beneath him sits the "Frenchman," heedless, as usual, of aught but the chessboard he contemplates; and close by is Herr Steinitz divesting himself of his coat preliminary to accepting the défi. Mr. Hewitt, with Mr. Potter, an earnest listener, is discussing a problem with Mr. Abbott, and from the surprise expressed in that clever and genial composer's face, we might infer that the problem is one of his compositions—"cooked." At the other side of the room, Dr. Zukertort is thoughtfully examining a position, with the Rev. Mr. Wayte for an adversary, and looking on is the hero of a hundred fights and feats, the incomparable "Mars." Among the other spectators of the battle are Mr. H. F. Gastineau, the popular vice-president of the City Chess Club, Mr. Hoffer of the Field, and Mr. Dunnisthorpe. Other faces, well known in metropolitan chess circles, fill the scene; the central figure, Sir Robert Peel, M.P., dominating the whole, as becomes a vice-president of the newly-formed British Chess Association. It is needless to say that the assembly is a sort of tobacco parliament. Everyone smokes, and the ascending clouds from pipes and cigars form fantastic shapes of embryo chess pieces gradually developing into a chess problem depicted on the ceiling. We fancy we have seen this problem before, but believe it will bear reproduction, if for no better reason, because of its association with Mr. Punch's first appearance at the "Chess Divan in the Strand."

White: K at Q 7th, Q at Q B 2nd, Kt at Q R 3rd, B at K Kt 5th, P. wn at Q B 5th. (Five pieces.)
Black: K at Q 4th, R at Q 5th, Pawns at K 4th and Q R 3rd. (Four pieces.)

Besides their own annual chess-match, the Universities contested several others during the "Boat-Race Week." Among the most interesting of these was the contest between the third-class division of the City Chess Club and the combined forces of the Universities, twenty a side; and a similar match, in which much smaller forces on both sides were engaged, with the St. George's Club. The City match attracted a crowd of spectators, play commencing at six o'clock and terminating at ten, when Dr. Zukertort, who acted as umpire, adjudicated on all the unfinished games. The result was a victory for the City Club with a score of 11½ to 8½. In the match with the St. George's Club, there were but eight competitors a side, and here the Universities sustained another defeat, the first-named club winning by 4½ games to 3. Dr. Zukertort again acted as umpire, but, as the match was brought to a conclusion before the dinner-hour, he was not called upon to exercise his functions.

We note with great satisfaction that what our American cousins would call a chess "boom" is passing over Ireland. Among the practical indications of this chess "revival" are the organisation of an Irish Chess Association, recently referred to in this column, and the foundation of a new Chess Society in Dublin, which promises to rival in numbers and enthusiasm the most important of these on this side of the Channel. The St. Patrick's Chess Club was inaugurated on the 21st ult., Dr. Mason presided, when eighty-one members were enrolled and a governing body appointed. The presidents are Messrs. G. F. Barry, Parker Dunscombe, Thomas Long, B.A., Dr. Mason, and Porterfield Read. The Rev. G. A. Macdonnell and Mr. P. T. Duffy were elected honorary members, a distinction which we can assure our friends in Dublin is greatly valued by these gentlemen.

The St. Patrick's Chess Club was but a week old when its members established what the late Herr Löwenthal was wont to call an "organ," but is here modestly and correctly described as a "pamphlet." The "Pamphlet" opens with a problem in three moves on a printed diagram. The other seven pages are manuscript and comprise chess jottings, notes, and three games well annotated, the whole forming one of the most quaint and interesting chess chronicles that has ever come under our notice.

The following item is quoted from the "Pamphlet":—"On Easter Monday conversazione and meeting to form the Irish Chess Association will be held in the Molesworth Hall, where, by the indefatigable exertions of Mr. T. B. Rowland, the honorary secretary, the necessary accommodation for this and all future meetings of the Association will be provided." We greatly regret that, as we go to press with this part of the Paper on Saturday, April 4, we are unable in this issue to record the brilliant success we anticipate for this meeting.

Mr. Arnold Power has collected the letters written by his brother, Mr. Frank Power, and they have been published, under the title "Letters from Khartoum," by Sampson Low and Co. The letters are given exactly as they were written, save that allusions to private family matters have been omitted.

The Queen has approved of the grant of Civil List pensions of £200 a year to Mrs. Hamill Stewart, and £100 a year to each of the two Misses Hamill Stewart, the mother and sisters of the late Colonel Hamill Stewart, in recognition of his services in connection with the defence of Khartoum.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated May 10, 1883), with four codicils (dated July 11, 1883, and Jan. 17, Feb. 11, and May 23, 1884), of Mr. Henry Browne Alexander, late of The Laurels, Barnes, Surrey, who died on Feb. 20 last, at No. 5, Chichester-terrace, Brighton, was proved on the 20th ult. by William Henry Alexander, the son, and Lloyd Tudor White, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £558,000. The testator appoints certain trust funds, amounting to over £18,000, and the estates at Brompton and Kensington held under his marriage settlement, to his said son, but he charges these estates with the payment of a sum of more than £221,000; as to the last-named sum, he gives one fourth of a moiety to his said son, and one moiety and three fourths of the other moiety to his daughter Mrs. Everilda Frances Jowers. His estates at Highgate, Gate-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields, Charlton Marshall, and all his real estate in the county of Dorset, and at Brighton, he devises to the use of his son, for life, with remainder to his children as he shall appoint; his estate at Barnes, in the events which have happened, to the use of his daughter Mrs. Jowers, for life, with remainder to her children as she shall appoint; and the residue of his real estate to his said son and daughter, and to his daughter Mrs. Shadwell, who predeceased him without leaving issue. There are very numerous pecuniary legacies, and the residue of the personalty he bequeaths to his son and two daughters; his bequest to Mrs. Shadwell, however, lapses by her death, and her share becomes divisible between the surviving son and daughter.

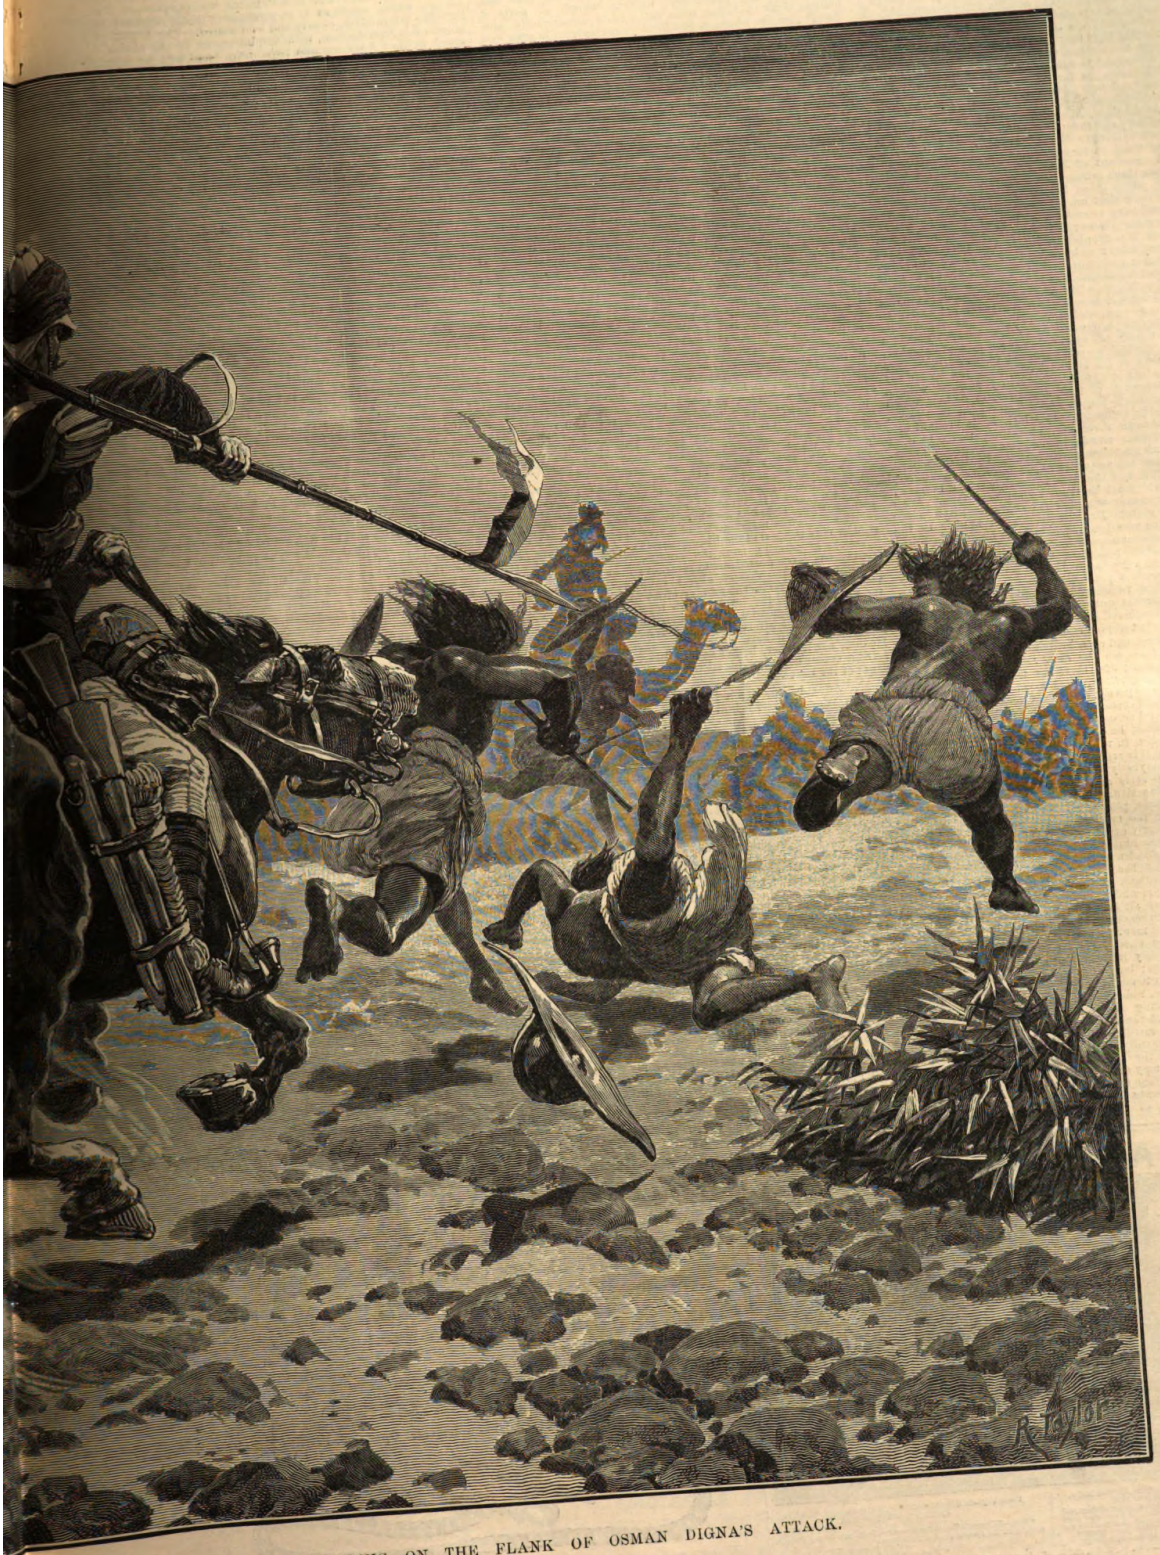
The will (dated Dec. 29, 1884) of Mr. James Meakin, late of Darlaston Hall, in the county of Stafford, senior partner in the firm of J. and G. Meakin, of Eagle Works, Hanley, who died on Feb. 8 last, was proved at the Lichfield district registry on the 27th of the same month by the executors, George Meakin and William Meakin, the brothers, and George Frank Paddock, the value of the English personalty amounting to £198,102. The testator bequeaths to his wife, Mrs. Emily Meakin, all his horses, carriages, furniture, plate, linen, china, pictures, wines, farming stock, and effects at Darlaston, and a legacy of £1500; he also devises to her, for life, Darlaston Hall, with fifty acres of land adjoining, and the annual sum of £4000. Upon her death, the proceeds of the sale of his Darlaston estate is to be divided amongst all his children, his sons' shares to be double the value of his daughters' shares. He authorises his trustees to apply £250 a year for the maintenance of each child, and at twenty-one he empowers them to advance to each son £10,000; and to each daughter, on marriage, £5000. The residue is to accumulate until his youngest surviving child attains twenty-one, when the same is to be divided amongst his children, the sons' shares being double the value of the daughters'; such shares of sons and daughters in the residue being strictly settled.

The will (dated Sept. 6, 1882) of Mrs. Anne Malet Burdon, of Parklands Castle, Eden, widow of the late Rowland Burdon, Esq., of The Castle, Castle Eden, in the county of Durham, was proved at the Durham district registry on the 28th ult. by Henry Alexander Hamilton, the sole executor. The testatrix directs all the depositors in her savings bank to be paid off immediately, with interest up to the thirtieth day of the month in which she shall die, and she leaves to her brother-in-law, the Rev. John Burdon, all her interest in her lands, house, and premises known as Parklands, subject to conditions; to his son (her nephew), Rowland Burdon, the whole of her manor farms and lands at Horden, in the county of Durham, with all the royalties; upon trust for her niece Gertrude Uthhoff Hamilton, £20,000 Consols, subject to conditions; to her cousin, Dr. John Caldwell Uthhoff, the sum of £10,000; to Mary Gertrude Holland, Jane Mary Anne Boydell, and to Fanny Anne Brent, £5000 each; to her niece Elizabeth Anne Burdon, her nephews, John George Burdon, the Rev. Rowland John Burdon, and Cotsford Matthew Burdon, and to Henry Barrington Tristram, £2000 each; to her three servants, John Schater, Ann Roberts, and Jane Durlin, £500 each. All legacies to be duty free. All her plate and the gold cup presented to her father, Joshua Andrew Uthhoff, Esq., she gives to her niece Gertrude Uthhoff Hamilton. To the Rev. John Burdon all her household goods; and she appoints the said Henry Alexander Hamilton her residuary devisee and legatee.

The will (dated Dec. 12, 1883) of Miss Sarah Ward, formerly of Leicester-place, Camberwell New-road, but late of Carshalton-grove, Sutton, who died on Jan. 29 last, was proved on the 17th ult. by James Hoare Ward, Alfred Partridge, Alfred William Smith, and William Henry Sainsbury Gilbert, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £60,000. The testatrix bequeaths £800 New Three Per Cents to the society for the relief of necessitous widows and children of Protestant Dissenting Ministers; £500 New Three Per Cents each to the London Aged Christian Society, the Friendly Female Society, the Spitalfields Benevolent Society, the Brompton Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, and the Victoria Park Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest; £300 New Three Per Cents each to the Widow's Friend Society, the Lambeth Pension Society, the Endowment Fund of the Shoreditch new Almhouses opposite Haggerston church, and the School for the Indigent Blind, St. George's Fields; £200 New Three Per Cents each to the Orphan Working School, Haverstock-hill, and the London Orphan Asylum, Clapton; and there are numerous pecuniary legacies, many of considerable amount, and specific gifts of freehold, copyhold, and household house property. The residue of her real and personal estate she leaves to the said James Hoare Ward.

The will (dated Feb. 26, 1879) of Major-General Sir Herbert Stewart, K.C.B., late of No. 28, Hans-place, Chelsea, who died on Feb. 16 last, at Gakdul, in the Soudan, was proved on the 21st ult. by Dame Georgina Janet Stewart, the widow and sole executrix, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £30,000. With the exception of complimentary legacies to his brother and to Colonel Davis, the testator leaves all his property to his wife.

The will (dated Sept. 25, 1884) of Major Walter Hyde Atherton, 5th Dragoon Guards, who was killed in action at Abou Klea on Jan. 17 last, was proved on the 13th ult. by William Cossley Atherton and Thomas James Atherton, the brothers, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £20,000. The testator bequeaths £1000 to his brother William Cossley; and legacies to his sisters, nephew, and godchild. The residue of his property he gives to his brother Thomas James.



The will (dated Aug. 4, 1866) of Madame Charlotte Helen Sainton (Madame Sainton-Dolby), late of No. 71, Gloucester-place, Hyde Park, who died on Feb. 18 last, was proved on the 23rd ult. by Prosper Phillipps Catherine Sainton, the husband and sole executor. The testatrix leaves all her property to her husband, for his own use; and she appoints him to write her initials, "C. H. S. D.," on songs and pieces of vocal music, under certain agreements with the publishers.

NEW BOOKS.

The two large volumes already published of a Dictionary of National Biography, Edited by Leslie Stephen (Smith, Elder, and Co.), suffice to show what an extensive work has been undertaken. The whole of the first volume and three hundred pages of the second are required for the first letter of the alphabet, and it is calculated that the work will not be finished in less than fifty volumes. The Dictionary promises to be a highly useful book of reference. The articles differ considerably in quality, as might be expected in so long a list of interesting and uninteresting subjects of known and unknown contributors. Some of the lives may be considered too short; some—as, for instance, the account of Queen Anne, which is a history rather than a biography—are assuredly too long; but, on the whole, the Dictionary, as far as we are able to test it, seems to be admirably done. Several attractive literary topics have been treated by the editor himself. He has written the biographies of Addison, Alison, Arbuthnot, Jane Austen, and Madame d'Arblay, and these biographies are models of what such condensed narratives should be. There is probably not a superfluous word in them, neither is an important fact omitted. The account of Jane Austen, compressed within little more than three columns, is, however, too brief. When we find long pages given to "names ignoble, born to be forgot," it is hard that one of the greatest novelists in the language should have so small a niche. If space be a test, even Mr. Harrison Ainsworth is treated with more honour. And why does Mr. Stephen write of the poet Cowper as Cooper? Among what may be called the historical biographies, Professor Freeman's account of Ælfred, better known to most readers as Alfred the Great, is as readable as it is instructive; and Sir Theodore Martin's life of the Prince Consort contains within twenty-eight columns all the salient points of his remarkable career. The longest article in Vol. II., and one as remarkable for quality as length, is devoted to Lord Chancellor Bacon, a man who, apart from his splendid position as a philosopher, deserves to be studied by every student of English for the force and richness of his style. Truly does the writer say that his utterances are not infrequently marked with a grandeur and solemnity of tone, a majesty of diction, which renders it impossible to forget, and difficult even to criticise, them. Amidst the company with which he is brought into contact here, though there are, of course, many men of noble stature, Bacon stands like a giant among pigmies. In looking through the volumes, one is struck by the few names, comparatively, that belong to men of genius or of extraordinary intellect. And it is well that this is the case. The everyday work of the world must be done by ordinary men. "An honest, dull, serviceable man," is the character given in the Dictionary to a certain Dr. Amory, and it applies to the majority of persons even less distinguished who help the world by following the common round and doing the daily task. In life such people often prove the best companions, but they make little figure in a Dictionary, and it is not easy to see why certain names deserve a place in these pages at all, when the mention of them is of necessity little better than a tombstone epitaph. The editor has, no doubt, a difficult task to perform, and it must be remembered that a work of this class will owe its ultimate success to completeness rather than to selection.

Pleasant, vivacious, and even brilliant reading is provided without stint in A Journey Due South: by George Augustus Sala (Vizetelly and Co.); and there are more than a round dozen of striking illustrations, meet accompaniments of the letter-press. That the portly, handsome volume is a second edition testifies of, to a certain extent, the popularity attained by this most delightful account of "travels in search of sunshine"; but there must be still many thousands of readers who have not yet fallen in with the first edition, and would gladly lay hold upon this second or even upon a third or a fourth to come. Everybody knows the author's name; nearly everybody knows his style and the immense amount of information, personal experience, and knowledge of the world, its four quarters, its people, places, and things, that he can and does draw upon for the entertainment and enlightenment of his readers, and nearly everybody again must be aware that he has a fund of native humour with which his narratives are "shot," as certain articles of haberdashery with gold and divers colours. In fact, the author's name should of itself be sufficient recommendation; it is, at any rate, a sufficient guarantee for liveliness and what is comprehensively termed readability. We have all heard of "clubable" men; and, in imitation of that expression, the author may be dubbed an eminently "readable" man. He makes an amusing apology for the not altogether strictly correct title which he or his publishers, or he and they in collusion, have thought proper to bestow upon his book; but, whatever one may think about a rose under any other name, it is pretty certain that, whatever the author writes, nobody will care for the title save as a means of enabling the public to obtain the book without misadventure at the very first time of asking. It can only be necessary to mention the places about which the author gossips so pleasantly, with so much knowledge and appreciation, and then the book may be left for the enjoyment of all whom it may concern. Of Paris, of Marseilles and bouillabaisse, of Nice and her "nefarious neighbour" (which, of course, is Monte Carlo), of Bastia and Ajaccio, of Genoa "the superb," of "austere" Bologna, of Venice "preserved," of old Rome and new Rome, of Naples and Pompeii, the happy reader may read, and read, moreover, to profit as well as to amusement.

A very sad, tragic, and characteristic occurrence serves for the foundation of Mr. Butler's Ward: by F. Mabel Robinson (Vizetelly and Co.), which is a story in one volume, well and pathetically, nay powerfully, written, though in parts it betrays signs of being spun out a little unmercifully, and though, on the whole, it is a little young-ladyish in style and sentiment. Some of the descriptions, especially those that appertain to life at the Norman nunnery of Bonsecours are charming; and the heroine, who of course is Mr. Butler's "ward," is a very happy conception, a beautiful creation, whose affecting history is treated with much delicacy, sympathy, and command of all that is touching. The old Irishwoman, whose husband believes himself—not without excellent reason, though his wife tries to throw a doubt upon the subject—to have committed a murder, is a very fine character, finely delineated. The story is now and then intensely interesting; but now and then it hangs. The fundamental incident appears to have been borrowed from real life; and, as the tale is coloured Irish, there is nothing at all extravagant, incredible, or even improbable about that incident. Mr. Butler is a gentleman of property, an Irish absentee-landlord, though he does not depend entirely upon his Irish estates, it would seem, for his comfortable means. His agent, in the process of an eviction, causes, by accident not by design, the death of a child whose father, a noble old man in many respects, is unfortunately in possession of a loaded revolver and not of his sober senses the next time he encounters the agent. The result may be easily imagined; the contents of the loaded pistol are lodged in the agent's body, and the agent, left for dead, is buried hastily by some of the too precipitate old man's friends. But the agent is not quite dead, and, struggling to release himself from his ill-made premature grave, he manages to protrude a hand and arm through the earth, and then dies a fearful death. On that hand and arm his only child, the heroine of the story, accidentally stumbles, and the whole dreadful incident is brought to light, save that the murderer is not revealed. At the time of the discovery the heroine is only a little girl, and her mind, as is but natural, receives a shock which is destined to take fuller effect at a future time. Mr. Butler takes his late agent's little daughter under his charge, after a fashion, sends her to a nunnery to be educated, receives her into his house as his children's governess in due time, and is the means of introducing her to a fashionable painter who, struck with her beauty and many graces, marries her. The marriage is not a very happy one, and some readers may think that the little quarrels described concerning questions of painting from the "nude," though no sort of impropriety is committed, are unpleasant and quite gratuitously brought in, as the desired object could easily be attained without them. Well, the painter dies within about a year of the marriage, and the lovely widow marries again—this time the son of the man who had murdered her father. She does not know it until afterwards, but her second husband knows it before. It is a hard case. What should he have done? He does not tell her, he has not the heart to tell her, and the terrible consequences of his silence are to be learned from the pages of the novel.

Mr. Adye has written a fresh and simply-told story, the scene of which is chiefly laid in Cornwall and on Dartmoor; and in many ways The Queen of the Moor, three volumes (J. and R. Maxwell), cannot fail to please. Obviously animated by a sincere love of nature and of animals, the author excels in such descriptions and adventures as have to do with the latter. No sport would seem to come amiss to his pen; hunting, fishing, and boating exploits are detailed with evident enjoyment, and with the appreciation of an adept. Mr. Adye says that "movement and action are the true poetry of youth," and they are unquestionably the true spirit of his book. We do not agree with him when he attempts to philosophise thus—"Happiness consists almost entirely in perfect health" and "there is no such thing as unhappiness apart from disease, physical or mental, and perhaps none mental unless founded on physical imperfection"; but rather with Shakspeare that "'tis the mind that makes the body rich." Mr. Adye has ventilated in "The Queen of the Moor" some theories which are neither very original not very clever; but they succeed in being discursive, and endangering the success of the novel, which, however, distinctly improves as the story progresses; and the last volume is decidedly the best, for although mating and marrying are somewhat promiscuous, there is less diffuseness, and the author is more interested in his characters. The chapter entitled "The Eighteenth of June" quite kindles his enthusiasm; and notwithstanding his modest apology, he gives a very good reading of a battle where the power of "the conqueror and captive of the earth" was finally destroyed. Mr. Adye might with advantage have introduced more dialogue—for his dialogues are good—and compressed his descriptions, which are a little lengthy; but the novel as it stands is a pleasing narrative of some country folk and their simple lives and ways seventy years ago, varied by the excitement and adventures consequent on the escape of some French prisoners of war; and it is, besides, thoroughly unassuming, perfectly moral, and written in good, clear English.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

"Musical History Briefly Narrated and Technically Discussed, with a Roll of the Names of Musicians, and the Times and Places of their Births and Deaths," by G. A. Macfarren (A. and C. Black). The title explains the purpose of this volume, which, small as it is, contains a large amount of valuable information, clearly and well stated. The historical portion is a reproduction, with amplifications, of the author's article in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and will be found to be a comprehensive summary of an extensive subject. The alphabetical list of musical composers, theorists, performers, historians, critics, teachers, instrument makers, and publishers, &c., forms a most valuable table for reference.

The "Bandmaster's Guide," vol. ii., by Palgrave Simpson (Boosey and Co.). This is a continuation of a valuable work on the art of scoring for military bands, a specialty apart from that of instrumentation for an ordinary orchestra. Some excellent treatises have been produced (especially that by Berlioz) dealing with the method of scoring for concert and opera orchestras, but these do not deal with the subject which is so ably treated by the author of the book now referred to. The descriptions of the various instruments, of their compass and capabilities, and the art of effectively combining and contrasting them, as shown by many examples, render the work one of high utility to bandmasters or those studying for that position.

"Two Lives," by J. E. Webster; "My Heart's Message," by A. H. Behrend; and "An Old Maid's Heart," by M. Watson, are songs each of which is characterised by a flowing melody, simple in style, yet pleasing, and lying within a moderate compass of voice. Any singer possessed of expressive power may render them highly effective. Messrs. R. Cocks and Co. are the publishers, as also of two pianoforte pieces, "Sieg-lied," by Alice Borton; and "Tip-Toe," by Henri Logé. The first is styled a "Song of Victory," and is in appropriate martial style, which is well sustained up to a very effective climax. The other piece is a fairy dance, in which there is much characteristic piquancy. It is not difficult; and, the leading passages being fingered, it will serve well as a pupil's exercise.

"Alas! so long," is a setting by Lady Ramsay (of Banff) of lines by D. G. Rossetti, the sad sentiment of which is very happily expressed in the music to which it is allied. "Moorish Serenade" (also published by J. B. Cramer and Co.) is by F. Williamson, who has taken some lines from Lord Lytton's "Leila," and has associated them with some smooth and melodious strains that are well suited for vocal effect.

Messrs. W. Morley and Co.'s recent publications include some songs that are well suited for drawing-room use. "The Light of the Land," by Ciro Pinsuti, has a bold and well-marked rhythm well calculated for declamatory effect. "Home Dreams," "Surely," and "Heart to Heart"—all by A. H. Behrend—are replete with unaffected sentimental expression. "The Viking Bold," by C. T. Speer, has a strongly-marked melody, somewhat in the style of a "Volks-lied," and must produce a stirring effect in performance. "Jem," by Cotsford Dick, is in a somewhat lighter style, and has much piquant character; and the same may be said of "If You Marry," a humorous song, by T. Hutchinson. "The Clang of the Hammer," by T. Bonheur, is a song of the descriptive kind, in which a good effect is gained without exaggeration. Messrs. Morley and Co. are continuing their very cheap "Part-Song Journal," edited by A. J. Caldicott—the ninth number of which contains a pleasing piece for four voices, "The Holly-crowned King," by the editor—and their useful collection (also a serial) of voluntaries for the organ, harmonium, or American organ, edited by H. J. Stark. The fourteenth number has some effective original pieces by Dr. Spark, of Leeds.

"Dramatic Overture," by Gustav Ernest (Hutchings and Co.). This is an arrangement, for pianoforte solo, of the work to which the Philharmonic Society recently awarded the prize of twenty guineas, eighty-eight such compositions having been sent in in answer to the invitation. As the performance of the overture, and its successful reception, at the society's second concert of the present season, has already been noticed, we need now only record its publication in the arranged form indicated above.

It is announced that the Old Testament Revision Company has concluded its labours, and that the revised edition of the Bible will be issued in May.

The first steam-cars introduced on any tramway in the metropolitan district have begun running for public traffic on the North London Tramways Company's lines.

It was announced at the meeting on the 1st inst. of the General Purposes Committee of the Corporation that H.R.H. Prince Albert Victor of Wales will visit the City early in June to receive the freedom, which is to be presented in a specially designed gold casket, for which the sum of £250 has been voted. Four of the principal goldsmiths and jewellers were invited to compete; and the committee selected the design of Mr. J. W. Benson, of Ludgate-hill and Old Bond-street, who made the casket for his Royal Highness's father, the Prince of Wales, twenty-one years ago.

ELLIMAN'S ROYAL EMBROCATION.

"Castle Weir, Kington, Herefordshire, "December, 1878.

"Gentlemen,—I use the Royal Embrocation in the stables and kennels, and have found it very serviceable. I have also used the Universal Embrocation for lumbago and rheumatism for the last two years, and have suffered very little since using it.

"R. H. Price, Lieut.-Col., Master of Radnorshire Hunt."

From Captain S. G. Butson, J.P., St. Brendon's, Clonf.rt, Eyrecourt, county Galway, Dec. 16, 1884.

"Sirs,—Elliman's Royal Embrocation is in use in my stables, and I find the results most satisfactory.

CAUTION.—To guard against fraudulent imitations, see that each bottle bears the name of "WILCOX and CO., 23, Oxford-street, London."

There are three kinds, distinguished by a YELLOW, GREEN, and RED SILK THREAD, attached to the Bottles. That with the YELLOW stops instantly the most violent Toothache, that the YELLOW and GREEN is invaluable to persons who suffer periodically from Toothache or Sensitiveness of the Teeth and Gums; for, by using a few drops in a little water to rinse the mouth daily, they will not only never suffer again, but will preserve their teeth sound and white. That with the Red is for Children's use.

TORPEDO-BOATS ON THE DECK OF H.M.S. HECLA.

A SKETCH ON BOARD H.M.S. COLOSSUS AT PORTSMOUTH.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

Anyone who doubted that the Prince and Princess of Wales would be received in Dublin with loyalty and goodwill has now discovered his mistake; anyone who hoped to see these Royal personages treated with hostility, or even with neutrality, will be suffering a painful disappointment. Wherever they went a kindly feeling was manifest; and this feeling was spontaneous, hearty, and universal. Kings, and those who are in authority, can generally command a certain amount of homage; but the hospitable welcome given by the lower, as well as by the upper, classes in the metropolis of Ireland cannot be assured as a matter of course. The Prince and Princess are not simply performing an official duty in this visit to the sister island. They have gone there with a personal interest in the country, and with a ready sympathy for all that can affect its welfare. The people understand this, and the goodwill felt on the one side is reciprocated on the other. In all this there is probably no political significance; but the Irish, like other people, are men first and politicians afterwards. They know a friend when they see one, and even the Nationalist must be conscious that there is nothing of pretence in the frank and generous friendliness of the Royal guests of Ireland. There, as elsewhere, the one touch of nature, and the inbred sentiment of loyalty, have proved more potent than the rancour of party, and the slight indications of this rancour at Mallow do but serve to intensify the general good-will of the people expressed in this Royal progress.

The London Season will in all probability offer no other pageant or fête so picturesque and gay as the grand Costume Ball of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours, on May 19. Especial éclat will be given to the ball by the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales, Prince Albert Victor, and other members of the Royal family. Very judiciously, the committee have abandoned the idea of an opening procession of artists. The ball, which will afford rich opportunities for research and tastefulness of design, and tax to the full the ingenuity of the principal costumiers, is to be preceded by a masque of painters representing celebrated artists and their contemporaries, illustrating the period from Pericles to Sir Joshua Reynolds. As a hint to those who wish to dress in harmony with the occasion at this bright, particular ball of the season, we may mention that the six groups of this glowing masque will comprise that of Greece, arranged by Mr. A. Sacheverel Coke; Italy, by Mr. Walter Crane; Germany, by Mr. W. D. Linton and Mr. W. Dendy Sadler; France and Spain, by Mr. R. Caton Woodville; Holland, by Mr. E. A. Abbey and Mr. T. Walter Wilson; the English School, by MM. Seymour Lucas and Charles Green. Acting as Greek Chorus to this brilliant masque, Mr. J. Forbes Robertson will recite the descriptive verses, written by Mr. Edmund W. Gosse.

There died within the last week or so, at Venice, M. le Capitaine Louis-Maurice Quatre Solz de Marolles, whose name is interesting to the world in general because it gave occasion for one of those "bons mots" which made the popular Henri Quatre so especially dear to his witloving people. "Tout mon Parlement," said the King, "ne vaut pas Quatre Solz" ("sols" or "sous"), alluding to Quatre Solz de Marolles, one of his favourite counsellors.

Mr. H. T. Barclay has hitherto been the hero of the racing season. He won the Lincolnshire Handicap, the first great event of the year, with Bendigo; and at Croxteth Park on the 9th inst. he won the first four races in succession, having himself ridden three of the winners. He himself also rode one of his two winners the day before at Manchester. And on Saturday, the 11th inst., he all but won the valuable Leicestershire Spring Handicap (2000 sovs.) with Criterion, who was just a neck too short. On that same 11th inst. occurred the third "dead-heat" of the season (between Mr. C. Hibbert's Cinderella, five years, 10 st. 1 lb., and Mr. W. Burrell's St. Edmund, three years, 9 st. 6 lb., for the Holiday Selling Plate at Leicester), and this time it was "run off" with the result that the favourite, Cinderella, won. On the 14th inst. the fourth dead-heat occurred at Thirsk between Flower of England and Lady Auckland for the Hambledon Plate; but it was not "run off."

It is delightful to see ourselves as others see us. And this is how M. Paul De Cassagnac, the great humourist and duellist, sees us at this Russo-Afghan crisis. We are, to his mind's eye, "the selfish and arrogant people who allowed" France "to be crushed in 1870, and who thought themselves freed of their obligations towards" France "when they sent" her "a few tons of Cheshire cheese, after the siege"; and we are, to his mind's eye, "the assassins of Napoleon I.," and the villains who permitted "the poor Prince Imperial to be murdered." That is good. "Cheshire cheese" is particularly good — it is "the cheese," in fact. "Noscitur a sociis," says the proverb; and, accordingly, whatever troubles may be in store for us during our dispute with Russia, we may think ourselves happy that we shall not have M. Paul De Cassagnac and his sort for comrades even in sympathy.

On the 10th inst. died, at seventy-nine years of age, a well-known and honoured official of the French turf, M. Grandhomme, who was the respected secretary of the French Jockey Club (Société d'Encouragement) almost from its institution, in 1830. A few years ago he retired, and was succeeded by his son, M. Georges Grandhomme, who died in March, 1883, and was himself succeeded by M. Madeleine. Personal experience of the late MM. Grandhomme's courtesy—both father and son—may here be gratefully recorded.

The Althorp Park Stakes, for two-year-olds, which was decided on the 14th inst. at Northampton, is the most important of the very early races confined to the youngsters of the season. It is especially interesting as a test of the relative forwardness of the young colts and fillies; and up to this year it had been won by the fillies twenty-two times out of thirty-seven. Among the fillies that have won it the most notable are Payment (in 1850), the dam of Dollar; Madame Eglentine (in 1859), the dam of The Palmer and Rosicrucian; Lady Elizabeth (in 1867), the "sensational" favourite for the Derby of 1868, when Blue Gown won in spite of his owner; and Frivolity (in 1869), who afterwards won the Middle Park Plate; and of the colts that have won it, the most notable is The Rake (in 1866), who afterwards won the Middle Park Plate the first time it was open to runners. For though Thormanby, winner of the Derby in 1860, ran at Northampton when he was two years old over the very course, he did not run—curiously enough—for the Althorp Park Stakes. This year the Althorp was won in a canter by The Bard, who has now won the three chief two-year-old races of the early season; and, as he carried extra weight, has vindicated the claim of his sex to make an allowance to the fillies. He must, in fact, be a very good colt indeed.

The death of a bricklayer, caused by a pot-house disturbance, has been sufficient this week to indicate how times have altered and how we have altered in them. The bricklayer's name was Sayers. Only a quarter of a century ago England went mad over the prowess of one Tom Sayers, a prize-fighter. He was the champion pugilist of the world. The mob cheered him as they would a victorious General; gentlemen eagerly shook him by the hand; and Thackeray even devoted one of his Roundabout Papers, in the Cornhill Magazine, to Sayers' great fight with the American, Heenan. Leech, it may be remembered, depicted in the pages of Punch two lads with terribly black eyes and horribly swollen faces, who, in answer to the anxious inquiries of their grandmother, responded that they had only been playing at Tom Sayers and the Benicia Boy. But who knows of anything of prize-fighters nowadays? What prize-fights are there to go to? The briefly-recorded death of Sayers, the bricklayer, and his brother's elaborate tombstone in Highgate Cemetery, over which sits the marble counterfeit of the prize-fighter's favourite bull-dog, are marvellous signs of how tastes and opinions have changed.

The shrimping time of Gravesend, which, by-the-way, thanks to the Thames sewage, has now to depend on the little village of Leigh for its constant supply, is to be congratulated. The Government has granted it, for recreation grounds, the grass slopes between the batteries and the Thames. No pleasanter spot, as anyone with a knowledge of this river will testify, could be found for such a purpose. Gravesend already possesses the prettily laid out, albeit Cockney, grounds of Rosherville, to which admission is obtained on payment; and Lord Darnley's lovely park, of which and its magnificent rhododendrons Londoners know singularly little, that is open on certain days of the week; but the new grounds, with their view of the open river and its ever changing scenes of shipping, should make more converts than ever to the view Henry Fielding expressed when on his way to death at Lisbon—that for interest and enjoyment the Lower Thames is superior to the Upper.

Rents in South Kensington are likely to go down this summer. Those families who have yearned for mansions in the Cromwell-road, and have been deterred by their prices, may yet look forward to an abode in the fashionable west suburb. Among the features (attractions cannot be used) of what was the Fisheries, then the Healtheries, and will be the Inventories, is a brass band competition. Remembering the havoc one brass band can cause in a quiet London street or in a small watering-place, the arrival of innumerable brass bands blaring one against the other should render South Kensington in the summer a shade more uninhabitable than the Soudan during the hot season.

Like unto that of a policeman, a lion-tamer's life is not a happy one, of which fact a notable instance has been lately afforded by the career of poor Williams, whom all travelling English folk have seen in Continental circuses. Quite recently Williams was seized by a lioness one night, very badly bitten and scratched, and only saved by the old expedient of red-hot irons. He recovered from his wounds, but, as in Goldsmith's poem,

> The man recovered of the bite,
> The dog it was that died.

His animals have died to the value of 50,000 francs. This is a terrible loss to him, for though a proprietor of lions and tigers may reap large profits, a mere tamer, despite the risks to limb and life he has to run, seldom earns more wages than are paid to a first-class artisan.

On the 12th inst. died Mr. E. R. Clarke, aged eighty-two years. He was well known on the turf as Mr. "D'Orsay" Clarke for many years; and, though he never won any of the "classic" races, he was temporary owner of some famous horses, such as The Baron (sire of Stockwell) and Sir Tatton Sykes (sire of the half-bred Mr. Sykes, with whom he won the Cesarewitch in 1855), and he won the Woodcote Stakes for two-year-olds at Epsom with Miles's Boy as long ago as 1846, before many present fathers of families were born.

Roderick James McDonald, who was sentenced the other day at Leeds to twelve months' imprisonment, was evidently not the right man in the right place when he became a "letter carrier." His offence was neglecting to deliver five hundred letters; and his defence was laziness. There is nothing like "going the whole hog" and doing things wholesale, by the five hundred at a time, and it is impossible not to sympathise with lazy people: still, twelve months' imprisonment is not too much for the offence, which might have done a world of mischief. If there were any "hard labour" to go with the imprisonment, there would perhaps be no objection, though it might be a little "rough" on a lazy man.

Wonders will never cease: a "fine trout" is said to have been taken lately by an enthusiastic angler at Teddington weir. People who fish in the Serpentine may expect to "get a bite" before long—as often as once a week, if they have luck.

A splendid old oak pulpit of the Tudor period has just been placed in Winchester Cathedral. It originally belonged to New College Chapel, Oxford, and was given by the Warden and Fellows to Dr. Mayo, formerly a member of their society, by whose family it has been completed, fixed on an oak base carefully made to match it, and put in the cathedral as a memorial of Miss Jane Mayo, who died about six months ago. It is peculiarly fitting that a relic from William of Wykeham's foundation at Oxford should adorn the cathedral of the city so intimately connected with his name both as bishop and founder of the far-famed Winchester School.

The Japanese are going ahead in every branch of study. One of them, who rejoices in the name of Haru Taka Youkura, recently took the medals offered as rewards for the best essay and for passing the best examination in veterinary surgery at the New York College; and now he is going home fully qualified to treat the diseases of horses and other animals in the Mikado's dominions. The paper which announces his success describes Mr. Youkura's mission as calculated to prove to his countrymen "that a horse, like a man, may survive medical treatment."

A very brisk business in Easter cards is done in the principal cities of the United States, calculated at about one third the dimensions of that in Christmas and New-Year cards. But the emblems suitable for Easter are rapidly disappearing; and though the words, "A Happy Easter," may stand underneath, many of the designs represent angels ascending ladders or walking on tight ropes, Dutchmen in the full enjoyment of "lager," terriers engaged in rat-catching, and owls perched on clothes-lines. As to the purchasers, many of them are, to say the least, eccentric. A Quaker lady in Philadelphia buys large quantities every spring, and dispatches them to the Sioux and other native tribes. The Indians appreciate them highly, the men glueing them indiscriminately on their backs, and the women sticking them on all parts of their blankets. The back of a brave thus adorned with crosses, wreaths, windmills, and dancing houris is considered a thing of beauty by his fellows.

The King of the Belgians grows more popular as he gets older. The other day, when the Burgomaster of Brussels ceremoniously invited him to a fête prepared for the celebration of his jubilee, he exclaimed, "Yes, of course; at fifty years of age, I am an old Brussels bourgeois." He is a quiet man, whose mode of life offers no food for scandal, and his special taste is for bricks and mortar; so that it is often said if he had not been a king, he would have been a builder. He takes very little wine, hates tobacco in every form, dislikes music, and avoids every kind of sport. His health is perfect, though he has always eschewed athletics, and has never even learned to swim. He never wears gloves, though he is always in uniform; no one has ever seen him out of temper; and, though his views are not orthodox, his scepticism is of the mildest type possible. He is fond of riding, though he takes but little interest in horses; and he diligently reads all the petits journaux of his country. It is said that, when a Brussels lawyer, recently decorated with the order of Leopold, came to thank his Majesty, the King inquired if he still had his pretty estate near the Soignes forest, and proposed riding out to it some day. The lawyer thought this an admirable opportunity of remarking on the bad state of the roads; but Leopold II. said, "Oh, I have no authority over the roads; you must write to the petits journaux—everything they cry out for is done directly!"

Archiduc, the famous French race-horse, so well known in this country, especially at Newmarket, won the second great French race, the Prix Rainbow, on the 12th inst., as he had won the first, the Prix du Cadran, on Easter Monday. The Prix Rainbow is interesting to us for its commemorative name; as Rainbow, son of Walton, son of Sir Peter, son of Highflyer, was imported into France in 1823 by M. Rieussec (who, being a Colonel in the National Guard, was killed by Fieschi's "infernal machine" in 1836), and became the sire of Franck and Lydia, with whom Lord Henry Seymour won the Prix du Jockey Club, or "French Derby," in the first two years, 1836 and 1837, after it was instituted. In those days, the French used to pay money for a sight of Rainbow at the stud of Viroflay, looking upon the English thoroughbred as visitors looked on a white elephant at the Zoological Gardens.

It is hoped that radical changes will soon be made in the administration of Epsom College, a school specially connected with the medical profession, with forty-five boys on the foundation, who are clothed, maintained, and educated gratis, besides a great many sons of doctors who ought to receive a first-rate education at moderate though remunerative terms. The educational council has recently had great fault to find with the small proportion of pupils who have passed the preliminary medical and the Oxford and Cambridge local examinations, and as there is little or no surveillance after school hours, either in or out of doors, boys of idle or mischievous tendencies have plenty of opportunities of indulging them. The council do all they can to ensure that everything is right in the commissariat department by making unexpected visits, tasting the provisions, &c.; but they would not be asking their head master to do anything derogatory if they requested him and his family to take their luncheon in one of the great dining-rooms with the pupils, and from the same joints. This would be the best guarantee for the goodness of the food, and would have a civilising influence, for children are not sent to school only to learn lessons, but also to be taught good manners or maintained in them. The new head master is Mr. Wood, of Birkenhead, but one or two others ran him very close, and he was only elected by the chairman's casting vote. He will enter on his new duties after the summer holidays, and the Erasmus Wilson House will be entirely renovated before he comes into residence there.

The Japanese men, women, and children—one hundred, we believe, in number—who are now amusing the public at Knightsbridge, display, although in a foreign land, the cheerfulness characteristic of the race. If they feel their temporary exile, they show no signs of homesickness, and seem as much amused as the spectators with their work and entertainments. The pleasure they are giving so many visitors daily makes one wish it were possible to give them some real pleasure in return before they leave the country. How this might best be done is a matter for discussion and arrangement. We do not know what would give the Japanese the greatest enjoyment and leave the most lasting impression on their minds; but this can be readily ascertained. And one would like them to see that even in this business-loving country there is a disposition to show a little kindness that is not business-like to strangers from the Far East. It may be remembered, by the way, that Mr. Buhicrosan's Japanese village is not a commercial speculation, but has been promoted with a charitable object.

Beer in the harvest-field formed a subject of discussion at a conference held last Saturday at Canterbury. We agree with Lord Northbourne, who took the chair, that beer is a good thing in its place; but it is generally allowed that work under an August sun can be done better by the help of tea than of beer. Neither the one nor the other should be given to the men instead of money; but charitably disposed farmers have been known to provide tea gratuitously on the harvest-field, and have found that the work has been done more heartily and cheerily in consequence. The habit in vogue some years ago in the Scottish highlands of giving raw whisky to reapers has, it is to be feared, not wholly ceased. A custom more pernicious it would be difficult to imagine.

In time of war good stories of British pluck are often circulated in seaport and arsenal towns, to which they come in private letters; and one such has been recently heard at Gosport. A couple of young Marines in the Soudan, in their first campaign, were told off to a signal-tent, pitched out in the open at a little distance from the camp. Their duty was to forward information to the chief signal-station. A message was actually being sent to them, when they signalled, "Wait a few minutes; have got to fall back and fight." Ten minutes elapsed, and then they wired, "All right; enemy retreated; go on signalling."

Old Temple Bar, of which the stones have been carefully preserved, is to be set up again, it is said, not in the former place, of course, but in King's Bench Walk, Temple. To do the thing completely, quite à l'antique, a few old skulls (of traitors, if possible) should be stuck upon the top, with an inscription bearing the words which Goldsmith quoted to Johnson concerning the ghastly sight:—"Forsan et hæc olim meminisse juvabit."

The French delight in coincidences, and point out that the amount of money voted by the Government for the Tonquin Expedition is two hundred million francs, precisely the same sum as Germany demanded from the city of Paris as her share of the war indemnity in 1871.

The widow of General Tom Thumb became Countess Primo Magri on Easter Monday. Her small wedding-dress was very elegant, and her one bridesmaid was Miss Lucy Adams. All the world and his wife wanted to go and see the little couple married, but the number had to be restricted by the size of the church, and admission was by ticket only.

Prodigious liberality of illustration is a notable characteristic of On the Track of the Crescent: by Major E. C. Johnson, M.A.I., F.R.Hist.S., &c. (Hurst and Blackett), and there is a map to show the author's more or less erratic course from Athens to Pesth and to the regions of Transylvania, as he journeyed in what he has somewhat fantastically termed "The Track of the Crescent." Conscience seems to have dictated the sort of apology for the dogmatic tone which the author fears that some readers may think they can detect in his remarks; and it is quite certain that he does deliver himself of opinions and sentiments in a manner that savours of dogmatism, patronage, and an assumption of superiority. The leading articles of our many newspapers, however, should have made us quite accustomed to this high and mighty style; and when, as in the present instance, it is little more than amusing and not by any means offensive, it is perfectly harmless and perhaps appreciably effective. Altogether, the collection of "wayside notes," as the collector calls them, forms just the kind of literature which finds ready acceptance with a large class of readers, for whom narratives of travel have an unfailing charm, especially when, as in the present instance again, the narrator shows signs of having had his eyes about him, of having been able to draw comparisons by reason of copious reading as well as personal experience, and of having had unusual advantages in the direction of acquaintance and introductions. Athens, Constantinople, Varna, Bucharest, Pesth, Vienna, are some of the names that may be conjured with to draw attention to a very readable volume. There is no extraordinary tale of adventure to tell, there is perhaps very little that is new to be gleaned, but the work will serve sufficiently well all the ordinary purposes of literary entertainment. The very common use of the "hussar" jacket among the Hungarians forced itself upon the author's observation, and gave him the opportunity of explaining a fact "not generally known," concerning the word "hussar." The term, it appears, means "twentieth man" in Hungarian, that having been "the proportion in which recruits for the cavalry were picked in former times from the population"; the recruits carried the national costume into the ranks; and so "the uniform and name have since spread from the Austro-Hungarian service into all the armies of Europe." The worst of such books is that they excite in the reader, who reads how the writer travelled and saw sights, a restless desire to go and do likewise.

Under the title of "The Imperial Parliament," a series of short volumes on current political topics is about to be issued, under the editorship of Mr. Sydney Buxton, M.P. The volumes will be written by politicians who are recognised as authorities on the subjects of which they treat. Each volume will be complete in itself, uniform in crown 8vo, neatly bound in a permanent form, and issued at the price of 1s. Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co., of London, are to be the publishers. Nine volumes are already arranged for.

NAVAL WAR PREPARATIONS.

In view of the possible hostilities with Russia, our Government, in the Admiralty and in the War Department, continues its busy preparations. The dockyards of Portsmouth, Devonport, Chatham, and Sheerness, employ hundreds of workmen day and night in making ships of the British Navy ready for active service at sea. The whole of the First Division of the Naval Reserve is being prepared, with the exception of the Colossus, Cyclops, and Cormorant. Though still in the hands of the shipwrights, the Colossus is practically ready for sea, and could be at once pressed into service but for the delay in the supply of parts of the breech mechanism for her guns; the Cyclops, monitor, is essentially a vessel intended, like the Glatton, for coast defence; while the Cormorant, though in an advanced state so far as her hull is concerned, has not yet been provided with her new complement of guns. The ships at Portsmouth could contribute the following to an improvised fighting squadron:—Armour-clads: Inflexible, double turret, four 80-ton guns and 450 men; Devastation, double turret, four 35-ton guns and 340 men; Polyphemus, torpedo-ship, probably 200 men; and Rupert, turret ram, two 18-ton and two 64-pounder guns and 200 men. Unarmoured ships: Active, corvette, twelve 6-inch breech-loaders and 327 men; Volage, corvette, twelve 6-inch breech-loaders and 325 men; Cordelia, corvette, ten 6-inch and 5-inch breech-loaders and 280 men; and Emerald, corvette, twelve 5-inch breech-loaders (when ready) and 220 men. In addition to these, there is a formidable flotilla of gun-boats, consisting of three vessels of the Snake class, already in commission, seventeen gun-boats of the same class which are to be brought forward immediately, and the four river-boats of the Medina class. The ships at Devonport now being prepared for sea are as follows:—Iron Duke, 14, double-screw iron ship, armour-plated, 3787 tons, with a complement of 493 officers and men; Hotspur, 4, double-screw iron-plated armour turret-ship ram, 2637 tons, 224 officers and men; Hecate, 4, double-screw iron armour-plated turret-ship, 2107 tons, 156 officers and men; Conquest, 14, screw-corvette, steel and iron vessel, cased with wood, 2380 tons, 266 officers and men; Hyacinth, 8, composite screw-corvette, 1420 tons, 162 officers and men. It is supposed that these vessels are destined to form a portion of a fleet for the Baltic or Black Seas, and that the Iron Duke, which is ready, is to be the Admiral's ship. An idea of the armaments of the five vessels will be of interest in connection with their fitting out. The Iron Duke is protected by eight inches of armour, carries ten 12-ton muzzle-loading guns, four 5-in. muzzle-loading guns, ten Nordenfeldts, four Gardners, and twelve Whitehead torpedoes. The Hotspur has one turret, which is revolving, and is plated with 11 in. of armour and steel-faced. In the turret are two 25-ton guns. Two 6-in. breech-loading guns with a large angle of fire are fitted astern, and the machine guns comprise six Nordenfelts and two Gardners, while twelve Whitehead torpedoes and a torpedo-boat are on board. The Hecate has ten inches of armour on her two turrets from which 18-ton guns can be fired. She also carries four Nordenfeldts and two Gardners. The Conquest carries ten 64-pounders, two 90-cwt. muzzle-loading guns, four Nordenfeldts, two Gardners, and six Whitehead torpedoes. The Hyacinth is armed with eight 6-in. breech-loading guns. At Chatham Dockyard, the Admiralty have ordered the following vessels in the Steam Reserve at that port to be commissioned immediately:—The turret-ship Ajax, the double-screw steel-armoured turret ram-ship Conqueror; the unarmoured cruiser Leander, 10; and the unarmoured corvette Rover, 14. Besides this, the flotilla of torpedo-boats is to be got ready for immediate service; this flotilla consisting of about six first-class and about twenty second-class torpedo-boats, supported by the Hecla, torpedo-dépôt, and the Vesuvius, torpedo-vessel, the whole of which are included in the preparatory order.

We give an Illustration of the torpedo-boats laid up on the deck of H.M.S. Hecla, which is an iron "torpedo-dépôt ship," of 1640 tons burden, armed with six guns, and would be used to carry the small torpedo-boats wherever they might be wanted.

We present also, continuing the series of "New Ships for the British Navy," an Illustration of H.M.S. Collingwood, which was launched in 1882. This ship, with a "displacement" of 9150 tons, and engines of 7000-horse power, built of steel and plated with armour ten inches thick, and carrying ten guns, is the first of the regular barbette-ships built for the British service, and is representative of the "Admiral" type of first-class fighting ships now under construction in the national dockyards and by the Thames Iron Shipbuilding Company. Not only, however, is the Collingwood, a new vessel of a distinctly novel type; but the armament which she carries is composed of a new gun, having a new system of breech mechanism, actuated by a new application of hydraulics; and the gun is mounted and protected on an entirely new plan. From the great height of the parapets above the water-line, the barbette arrangement enables a powerful plunging fire to be directed against an enemy, and makes it possible for the guns to be worked under conditions of sea which would silence those of the Inflexible. The new system is advocated by its patrons also on the ground that it enables the gunner to see the enemy better and to follow his movements more satisfactorily, so as to be able to strike him at the first favourable moment. But some critics of the new system have remarked that with it the object can be followed only by means of side-sights, and is completely hidden by the gun in the supreme moment of its being laid. An experimental trial of the Collingwood's armament and mode of working her guns took place on March 5 outside the Nab Light, in presence of the Naval Lords of the Admiralty, the principal dockyard officials, and the Ordnance Committee. A couple of 43-ton guns were fitted on the barbettes erected at each end of the superstructure battery, along the middle line of the ship, their parapets being at an elevation of 19 ft. 3 in. and 20 ft. 3 in. respectively above the water. The barbettes are egg-shaped, and are formed of steel-faced armour 14 in. and 12 in. thick, with a steep inward slope to secure the glancing of the shot when struck. Communication with the magazines is obtained by means of an armoured tube, up which the cartridges and shot are brought. The guns are mounted on a turntable, similar to those used on railways, rotating on conical rollers. The diameter of the table is 24 ft., so that the guns cannot be brought within the protection of the barbette; when the breech is depressed for loading, the muzzles are dangerously elevated, and when they are run out for firing they are protruded beyond the side. The top of the barbette is protected as far as possible by 3 in. plating flush with the parapet; outside is a circular gallery which serves the double purpose of forming a pathway round the barbette, and a breakwater against the shipping of seas. The experimental firing of the guns, twenty-four rounds in all, single and double firing, was so far satisfactory as it proved that the barbettes and adjacent parts of the ship could bear the strain very well.

An Illustration of H.M.S. Colossus appeared in our Journal a fortnight ago; we now present a Sketch in one of her gun-turrets, where a couple of 42-ton guns are placed, and workmen are busied about some of the fittings.

Large orders were issued from the Admiralty on Saturday for the purchase of additional torpedo-boats, and several extensive shipping firms have been requested to hold themselves in readiness to execute important commissions, should circumstances render it necessary to call upon them.

In accordance with instructions from London, work was carried on in several of the departments at Woolwich Arsenal on Sunday, chiefly in order to expedite the completion of the armament for the mercantile cruisers. Guns and gun-carriages are being dispatched to Liverpool as soon as completed.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

With the exception of the Adelphi, where Mr. Sims's melodrama, "The Last Chance," goes even better than it did on the first night, each act and scene being rewarded with bountiful applause, defeat and disaster seem to have settled on the old theatrical district whose head-quarters are in the Strand. Mr. Thomas Thorne, who at the Vaudeville has been "Under Fire," and made a gallant defence with Dr. Westland Marston's play, has been quickly compelled to retire in the face of the enemy. In the course of this week we shall see Mr. H. J. Byron's posthumous comedy, frequently rehearsed, but never yet produced; and if "Open House" does not happen to suit the public taste, it will not be strange if Mr. Thorne falls back on "Loose Tiles," or on one of the farcical plays that suit the dramatic appetite of the hour. Farce, from being a dead letter, has suddenly started to life again, and plays of a serious interest are for the moment tabooed by general consent. Such waves of fancy frequently pass over the metropolis. Sooner or later the reaction will come, but for the moment the farce-writer is most in requisition, and people do not ask themselves what is the best play to be seen so much as where they can laugh the longest and the loudest. And yet there are gourmets in the matter of farce, for Mr. David James has met with the same kind of reverse as his old friend and partner Mr. Thorne. "Le Train de Plaisir" was found very amusing at the Palais Royal Theatre in Paris, but "The Excursion Train" has run off the rails and met with an accident at the renovated and reconstructed Opéra Comique, where Mr. James will soon be seen in one or other of his famous characters. At the Avenue, close by the Embankment, success could scarcely have been expected with a programme consisting of so vulgar a play as "Tact," followed by such a silly example of pointless buffoonery as "A Fashionable Beauty." The chaff is separated from the grain in dramatic matters very promptly nowadays, and the news of success or failure gets wind quickly. The large increase of theatres has certainly not encouraged the public to look more leniently upon work that is not of the first class in each department of the art.

The Grasshopper of Miss Jennie Lee at the Strand is, I confess, disappointing. I should have thought that this merry little lady, who played Jo with such exceptional ability in "Bleak House," would have been seen to very great advantage in any version of "La Cigale." There was something wanting alike in the performances of both Chaumont and Miss Farren; but Miss Lee had proved her ability in adding sentiment to the merry gambols of the street Arab. But whether it is that Antipodean audiences did not care to study the delicate tints and to contrast the light and shade that could have been given to the life of the loving and rescued circus-rider, we know not; certain it is that Miss Lee ignores the pathetic side of the girl's life and over accentuates her reckless Bohemianism. In fact, "Little Good Luck" is no longer a scheme for many-sided art, but the central figure in a quaint variety show, that has, no doubt, its admirers. Miss Jennie Lee can sing a song with delightful expression and dance a hornpipe with "twinkling heels"; and, whilst doing one or the other, it does not matter one straw to her audience whether the actress could or could not give a more vivid and truthful picture of the poor child, who finds in her simple preserver the man she can honestly love. Let me not be misunderstood. "La Cigale," in whatever form, must be a play with far more laughter than tears in it. Neither Chaumont, nor Dupuis, nor Lassouche, nor Baron, nor the atmosphere of the Varieties Theatre is attuned to sentiment nearly so strong as Dickens gives us in the character of Jo. But in these plays there is often an undercurrent of sympathy and humanity not unpleasant. The old play, "Good for Nothing," is a farce; but Nan, with all her tomboy ways, is often as pathetic as any character in serious drama. The poetical side of the Grasshopper's character has been wholly ignored. C. S.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE CLOUDS AFTER THE RAIN.

Of all ways of ending a quarrel the best, probably, is to shake hands and say no more about it. The great majority of quarrels arise from faults on both sides; so that any re-discussion of their original cause is but too apt to bring about a renewal of the hostilities which it is intended to close. Nevertheless, there are exceptions to this general rule, and it was certainly a little unfortunate that Clare and Adrian, in their eagerness to become reconciled, should have carefully shunned all reference to the lady whose vagaries had so nearly created a lasting breach between them. A few direct questions and honest answers would have set Clare's mind at rest; but neither question nor answer passed, and so what might have been a solid peace remained little more than a truce, to which some trifle might at any moment put a term.

And in a very short time the requisite trifle was forthcoming. Entering the breakfast-room rather late one morning, Adrian saw, among the letters beside his plate, one addressed in Lady St. Austell's bold, flowing hand, and had an intuitive conviction that Clare had seen it too. Now, in the early days of their married life the young couple had thoughtlessly agreed to make their letters common property, and although the custom had lately fallen into abeyance, it had never been formally abrogated. Thus, after breakfast, Clare asked in a matter-of-course way to be shown Adrian's batch of correspondence, which it was out of the question that she should see in its entirety; for one of the letters ran as follows:—

"Kilmuir Castle, Inverness, N.B., Aug. 20.

"Dear Mr. Vidal,—I have been thinking a great deal about you during the last few days, and I have always noticed that when I take these fits of thinking about my friends, they are in need of help. Of course, you will not admit that you are bored to death at Polruth; but I feel convinced that you are bored; so I write to say that we have room for you here whenever you can summon up courage to defy your jailers and escape over the border. You might even bring the head-jailer with you, if you liked; only then you would have to telegraph to me, so that I might send her an invitation in due form. But I really think you had better give yourself a holiday, and come alone. We have a very cheery house-party, and I dare say you have heard that the birds are unusually wild this year. Or is it the reverse that they ought to be? I know nothing about sporting matters; but I do know that Lord St. Austell has been in a good humour for three days running, which shows that all must be well.

"I wonder whether you caught it that afternoon when Mrs. Vidal came in so unexpectedly and found you in Grosvenor-square. I did. First I was attacked by Lord St. Austell, who accused me of having made myself 'conspicuous' with a certain person who shall be nameless, and showed me a disgraceful paragraph in the Anglo-Saxon, about which I shall have a word or two to say to you when we meet. Then Mr. Heriot took up his parable, and preached me such a sermon as I never listened to in my life before. Between ourselves, I suspect him of being a little sweet on the head-jailer; for he waxed quite eloquent about her, and was in a terrible state of fuss because he thought I wanted to rob her of her captive. I don't want to rob anybody; but I do think that, considering how good your conduct is, you might occasionally be let out on a ticket-of-leave. I have several things to talk to you about; so please make up your mind to join us, and believe me, yours always, JULIA ST. AUSTELL."

Evidently, such a missive as this could not be delivered into the hands of the person pleasantly described as the head-jailer. Adrian might mutter, "Confound the woman!" and declare to himself that he had never given her any excuse for being so impertinent; but he well knew that to ask Clare to believe that statement in the presence of documentary evidence to the contrary, would be asking for a good deal more than he was likely to get. When, therefore, she made the request above mentioned, he simply handed her over a few lines from Pilkington upon matters of business, a couple of bills, a very lengthy communication from an obsequious wine merchant, and an offer on the part of a German lottery-agent to secure him, in return for one sovereign, a good chance of winning "the large sum of £30,000 sterling."

"And the other?" said Clare, quietly.

"Oh, the other was from Lady St. Austell, asking me—at least, asking us—to go and stay with them in Scotland. Of course, we shan't go."

Clare raised her eyebrows. "Why did she write to you, instead of to me, I wonder?"

"Well, she wanted to know if there was a chance of your accepting the invitation."

Then followed the inevitable question, "May I see what she says?" and the evasive answer, which was perhaps equally inevitable. In a very short space of time this hapless couple were as much at cross-purposes as if they had never been half drowned at Poddly Joke at all. Adrian felt that Fate was treating him with unmerited harshness. He was forced to acknowledge that Clare was not wholly unreasonable this time; and yet he could neither do what she wanted him to do nor give any plausible reason for refusing. "Surely," he exclaimed, after a somewhat painful interchange of words, which there is no need to record, "we are not going to be so silly as to quarrel again about this woman!"

"I don't mean to quarrel any more, Adrian," answered Clare, sadly; "quarrelling will never make things any better. But it is no fault of mine if you have to choose between me and Lady St. Austell."

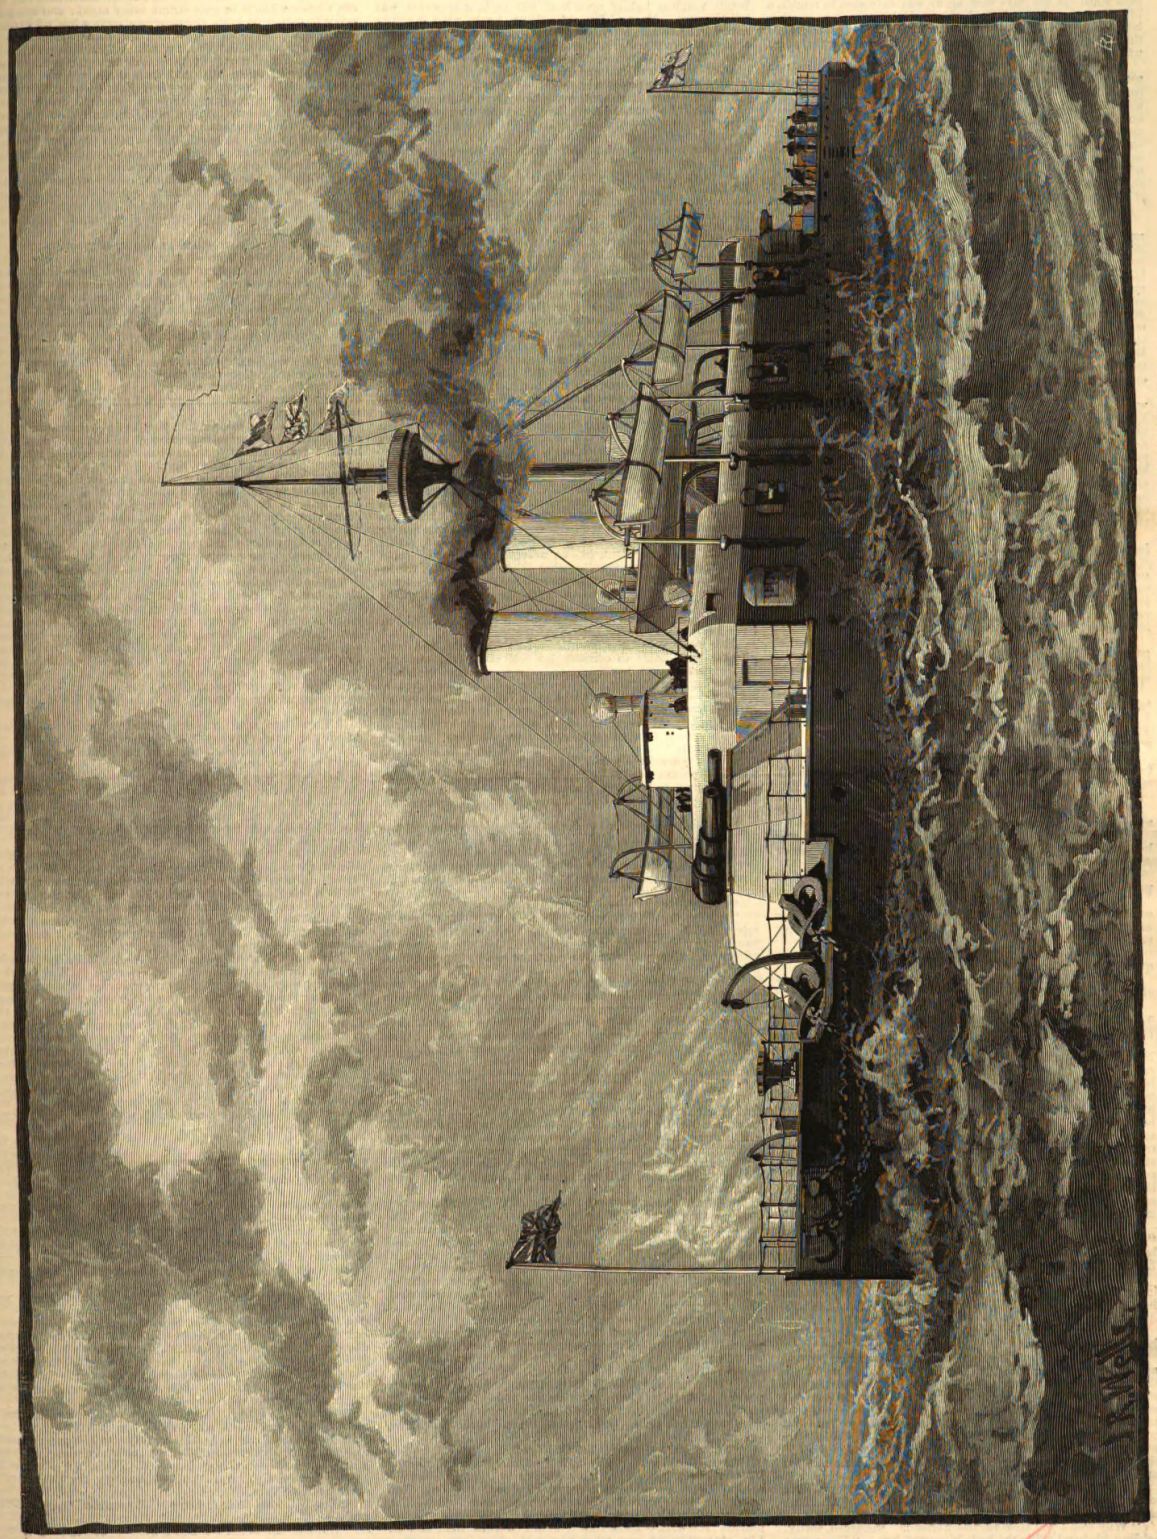
"What do you mean?" he asked, anxiously.

"Oh, nothing that need alarm you," she replied, with a touch of bitterness. "I shall not speak to anyone else about the matter, and there will be no scandal. Only, if you claim liberty, I claim it too, and we must lead separate lives after this, though we may remain under the same roof. Perhaps, after all, that is what you will think the most sensible plan."

"Clare," said Adrian, "I give you my honour as a gentleman that I care no more for Lady St. Austell than for—for old Mrs. Treweeke. Surely you must believe me."

"Yes," she answered, calmly, "I believe you, since you tell me that it is so. But that is not enough. I don't understand your distinctions; I don't know where you consider that flirtation ends and love begins; and I think I have a right to say that you must belong to me altogether or not at all. If you care enough for me to accept that bargain, and if you care for Lady St. Austell as little as you say, you will show me her letter."

The demand was, no doubt, justifiable, although it might have been less peremptorily put. Adrian met it by producing Lady St. Austell's letter, which he tore into fragments and scattered to the four winds of heaven. "I am not prepared to demonstrate my innocence by unquestionable proofs at every step," he remarked. "You tell me in one breath that you believe what I say, and that I must do so-and-so before you will be convinced that I am speaking the truth."



Clare flushed a little when she saw the scraps of paper fluttering away in the breeze; but she answered tranquilly enough: "That was not what I said; but it doesn't much signify. You will be able to write and receive what letters you please in future, for I shall never ask to see them again." And, so saying, she left him.

There was one letter which it was incumbent upon Adrian to write that day, and he was at first inclined to make it a very rude one. When, however, he remembered that his correspondent would infallibly detect the cause of his ill-humour, and be amused by it, he changed his mind and dispatched a short note thanking Lady St. Austell for her kind invitation, which he regretted that he was not able to accept, and merely remarking, casually, "I must have given you some false impression as to my being bored at Polruth. If I am a prisoner here, I am a very willing one." He added a few commonplaces, by way of showing that he was too indifferent to Lady St. Austell's insinuations to be offended by them, and flattered himself that he had conveyed a snub as delicately and effectually as the case permitted.

Snubbing a woman who has involved you in domestic broils is not, however, of much more practical use than killing a wasp after it has stung you, and Adrian knew that his wife would not have been contented with the delicacy of this snub, even if she had been informed of it. Her position was a perfectly intelligible one. He had only to promise that he would drop Lady St. Austell's acquaintance and all past transgressions should be blotted out. But this was what he did not choose to do. He thought that he understood the nature of women, and that concessions seldom move them towards generosity. Supposing that he made the renunciation demanded of him now, other renunciations would assuredly be demanded of him before long, and the end of it would be that his wife would become what Lady St. Austell had called her, his jailer—a very kind jailer, no doubt, still, a jailer. He judged it best, therefore, to submit to present discomfort, and trusted vaguely that in process of time Clare would "come round."

Of course, she did nothing of the kind; of course, every day that Adrian remained estranged from her and was apparently resigned to the estrangement lessened the probability of her doing so; of course, also, the said estrangement was more easily consented to than concealed. It ended by becoming apparent even to Mrs. Irvine; and she, good soul, was far from sharing Heriot's conviction of the futility of interference. She attacked both the young people in turn with inquiries as to what was the matter, would not take "Nothing" for an answer, and gave them and herself a world of bother before it dawned upon her that she had much better hold her tongue.

All this rendered residence at Cardrew far from pleasant to Adrian, who, nevertheless, did not suffer as much as Clare. He partly forgot the contrariness of things when he was at work, and justified Mr. Wilbraham's appreciation of the artistic temperament by putting a good deal of his sorrowful experience into picturesque language for the subsequent delectation of the public. And then, in the month of September, he obtained what he could not but regard as a happy release. Under other circumstances, he would have unhesitatingly declined an invitation to go to some friends in Warwickshire for a few days' shooting; but now he jumped at it; and he made himself so agreeable to his entertainers that when the few days were up he was entreated to remain a little longer; after which, he was asked to go on to another house, and thence to a third; so that the few days lengthened themselves out into six weeks, and it seemed hardly worth while to return to Cornwall at all.

Clare joined him in London early in November. He had some faint hope that by this time she might have "come round," but was speedily undeceived. She had looked the situation in the face, had determined upon her line of action, and had no thought of swerving from it. Since it was her destiny to be such a wife as Adrian had described in print—such a wife as, by all accounts, many women were condemned to be in these evil days, she would accept what she could not avoid without the scandal of an open separation. Henceforth, she would do as others did, and ignore her husband's flirtations, if it pleased him to indulge in any. What she would not submit to was the insult of a pretended love.

She was not insulted in that way. Habit heals most hurts, and Adrian was becoming accustomed to the changed order of his life. So long as there were no rows, domesticity was at least endurable—especially when you didn't have too much of it. Plenty of his friends of both sexes had returned to London, and were very glad to see him again. Many a pleasant afternoon and evening did he spend among them, and many a little dinner did he organise, to be followed by an adjournment to one of the theatres. Clare entertained them when he chose to invite them to his house, but seldom accompanied him when he went to theirs. She found plays tedious, she said, and he took her at her word. She had been of a different opinion once; but then that was a whole year ago.

He was walking down Bond-street one afternoon when he was stopped by a footman, who muttered something; and looking in the direction from which the man had come, he was aware of a certain smart victoria which he had not expected to see in London at that season of the year. The lady who was seated in it, wrapped in sables, the value of which would have kept a whole street-full of her husband's tenantry from cold and hunger through the winter months, held out a little gloved hand to him, saying—"Where are you going this dismal afternoon? Come home with me, and I will give you a cup of tea."

And so presently Adrian was in the carriage, and progressing rapidly towards Grosvenor-square.

Lady St. Austell confined her observations to harmless generalities on the way; but when she and her guest were seated before the fire, with the tea-table between them, she leant forward and said, gently: "Why were you so angry with me for asking you to come to us in Scotland? An invitation isn't generally considered an affront."

Adrian sighed. He was not going to let her know what good cause for anger she had given him; but after a moment he answered: "You put your invitation in a way that would have affronted a good many people."

Lady St. Austell laughed a little. "You didn't like my taking it for granted that you must be bored at Polruth. Well, I apologise. You were not bored—you couldn't be bored. And have you remained on at Polruth ever since I heard from you?"

"Not quite ever since," answered Adrian. "I went away towards the end of the time to get a little shooting, and then I stayed about with different friends for a few weeks."

"By yourself?"

"My wife was not with me. Of course, she wanted to see as much of her own family as she could."

"Very natural and creditable on her part. What sort of houses have you been staying in?—and whom did you meet? Any pretty people?"

"Pretty? Well, yes, I suppose some of them were rather pretty. I really didn't notice particularly."

"Oh, nonsense! Don't tell me that Mrs. Vidal hasn't catechised you about them. I am sure she knows exactly how many of them were pretty, and exactly how pretty the pretty ones were."

"Indeed she doesn't. She has never asked me a single question about them."

"Really! Well, I am more inquisitive. Tell me who they all were, if you please."

Adrian smiled and complied with her request, running over a string of names, which she interrupted by an impatient gesture.

"That will do: I never heard of any of them in my life. Now I am going to ask you a question which will make you cross. No; on second thoughts, I won't ask the question, because you have unintentionally answered it already. I will make an assertion instead. You and Mrs. Vidal have been having a slight difference of opinion. Will you think me very horrid if I say that I am not sorry for it? I knew that it must come some day, and I am rejoiced that you have had the courage to stand up for yourself. Since you were going to pay visits, you might have come to me; but never mind that. The great thing is that you have declared your independence. I have no doubt that Mrs. Vidal has many charming qualities, and I have always been the first to admit that she has a charming face; but"——

"If it's quite the same thing to you," broke in Adrian; "I'd rather not discuss her. Won't you tell me how you have been spending the autumn, and what brings you to London?"

"That won't take long. After we left Scotland, we were in Hertfordshire for a time, and then we went to Newmarket for the Cambridgeshire. I suppose you know that Lord St. Austell's horse won."

"Yes, I saw it in the papers," answered Adrian. "I hope he made a pot of money."

"I can't say; but I should think he did; for he was amiability itself for some days after the race. Now he has departed for Paris with some other young fellows of his own standing, and I believe he talks of going on to Monaco. I only hope he will; because then I shall not be wanted to entertain people before Christmas; and I do so hate the country at this time of year! If I can manage it, I shall stay where I am until he comes back to England. And perhaps," she added, with a smile, "you will sometimes look in upon me in my loneliness."

He said he would. Lady St. Austell had a way of talking to him which put him upon good terms with himself, and he had no longer any reason for wishing to avoid her.

"Why won't you treat me like a friend?" she asked, softly, holding his hand while she bade him good-bye. "You might do worse than tell me your troubles. I have had a great deal of experience, and, above all, I am a woman. I think I could give you some good advice, if you would let me."

The upshot of this interview was that it was succeeded by several others, in the course of which Adrian was persuaded to open his heart in some degree to this friendly sympathiser. He only half trusted her; but a confidant of any kind was a boon to him, and Lady St. Austell showed a great power of participation in his feelings. As for advice, it must be confessed that she had not much of that to offer. On the other hand, she had plenty of compassion at his service. Of the institution of marriage she spoke with pathetic eloquence. A careless observer might have thought that Lady St. Austell's bonds weighed lightly upon her; but such, it appeared, was not the case. Ah, no! She, like others, knew what it was to marry in haste and repent at leisure. That was why she was able to feel so deeply for those who had made a similar mistake. To be linked to an uncongenial fellow-captive, without hope of escape, was bad enough; but how much worse did it become when—as so often happened—you met too late the one person who could have made you happy, and whom you, perhaps, might have made happy, had the Fates been propitious! There were tears—real tears—in Lady St. Austell's eyes while she discoursed thus.

Adrian was not much to blame if he understood himself to be the person alluded to in these plaintive murmurings, because that was precisely what he was meant to understand; but he is as open to as much blame as the reader may please to adjudge to him for finding the discovery rather agreeable than otherwise. He was not in the least in love with Lady St. Austell; but a little sentimentality was what he had never yet been able to help enjoying, and this woman was past mistress of the art of flirtation. The truth—if Adrian had only known it—was that she had taken his measure. In the beginning of their acquaintance she had been a little bit afraid of him. Her knowledge of mankind had, up to that time, been derived from observation of a class to which he did not belong—a class composed of younger sons, Guardsmen, budding politicians, and the like—and she had not been sure whether the author of "Satiety" might not be rather too clear-sighted a person to be imposed upon by the cajoleries that pleased those simple folk; but having now discovered that he was quite as great a fool as the rest of them, she felt her feet upon firm ground, and brought all her accustomed arts to bear upon him. She had quite discarded the flippant manner which characterised her at ordinary times; she had soft modulations in her voice which were calculated to reach the toughest heart; and she always took care to sit with her back to the light.

It may be hoped that the result of so much painstaking endeavour proved satisfactory to Lady St. Austell; but whether it did or not, there was one humble member of her household to whom Mr. Vidal's frequent appearances in Grosvenor-square were a source of pure delight. One evening, as Adrian was descending the staircase, the baize door alluded to in a former chapter was suddenly flung open, and the figure of Susan Bowman, erect and silent, like an avenging apparition, barred his passage. He was not altogether taken by surprise, for he had often thought that some such episode would occur sooner or later; and he was able to say quite calmly and good-humouredly:

"Well, Susan, how are you? I am glad to find that you have dropped into such a good situation."

This was rather a disappointment to Susan, who had been at some little pains to contrive her coup de théâtre, and who had expected that her faithless lover would turn pale and stagger back in dismay. So she returned, with considerable acrimony—"Oh, you knew I was here, did you? Some people have plenty of cheek! I suppose it never came into your head that, living in this house and seeing what goes on in it, I might have something interesting to say to your wife about you and her Ladyship."

Adrian immediately put his finger and thumb into his waistcoat pocket; and if he had known how very near he was, for a moment, to having his face slapped, he would probably have thought twice before committing himself to that suggestive action.

But Susan remembered that various domestics were lurking in the hall below, and put a curb upon the promptings of nature. "I want to speak to you," she said, rapidly and in a low voice. 'Meet me to-morrow afternoon by the Round Pound in Kensington Gardens at four o'clock sharp. Do you understand?"

"Really, Susan"——

"Really, Mr. Vidal, you'll do as I tell you, or you'll repent it. No; I'm not to be bought off this time. Keep your money in your pocket, and don't be late to-morrow afternoon, unless you want to drive me to do what you'll be sorry for."

It seemed to Adrian that he had better yield. Susan was rather alarming with her vague menaces; it was wiser to keep friends with her than to quarrel with her; and at four o'clock on a winter's afternoon it is so dark that one may meet anybody in Kensington Gardens without appreciable risk. So he said, "Very well, then," and went his way pensively.

CHAPTER XXV.

DE WYNT UPON MARRIAGE.

One of the first visitors whom Clare received after her return home was Mr. De Wynt; and it was with sincere regret that she informed him that Miss Vidal would not be in London that autumn. "I asked her to come to us, and at first she seemed quite inclined to accept; but now it appears that she has changed her mind, and I am afraid we shan't see her again before the spring."

De Wynt shook his head ruefully. "I've heard from her, too," he remarked. "Of course you've seen her book, 'The Islands of the Blest.' Awfully clever; don't you think so?"

"Well, I don't know," said Clare, who was not pleased with her sister-in-law. "Travels don't interest me much, as a rule. Next year, I suppose, we shall have a companion volume, with a representation on the cover of Georgina driving a team of reindeer, and an aurora borealis in the background. Did she tell you that she proposes to spend this winter in driving through the north of Norway and Sweden?"

"Yes; she mentioned it. I knew she would be off somewhere. I told you so, if you remember."

"How ridiculous it is of her!" exclaimed Clare, impatiently.

"Oh, I shouldn't call it ridiculous. I think it's very plucky of her, you know. From a selfish point of view, I should be very glad if she would give up globe-trotting; but then it wouldn't do to tell her so. It's no business of mine, you see."

"No business of yours, Mr. De Wynt?"

The little man laughed. "Well, Mrs. Vidal, I think you know what my hopes—if I may venture to call them hopes—are. I haven't made much secret of them, anyhow. You think me faint-hearted; but you make a mistake. I'm nothing of the kind, and I would ask her to be my wife to-morrow, if I didn't know that it would be worse than useless. I've often thought over what you said about my asserting myself; but I am convinced that the time hasn't come for me to do that with any chance of success."

"It seems to me that you have just as good a chance now as you will have next year; and Georgina herself once told me that she could never respect a man who didn't make her obey him," said Clare, diplomatically suppressing a portion of the statement referred to.

"Ah, that's because she takes an altogether wrong view of marriage. According to my notion, there ought not to be any question of commanding or obeying on either side."

"The marriage service," observed Clare, "makes a woman promise to love, honour, and obey her husband."

"Yes; but she can't love him if he beats her, and she can't honour him if he gets drunk every night; and as a good many husbands do both, the marriage service has no business to make people promise what they may find it impossible to perform. As to Miss Vidal, my idea is that she ought to be allowed plenty of rope. In process of time she is sure to get tired of a wandering life; and then, don't you see, she may very likely say to herself, 'I have had about enough of this; and there's De Wynt ready and waiting. He isn't much to look at, and he isn't overburdened with brains, but he's a good-natured little beggar, and he has been constant for a fairish number of years.' At least, that's what I hope for."

"You seem to have thought it all out in a very dispassionate and unromantic way," Clare remarked.

"Well, yes; I'm afraid I am rather unromantic; but then I flatter myself that I have a good deal of what you might call 'staying power' in me, and that always tells in the long run. It's a family gift. My old uncle has it in a remarkable degree."

"Has your uncle grown old while waiting for somebody to marry him?" asked Clare.

"Oh, no; it takes another form with him—the form of living. He is nearer eighty than seventy now, but he can do a day's shooting as well as anybody, and he told me last month, when I was down at his place, that I needn't hope to succeed him for another twenty years. I think that was a little bit of swagger, though, put on to annoy me. Not that I want to hurry him; only, of course, I shall be a good deal better off when he goes aloft; and a man with a decent property does feel rather more confidence in making an offer of marriage than a Government clerk. But I mustn't bore you any more, Mrs. Vidal; it's very good of you to have listened to me so long."

Clare, however, assured him that he did not bore her at all, and that she was greatly interested in his prospects. "I haven't many things to interest me nowadays—I mean, in London," she added, with a sigh.

So Mr. De Wynt, whose admiration for Mrs. Vidal was second only to the admiration which he felt for her sister-in-law, grew to be as steady a frequenter of the house in Alexandra-gardens as he had been earlier in the year. He soon discovered that things were not going quite smoothly there, and, by dint of making use of his eyes and ears, arrived at a tolerably clear understanding of the facts; after which it became his chief object to divert Mrs. Vidal's thoughts from her grievances. He was himself a very simple, honest, and clean-living little fellow; but he had seen too much of the world to be greatly scandalised or indignant at Vidal's supposed infidelity He only thought, as Lord St. Austell had done, that the man had shocking bad taste, and so dismissed him from his mind. But that Mrs. Vidal should be made unhappy gave him greater concern, and he immediately set his brains to work to devise consolations for her. His strategy was of a very transparent kind; but she lent herself to it, accepting, not ungratefully, his well-meant efforts to cheer her up.

"There are some rather good pictures at the French Artists this year, they say," he remarked one afternoon; "I wish you would take me to see them, Mrs. Vidal. And, Vidal, you'll come too, won't you?"

Adrian answered that he would, with pleasure; but when the next morning came, he told Clare that he was afraid he could hardly manage it. "You see, I have a lot of things to do, and I can't well sacrifice a whole afternoon. But I am sure De Wynt will be delighted to look after you, and I'll join you at the gallery if I can."

Clare said "Very well." She never inquired now how Adrian spent his time; but he was accustomed to speak of himself as being very busy, and latterly he had taken to lunching at his club, so that she did not often see him between the hours of breakfast and dinner. She supposed that he was a good deal at the office of the Anglo-Saxon, and had hardly expected that he would be able, as he said, to "sacrifice a whole afternoon" to her.

Nor was she much surprised when he failed to keep his appointment at the picture-gallery. She and De Wynt walked conscientiously round, with their catalogues in their hands, examining the works of art, in which, perhaps, neither of them felt any absorbing interest, and after having accomplished this duty, sat down and waited until it became evident that waiting any longer would be useless. Then Clare said that she would be glad of a little exercise, and that if Mr. De Wynt wouldn't mind walking as far as Park-lane with her, she would take a hansom for the rest of the way. It was no great favour to ask; for she knew that De Wynt never wearied of company in which he could freely ventilate his dreams of future bliss; and indeed he embarked upon the familiar theme as soon as they were out in the street.

"I wish we had Miss Vidal with us," he began. "She is a first-rate judge of a picture, and she would have told us what to admire, and why to admire it. You can always depend upon her, don't you know. If she begins to talk about a subject, you may be sure she understands it, and if she doesn't know anything about it, she'll say so like a shot. I think I never met anyone so perfectly honest as she is."

Clare made the perfunctory murmur of approbation which she knew was expected of her. She had heard this eulogium pronounced a dozen or so of times already, and one can't always work oneself up to enthusiasm over the virtues of one's friends.

"And genuine honesty isn't such a common thing, you know," De Wynt went on. "Look at me, for instance. I don't think I'm more of an impostor than my neighbours; but I shouldn't like to admit that I was utterly ignorant about art; though if I know a Meissonier from a Bouguereau, it's about as much as I do. A humble individual like myself can't afford such luxuries as absolute candour. In fact, I don't see how one could get on in society at all without being rather a humbug in some ways."

"That is just what I think," agreed Clare, with more animation; "and that is why I don't like society."

"Yes; but if one does like society—as I confess that I do—and if one wants to be liked by society in return, it isn't possible to be quite so outspoken as Miss Vidal. I admire her honesty immensely; but naturally it must get her into trouble every now and then."

"You will have to cure her of it," remarked Clare, with a smile.

"Oh, no," answered De Wynt, quite seriously; "I should never attempt that. If I ever have the good luck to be her husband, I know very well that she will cause me some moments of intense anguish by telling my friends plainly what she thinks of them, and so on; but that is not the sort of thing that I should ask her to give up. One mustn't try to alter people's natures. My notion of marriage, as I was saying to you the other day, is that there ought to be a good deal of give and take about it. It isn't fair that one of two people should be always dictating to the other; and I am persuaded that the real reason why so many couples who should be the best of friends don't get on is that they won't agree to differ upon certain points."

"You allow that each side has a right to make conditions, though."

"Certainly; only they should be as few as possible, and they should be made beforehand. And, do you know, Mrs. Vidal, I think that, even if the conditions were not always observed very strictly, it would be just as well to take no notice. If people really care for each other, they can afford to overlook occasional breaches of contract, don't you think so? Anyhow, it 's better to do that than to be at loggerheads. Now I know a man—as good a fellow as ever stepped, and his wife is charming in every way; only, unfortunately, they don't quite hit it off, so that they are anything but happy together. And I believe it is all because he did something that offended her long ago. Perhaps he was rather too attentive to another woman, or it may have gone beyond a little attention—I don't know. At all events, he would be only too thankful to make friends again: and so, I fancy, would she. But she chooses to stand upon her dignity; and so—there it is."

Clare had no difficulty in guessing to whom these observations were intended to apply; but she was not offended: indeed it was hardly possible to be offended with so ingenuous a moralist. "I have no doubt," said she, "that nine men out of ten would agree with you as to what the injured person's conduct ought to be in that particular case; but supposing that it had been the lady who had received a little attention—or something that had gone beyond a little attention—from another man?"

"Ah, that 's complicating the question unnecessarily. All I meant to say was that it is wisest to shut your eyes to the defects of those whom you love and who love you, and when you can't do that any longer—well, to forgive them."

"And how many times is one to forgive?"

"Seventy times seven, Mrs. Vidal," answered the little man, stoutly. But the moderation of his nature compelled him to add, under his breath, "Though I must say that 's rather a large order. Twelves in four hundred and ninety—h'm! once a month for upwards of forty years. No; I should hope one wouldn't be required to forgive upon such a very extensive scale as that."

But Clare did not notice this muttered recantation. Her companion's reply had taken her somewhat aback, and had caused her to ask herself whether, after all, she was justified in insisting upon what she still considered to be her right. And did it matter very much whether she was justified or not? Secretly, she had hoped all along that Adrian would give in, just as he had hoped that she would do so; and it had not been without dismay that she had observed how perfectly well able he was to enjoy life without giving in. Almost she felt inclined to withdraw what she had said at Cardrew, to be reconciled with her husband, and to throw herself upon his generosity, which surely would not fail her.

Thus, revolving many thoughts in her mind, she walked on: while De Wynt, who had resumed his discourse, held forth to inattentive ears.

THE CHURCH.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has appointed June 30 and July 1 for the annual Diocesan Conference at Lambeth Palace.

The Bishop of Peterborough is recovering from his recent illness. His Lordship has been able to leave his bed.

The Rev. H. Frank Johnson, Rector of Chelmsford, has accepted the appointment of Archdeacon of Essex, rendered vacant by the death of the late Ven. J. G. Le M. Carey.

A Reuter's telegram from Capetown says that the Bishops designated by the Church Council of Natal to elect and consecrate a Bishop to succeed the late Dr. Colenso have refused to comply with the request.

The ancient Church of St. Michael, at Farnley, Yorkshire, is being rebuilt, at a cost of about £4000, towards which Mr. Pawson, of Farnley, and the Farnley Ironworks Company have each contributed £1000.

Earl Brownlow will preside at a meeting of the clergy and laity of the counties of Lincoln and Nottingham, to be held next Monday in the Consistory Court of Lincoln Minster, to consider the subject of raising a fitting memorial to the late Bishop Wordsworth.

On Monday the Old Chain Bible, carefully renovated, which had been placed in Canterbury Cathedral in the days of Henry VIII., was replaced by the Bishop of Dover on what is known as Cranmer's Desk, its original position. The Dean of Canterbury and Archdeacon Harrison also spoke.

On the occasion of their annual visitations, the Bishop of Ely and the Archdeacon of Gloucester both called attention to the serious reduction in the incomes of the clergy, in consequence of the depreciation of landed property, and suggested various remedies. The latter urges the extension of the power of the clergy to lease their glebes to ninety-nine years, so as to promote peasant farming.

At a county meeting at Truro on Tuesday, it was announced that the ladies of Cornwall had raised £14,000 for the internal fittings of the new cathedral. The Bishop, who presided, said that at a time when some were beginning to show a cowardly, craven spirit as to the future of the Church, this effort of the women of Cornwall was one for devout thankfulness.

A memorial window to the late Sir Charles Wyville Thomson, of the Challenger Expedition, has been unveiled in St. Michael's Church, Linlithgow.—The south transept of St. Mary's, Boltons, Kensington, has received two very fine two-light Munich stained-glass windows. The subjects represented are, "Ruth gleaning in the fields of Boaz," and "Christ blessing little Children," respectively. There windows, as well as the other two already in the church, are the works of Messrs. Mayer and Co.

On Sunday morning the Archdeacon of Middlesex inducted the Rev. W. R. Trench, Canon of Liverpool, and nephew of the ex-Archbishop of Dublin, to the valuable living of All Saints', Kensington Park.—The Bishop of Southwell has presented the living of the parish church of St. Michael and All Angels, Derby, to the Rev. Harry Roger Rolfe, lately assistant priest of Staveley, Derbyshire.—The Very Rev. H. B. Bromby, of Jesus College, Cambridge, who was Dean of Hobart Town, Tasmania, from 1876 to 1884, has been nominated to the important living of St. John's, Bethnal-green, void by the resignation of the Rev. Hugh Hulcatt. The Vicar-designate is son of the Right Rev. Dr. Bromby, Bishop of Tasmania from 1864 to 1882.

Lord Shaftesbury suggests that £5000 should be raised to provide new premises for the Young Men's Christian Association at Bournemouth, as a memorial of the late Earl Cairns.

BIRTHS.

On the 11th inst., Lady Margaret Ormsby Gore, of a son.

On the 2nd inst., at 54, Pembroke-road, Dublin, the wife of W. Lloyd, Esq., J.P., of Rockville, county Roscommon, Captain 5th Battalion Connaught Rangers, of a son and heir.

MARRIAGES.

On the 9th inst., at St. Mark's, Lewisham, by the Rev. R. Rhodes Bristow, Vicar of St. Stephen's, Lewisham, assisted by the Rev. S. Cattley Baker, Vicar of Usk, Mon., uncle of the bride, George Alexander, youngest son of Major Thompson, late Royal Artillery, of St. John's, Kent, to Anna Maria Frances, only child of Mr. Brackstone Baker, of Belmont Park, Lee, Kent.

On the 10th inst., at St. Andrew's Church, Ham, Francis, second son of Spencer Charrington, Esq., of Hunsdon House, Herts, to Alice Maud, eldest daughter of the late Walter Leith, Esq., and Mrs. Walter Leith, of the Manor House, Ham, Surrey.

On the 14th inst, at St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, Archibald Henry Hamilton, Barrister-at-law, J.P. for county Meath, to Mary A. (née Parry), widow of James Archbold Pears-Archbold, Esq., of Shotley Lodge, county Durham, and Cleckemin, Northumberland.

DEATHS.

On the 10th ult., Rebecca Thielcke (née Piercy), formerly of Oxfordshire, England, a resident of Chicago, U.S., for thirty years, in her 84th year, widow of Henry Daniel Thielcke. Edinburgh and Portobello papers please copy.

On the 12th inst., at Greenhill, Weymouth, William Johnson Smith, M.D., aged 72.

On the 9th inst., at her residence, 26, Queen's-gate-terrace, S.W., Emily Theophila, Viscountess Ashbrook, widow of the fourth Viscount Ashbrook, and daughter of Sir Thomas Theophilus Metcalfe, first Baronet, in her 95th year.

On the 11th inst., at St. Mary's Isle, the Earl of Selkirk, in his 76th year.

On the 10th inst., at Drayton House, Thrapstone, unexpectedly, Lady Edith Wyndham Quin, third daughter of the late Earl of Dunraven.

On the 11th inst., at 34, Prince's-gate, Dowager Lady Cremorne.

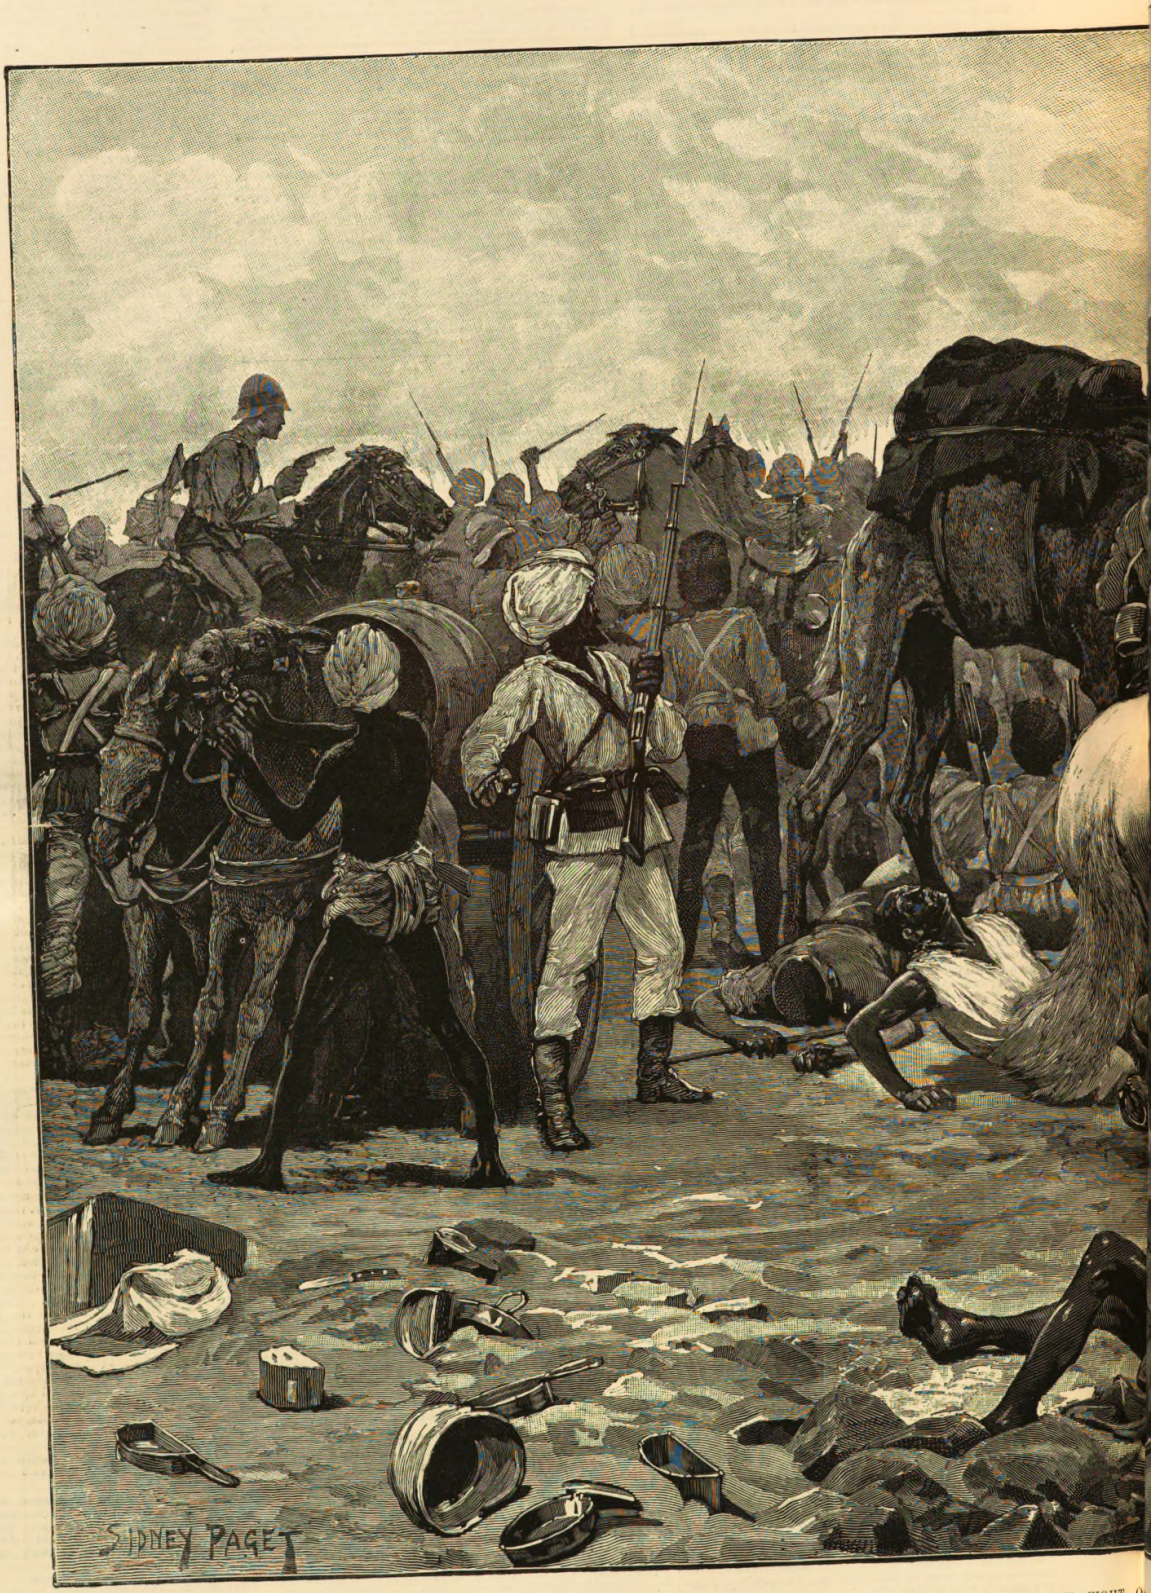
THE SILENT MEMBER.

Seldom in our history has a declaration of war appeared more imminent than it was on the Ninth of April, when the House of Commons, reassembling after the Easter recess, found itself face to face with an event most grave and threatening. The House is at its best at national crises, such as that which was unquestionably brought about by the news of General Komaroff's sudden attack upon the Afghan position near Penjdeh. Extremely disquieting though the tidings were—witness the public excitement in the streets, and the marked depreciation of Russian and other stocks at Capel-court—the House took things quietly. No Minister, no member, lost his head. Under this reserve, however, foreigners should know there was not an iota of flinching; but, on the contrary, an amount of calm determination and firm courage which would, perhaps, have been surprising to those unacquainted with the English character.

This fine temper animated each weighty Ministerial statement of the Premier. Clearly, in reply to Sir Stafford Northcote, did Mr. Gladstone place all the official information before the House. The Prime Minister, who wore a flower in his button-hole, as is usual with him on important occasions, placed himself at the outset in accord with the prevailing sentiment by referring to the conflict as a "very grave occurrence," in respect to which the Government would "carefully keep in mind both what is due to our engagements to the Ameer of Afghanistan and to ourselves as representing the British Crown." He then read the Russian version of the untoward episode, acknowledging that the Russians had attacked the Afghans, and defeated them "after a gallant fight," but excusing the assault on the ground of provocation by "acts of hostility on the part of the Afghans," the Russians adding that they afterwards retired to their "previous positions," that was to "the left bank of the Khushk," and stating that English officers directed the Afghans without taking any part in the actual engagement on the 30th of March. Then followed the Premier's recital of the pith of Sir Peter Lumsden's telegrams, which asserted that Captain Yate on the 29th of March met the Chief of the Russian Staff, and was assured by him that no notice of the "as-you-were" arrangement of March 17 had been received at the Russian Camp; and which later stated that on the 30th the Russians "had attacked and defeated the Afghans, and had occupied Penjdeh," the British officers being "neutral in the engagement." In the face of these facts, it was not unnatural that the Opposition should receive with derisive laughter the message read by Mr. Gladstone from our Ambassador at St. Petersburg:—

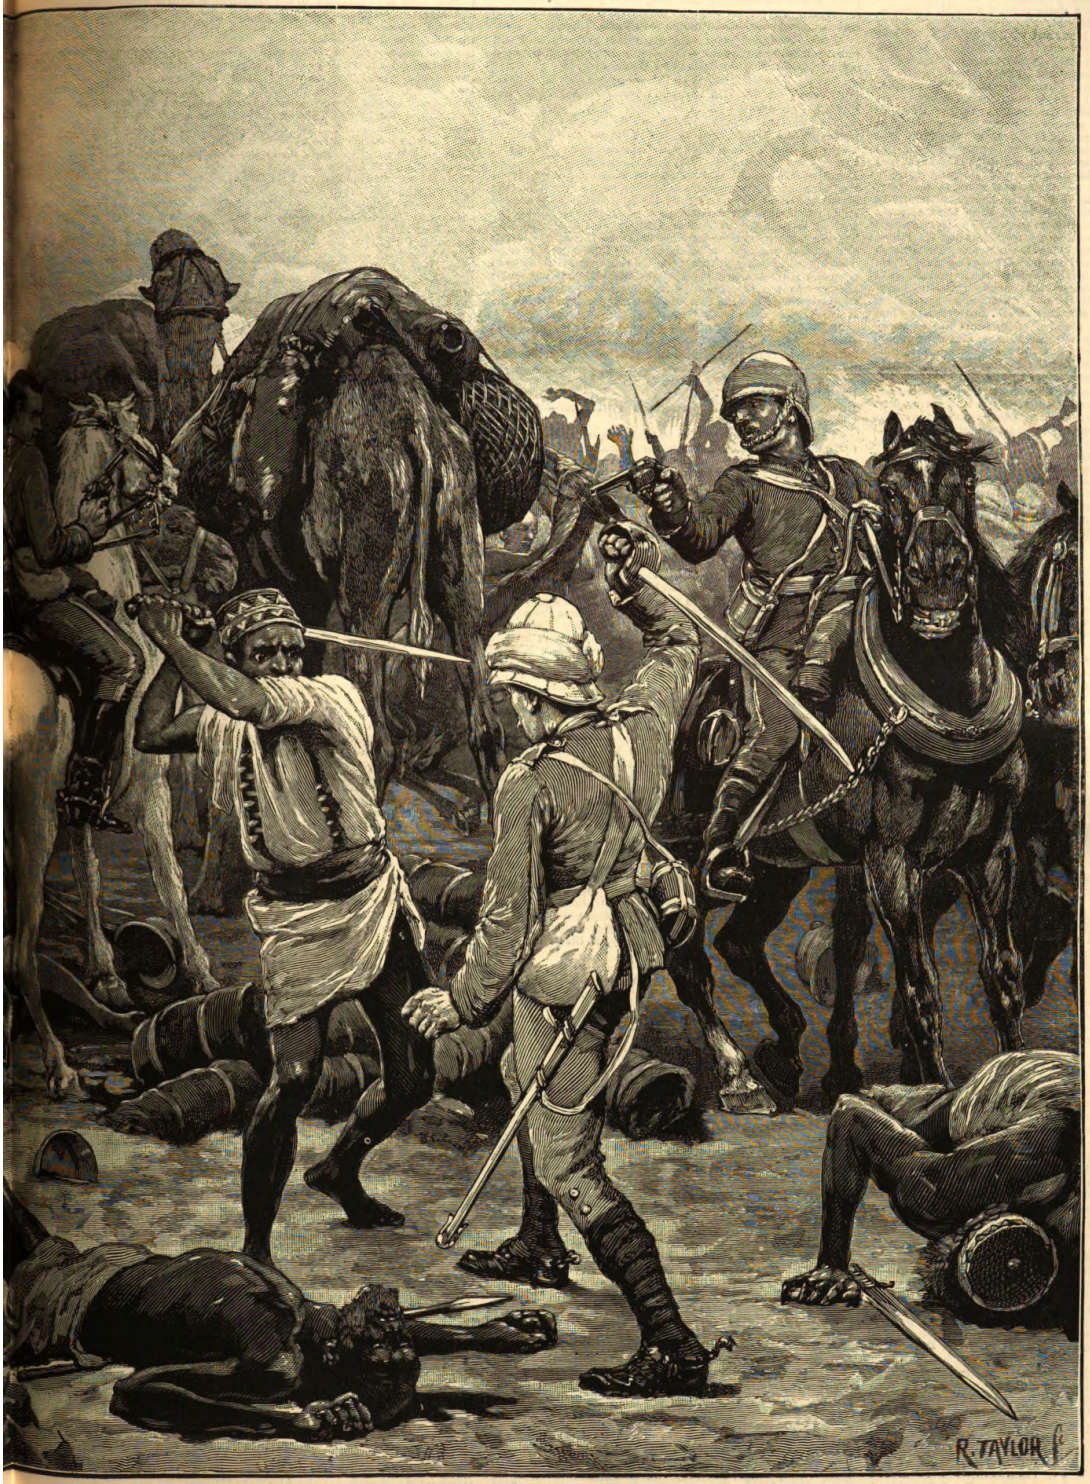
The Minister for Foreign Affairs expresses his earnest hope, and that of the Emperor, that this unhappy incident may not prevent the continuation of the negotiations—(laughter)—and he also reports a statement of M. De Giers that the Russians retired to their previous positions and did not occupy Penjdeh.



Although the subsequent message from Sir Peter Lumsden, communicated to the House by Mr. Gladstone after midnight, showing that the Afghans had prior to the combat taken up positions at Ak Tepe and near Pul-i-Khisti, may have allayed public excitement somewhat—the shiftiness of the Russians in this "painful matter" quite warrants the English Government to continue their energetic preparations for war. It is in the power of Russia to end the dispute which fills Europe with foreboding by forthwith sending their laggard Commissioner to negotiate and amicably settle the frontier question with Major-General Sir Peter Lumsden, who has been kept waiting for so suspiciously long a period upon the debatable ground. Until faith is kept in this straightforward way, England will go on arming, so as to be ready for any emergency.

Every other question—the Redistribution of Seats Bill and each measure before Parliament—pales almost into insignificance before this Russian difficulty. True, when the House of Lords met for the first time since the Easter Holidays on Monday, Earl Granville paid a tribute of respect to the memory of the late Earl Cairns, and read a letter written by the Lord Chancellor from a house of mourning in praise of the high character and commanding ability of his great contemporary; while the Marquis of Salisbury feelingly lamented the loss of his friend and colleague, and was followed by Lord Coleridge, who delivered a honeyed panegyric on the virtues of the ex-Lord Chancellor, whose death has occasioned a sad void in the Upper Chamber. But very soon the Afghan embroilment became uppermost. The noble Marquis the Leader of the Opposition questioned Lord Granville as to the truth of the reports that the Russians were advancing along the Murghab, and were actually at Herat. The Secretary for Foreign Affairs had "no reason whatever to believe in the truth of the rumours," and had only to announce the receipt from the Russian Ambassador of General Komaroff's statement "as to the causes of the lamentable conflict." On Tuesday, Earl Granville prevailed upon Lord Salisbury to agree without comment to the Message of the Queen calling out the Militia and the Reserves, and significantly added, "It will be satisfactory to your Lordships to know that the measures taken under this proclamation will entirely meet all the requirements which have been made by the Indian Government."

Loud cheers betokened the pleasure with which the House of Commons on Monday heard Mr. Gladstone's statement, in connection with the "deplorable incident . . . of the gravest misfortune," that the communications of Lord Dufferin with the Ameer at Rawul Pindi had been "both full and entirely satisfactory." As to General Komaroff's official account of the origin of the encounter, that had been referred to Sir Peter Lumsden, whose narrative had differed considerably from that of the Russian Commander. The Address in reply to her Majesty's Message calling out the Reserves was, on the motion of the Marquis of Hartington, sanctioned; but not before a debate had taken place on this amendment of Mr. Labouchere:—"And at the same time expressing a hope that the available forces of her Majesty would be speedily strengthened by the prompt withdrawal of our troops from the Soudan." This was negatived by a majority of 109—148 against 39 votes. Lord Randolph Churchill, who made his first speech since his return from India, voted with Mr. Labouchere in the minority. The noble Lord, who looks all the better for his trip, upon his reappearance on Thursday week was warmly greeted by Sir Stafford Northcote and the prominent members of the Opposition, and also received the friendly congratulations of Mr. Gladstone.



As the week wore on, the prospect became less warlike. But it is the intention of the Government to move for a Vote of Credit on account of the necessary preparations for war next week; the Budget being fixed for the Thursday. This year, at least, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's lot will not be a "happy one, happy one."

At the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales and Prince Albert Victor Edward at Kingstown, Dublin Bay, on Wednesday week, the pier was roofed overhead, by order of the Board of Works, with the well-known "Willesden paper"; and the same material was used for the shelter provided at the laying of the first stone of the Art Museum in Dublin.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN: THE FIGHT O

FROM A SKETCH BY MR. WALTER PAGET, OUR

OF SUNDAY, MARCH 22, AT McNEILL'S ZEREBA.
SPECIAL ARTIST WITH GENERAL GRAHAM'S FORCE.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, April 14.

Parliament, after having been introduced to the new Ministry, and after having voted one hundred and fifty millions for the Tonquin expedition, has adjourned until May 4. The post of President of the Chamber having become vacant by M. Brisson's acceptance of the Premiership, M. Floquet was elected in his place after a sharp contest with M. Fallières, the Opportunist candidate. M. Floquet is famous for his broad-brimmed hats, his luxuriant and turbulent locks, and for having cried "Vive la Pologne!" when the Czar visited the Palais de Justice at Paris in 1867. M. Floquet is also famous for his firm Republican sentiments and for having never consented to defend an unjust cause. During the Empire M. Floquet pleaded brilliantly in all the political causes célèbres; on Sept. 4, 1870, he proclaimed the Republic at the Hôtel de Ville; in 1871 he was elected member of the National Assembly; in 1872 he became President of the Municipal Council of Paris; in 1876 he was elected Deputy for Paris, and since then he has sat on the extreme left of the Chamber, and affirmed his ardent Republicanism on every possible occasion. It is interesting to notice at the present moment the efforts made by the Opportunists to keep the control of affairs in their hands, and the efforts made by M. Ferry to rehabilitate himself with a view to returning to power. The Opportunists certainly regret their hastiness in overthrowing M. Ferry, just on the eve of the general elections. M. Brisson announces that these elections will take place freely and loyally, but it is doubtful whether that promise will be fulfilled: the Opportunists still compose the majority in the Chamber, and if M. Brisson attempts to resist their wishes, there is no reason why they should not overthrow him before the elections take place. Where there are so many parties as there are at present in France, and where those parties are not agreed as to the form of government, it is difficult, if not impossible, for the Parliamentary system to work smoothly and give satisfactory results.

Thanks to the armistice in China and to the Parliamentary vacations, the political world is quiet. There is, however, once more talk of the expulsion of the Orleans and Bonapartist Princes. M. Brisson is understood to be a partisan of special laws against these poor Princes, which laws are to be voted before the next general elections. It appears, too, that the Ferry Ministry is to be avenged of the disgrace of its fall by the disgrace of the officers who commanded under its direction in Tonquin. General Brière de l'Isle is to be relieved of his command in chief, and placed under a new Commander-in-Chief, General De Courcy, while General Négrier is to be recalled to France. Meanwhile, M. Ferry has gone to travel in Spain, and to forget all the complications in which he played so curious a rôle.

The new Hôtel de Ville was inaugurated last Saturday, when a grand ball was given for the benefit of the poor of Paris and the wounded soldiers in Tonquin. The municipal palace was, it is true, officially inaugurated in 1882, but it was not nearly finished, although it had already cost twenty-six millions of francs. Even now it is not finished, and most of the interior decoration for the fête of Saturday was provisional. However, by the aid of tapestries, a profusion of plants and flowers, and floods of light, the effect was made very brilliant, and the thousands of people who witnessed the fête, both from the inside and from the outside, seemed well satisfied. On Saturday some fourteen thousand persons went to the ball; on Sunday and Monday more than sixty-nine thousand persons paid 50 centimes each to visit the Hôtel de Ville after the fête. The credit of the organisation of this colossal ball in all its thousand details is due to M. Alphand, the General Director of the Public Works of Paris, a man who remains in office, in spite of all political changes, and who is really, perhaps, the only man in France who cannot be replaced.

The sale of the contents of the late Gustave Doré's studio began last week, in much better conditions than were generally anticipated. The first two days' sales produced a total of 122,871f. The immense oil-painting, "The Death of Orpheus," was bought for 2400f., and I hear that it is the intention of the purchaser to cut up the canvas and retail it in pieces after having the stamp of the sale affixed to each fragment. The highest price paid was 6200f. for an oil-picture called "The Eagle"; Scotch oil-landscape, 3700f.; Swiss oil-landscape, 3200f.; four drawings for the "Ancient Mariner," 1600f.; eleven drawings for "Macbeth," 2685f.; thirty pieces of sculpture brought in all the small sum of 11,230f. There were many English and American buyers present, and it was remarked that the French Government was not represented, and nothing was bought on its behalf.

A new feature of the Paris Salon this year will be a tombola, the prizes of which will be pictures in the exhibition. 150,000 tickets will be issued, and there will be 137 prizes, varying in value from 500f. to 5000f.

M. Emile Ollivier, the ex-Minister of the Empire, will be a candidate at the forthcoming elections. M. Ollivier will deliver shortly a series of lectures, in which he will prove that all the Monarchical parties are dead, and that the Republic is henceforward imperishable in France. He will offer himself for election as a Socialist Republican. T. C.

The fiftieth birthday of the King of the Belgians was celebrated on the 9th inst. in Brussels with great ceremony. Telegrams were received by the King from every part of Europe. The ceremonies began at ten a.m. by a Te Deum in the cathedral, celebrated by the Primate. Thanksgiving services took place at the same hour in the Protestant and Jewish places of worship. The chief feature of the festivities was a review of the Civic Guards of Brussels and the suburbs, and part of the army. Twenty-five thousand men were present, Civic Guards and military in equal numbers. King Leopold, the Crown Prince of Austria, and Prince Philip and the Count of Flanders and a brilliant Staff were present. The display was spoiled by the incessant rain. The festivities closed on the 10th with a garden party in the splendid conservatories of the palace at Laeken. Three thousand persons were invited. The Crown Prince and Princess of Austria and the Prince and Princess of Saxe-Coburg left Brussels in the evening.

On the 8th inst. the Emperor of Germany entertained at dinner the Turkish Ambassador Extraordinary, Veli Riza Pasha, together with Said Pasha and the Staff of the Turkish Embassy here. Prince Bismarck has returned with his family from Schönhausen, and after a short stay in Berlin proceeds to Friedrichsruhe for the summer. The Chancellor has repeatedly expressed great satisfaction at the national present of Schönhausen. Now that Prince Bismarck possesses this property, he has become one of the wealthiest landowners in Prussia, his income derived from his properties being valued at 360,000 marks.

The King of Denmark on the 8th inst. completed his sixty-seventh year. In the forenoon he held a Levée in his palace, where many deputations waited upon him with their congratulations. For the first time during King Christian's reign, the Speaker did not congratulate him in the name of the Folkething. In the afternoon the Crown Prince gave a dinner at his palace.

The King and Queen of Sweden were received at Constantinople on the 9th inst. by the Sultan, with great pomp and cordiality, and were present next day at the religious ceremony of the Selamlik. At the conclusion of the ceremony, a large body of troops defiled before the King and the Sultan. Prince Charles of Sweden, who has been suffering from typhus fever, is now convalescent, and King Oscar left on Tuesday for Stockholm, staying en route at Bucharest and Vienna. The Queen remains at Constantinople with Prince Charles.

The Greek Court goes to-day (Saturday) to Corfu, and will remain there for six weeks.—The new line of railway between Athens and Corinth was opened on Wednesday.

The Easter week festivities and amusements at St. Petersburg closed on the 12th inst., and the Imperial family has returned to Gatschina.

Mr. Richard Grant White, a well-known American journalist and author, died at New York on the 8th inst.

Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner for Canada, has received a telegram from the Hon. John Norquay, the Premier of the Local Government of Manitoba, stating that the Legislature has passed a resolution to the effect that the House desires to place on record the fact that there is not the slightest disturbance in any part of Manitoba; that the trouble is confined to remote districts of the North-West Territory, more than one hundred miles to the north-west of the settled portions of Manitoba, and that any persons contemplating going to that province this spring can do so in the most perfect security.—The Governor-General has sent a message to the Dominion Parliament asking for a vote of £150,000 to defray the cost of repressing the rebellion in the North-West.

Information received in New York from La Libertad states that the bases of peace were accepted on Tuesday by San Salvador and Guatemala. Hostilities in Central America have now ceased.

The Agent-General for Queensland has been informed that the Hon. Berkeley Basil Moreton, a brother of the Earl of Ducie, has accepted the portfolio of Postmaster-General in Queensland.

The Ameer of Afghanistan has taken leave of the Viceroy of India to return to Cabul, apparently well satisfied with the negotiations at Rawul Pindi. His cousin and mortal enemy, Ayoub Khan, formerly ruling at Herat, has been put under arrest at Teheran by the Shah of Persia.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGES.

The marriage of the Rev. Archibald Campbell with the Hon. Helen Brodrick, second daughter of Viscount Midleton, was solemnised on Tuesday at St. Nicholas' Church, Peperharrow, Surrey. Owing to recent family losses, none but the nearest relatives were present. The bride wore a dress of duchesse satin, the skirt trimmed with flounces of Brussels lace, caught up with satin ribbon, and bunch of orange-blossoms, deep ruche round the bottom of the skirt, the train and body of duchesse satin, with front laced over Brussels lace—and with knot of orange-blossoms—veil fastened with diamond star, gift of bridegroom; diamond and pearl spray, gift of Duke of Buckingham; and diamond sprays, gifts of Countess of Wemyss and Mr. and Mrs. Pinckard, with natural orange-blossom. Round her neck she wore pearl and diamond pendant, gift of her father and mother. The bridesmaids—the Hons. Edith, Albinia, and Marian Brodrick, Miss Mary Macneal, the Hon. Caroline Bruce, and Miss Gaussen—wore dresses of nun's cloth trimmed with biscuit-coloured lace, caught up into festoons at the side by knots of cream-coloured satin ribbon. The best man was the Rev. H. R. Johnson. The bride and bridegroom left in the afternoon for Cowdray Park, the seat of the Earl of Egmont, the bride's going-away dress being of grey cashmere trimmed with plush, and bonnet with steel-beaded front and aigrette to match.

The marriage of Miss Godfrey, daughter of General and Mrs. Lowther Balfour, and the Hon. Rollo Russell, son of the late Earl Russell, will take place at St. Augustine's Church, Queen's-gate, next Tuesday morning, the 21st inst.

The Morning Post states that a marriage has been arranged, and will shortly take place, between Henri, third son of the late Vicomte De Satgé de St. Jean Château de Castelnau, Pyrenées Orientales, France, and Emily Frances, second daughter of the Hon. Mrs. Henry Ashley, of Stratton Manor, Dorchester.

The Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, Count Münster, and the Consul-General of the German Empire, have allowed their names to appear as patrons of an instrumental and vocal concert, which will be held on May 6 in Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, in aid of the funds of the German Teachers' Association.

Professor Arminius Vambéry, the celebrated Central Asian traveller, and learned Professor at the Buda-Pesth University, will visit England at the end of the present month for the purpose of giving some lectures on the Central Asian question. One of these will be given before the Indian section of the Society of Arts.

A public hall, a present to the town of Hatfield from the Marquis of Salisbury, was opened by Lord Robert Cecil on the 10th. The hall is a handsome large building in the Queen Anne style, of red brick, with moulded terra-cotta ornaments. A portion has been fitted up and let as a restaurant, while another part has been converted into a Conservative club. In the remaining portion are two reading-rooms and a billiard-room, which are to be public, while a hall above is for entertainments.

The organ of St. Pancras' Church was built in 1856. Considerable interest attaches to it from the fact of its being the late Mr. Henry Smart's organ at the time of his death, and that on which his unrivalled powers of extemporisation were last displayed. Hitherto it has been in a very imperfect and unfinished state, but within the last year, through the exertions of the Vicar (the Rev. Canon Spence) and his parishioners, it has been entirely reconstructed and completed, so as to render it an organ of the largest size and power, with every modern improvement and appliance. The work has been done by Messrs. Gray and Davison, the original builders, the total cost being about £2200. There was a dedication service on Wednesday, and there will be another next Sunday (to-morrow).—A magnificent organ, one of the largest parish church organs in the country, was opened in Beverley Minster on Tuesday, when a sermon was preached by the Archbishop of York. The instrument, which was built in 1767, has been reconstructed at a cost of £2500. It contains sixty-six stops and 3534 pipes.

THE COURT.

The Queen is deriving much enjoyment from her stay at Aix-les-Bains. Her Majesty takes one or two drives daily, Princess Beatrice nearly always accompanying her; and she went on the 8th inst. to the Castle of Bourdeau, a hunting-box of the old Counts of Savoy, built in the eleventh century, and commanding a beautiful view of the Lake of Bourget, from the terrace 900 feet above the water's edge. The Queen has telegraphed to New York the expression of her sympathy with Mrs. Grant, and inquired as to the condition of her husband. Princess Beatrice, attended by Major Edwards, visited Geneva on the 9th. The Queen took a drive to Moulin de Prime, and to the beautiful cascade of Gresy, where, seventy-two years ago, the Baroness De Broc, sister of Madame Ney, perished, in her twenty-fifth year, before the eyes of Queen Hortense. On the 10th the Queen and Princess Beatrice, in the morning, drove to Mouay. In the afternoon her Majesty, attended by Lady Churchill, drove to the Château de la Serraz, the excursion occupying three hours. Last Saturday morning the Queen and Princess Beatrice drove to Marlioz Park, where the Queen drove in her pony carriage, while the Princess walked. In the afternoon the Queen and Princess Beatrice, attended by the Dowager Marchioness of Ely, Lady Churchill, Lord Carlingford, and Sir Henry Ponsonby, drove to Grandport, whence they crossed the lake to Abbaye Hautecombe, in a steamer, returning in the evening. Princess Beatrice accepted a bouquet from Madame Berthier, the widow of her former doctor. The Queen and Princess Beatrice, and several members of the Royal household, attended Divine service on Sunday morning at the English church, the Rev. D. L. M'Anally, secretary of the Colonial and Continental Church Society, officiating. Her Majesty and the Princess, attended by Lady Churchill, drove out in the afternoon. On Monday morning the Queen, attended by Lady Churchill, went for a drive; while Princess Beatrice, accompanied by Mademoiselle De Norèle, walked. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Princess, attended by the Marchioness of Ely, drove out. This being the eve of Princess Beatrice's birthday, there was a display of fireworks and illuminations at Tresserve. The Queen and Princess Beatrice went for a short drive on Tuesday morning. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Princess, attended by Lady Churchill, drove out for three hours and a half. This being Princess Beatrice's birthday, the streets were decorated with bunting, and the church bells were rung. The band of the 4th Dragoons, who are stationed at Chambéry, played in the gardens of the Villa Mottet. The Princess and Lady Churchill accepted bouquets presented by the officers of the guard and by deputations from the English and Australian visitors who are staying at the Hôtel Blanc. In the evening the municipal authorities gave a garden fête. The grounds of the Casino were illuminated, and a display of fireworks and a concert took place. Her Majesty and the Princess witnessed the pyrotechnic exhibition from the balcony of the villa. The weather in the morning was very fine. At Windsor, also, the twenty-eighth anniversary of the birth of her Royal Highness was observed with the honours usually paid to members of the Royal family on such an occasion. The bells of St. George's Chapel, Windsor Castle, and St. John's Church rang out merrily, and Royal salutes were fired in the Long Walk facing the castle. Her Majesty the Queen, with Princess Beatrice, attended by the Royal suite, after visiting Darmstadt, will leave for England on May 1, and, according to present arrangements, will arrive at Windsor Castle on the 2nd.

The first chapter of the Royal visit to Ireland—the week's sojourn at Dublin of the Prince and Princess of Wales, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor—closed most pleasantly, as shown by the narrative given at page 412 of the week's doings; but a new one opened rather untowardly. The Prince, with the Princess and Prince Albert Victor, left Dublin on Monday by train for Lord Listowel's seat at Convamore. At Mallow, where the train stopped for an address to be presented to their Royal Highnesses, Mr. O'Brien, M.P., assisted by Mr. Deasy, M.P., Mr. J. O'Connor, M.P., and Mr. Harrington, M.P., had organised a hostile demonstration; but the railway authorities caused the platform to be cleared. When the Nationalists were turned out of the station they awaited the arrival of the Royal train and groaned, their bands playing "God Save Ireland"; but the noise was scarcely heard within the station, where the Prince and Princess had a very warm greeting. After an address had been presented, their Royal Highnesses continued their journey to Convamore. The Prince and Princess of Wales left Lord Listowel's seat on Tuesday morning, and proceeded on a short visit to the Marquis of Waterford, at Curraghmore. At the stations through which the Royal train passed, their Royal Highnesses had a respectful welcome. At Lismore, the Prince was presented with an address, signed by many of the working classes in the surrounding counties, asking from his Royal Highness the same interest in their behalf as he bestowed upon the artisans of England. In the afternoon the Prince and Princess returned to Convamore; proceeding on Wednesday to Cork, where great preparations had been made for their reception, and where they met with an enthusiastic reception, the strains of "God Save Ireland" mingling with those of the National Anthem, although a riotous mob paraded the streets on Tuesday night, smashing windows and tearing down decorations, until they were dispersed by the police. The Lord Lieutenant and Countess Spencer left Dublin on Wednesday morning for Killarney, to be in readiness to receive the Prince and Princess on their arrival on the following day. At the opening of the Synod of the Church of Ireland on Tuesday in Dublin, it was unanimously decided to present an address of cordial welcome to the Prince and Princess.

Mr. Alderman R. N. Fowler was on Tuesday selected by a large majority of the Livery of the City to succeed the late Mr. Alderman Nottage as Lord Mayor. The choice lay between Mr. Fowler and Mr. Alderman Cotton.

The Princess of Wales has forwarded from Marlborough House a picture of considerable value, by Mr. Benjamin Franklin, for the ward of the Princess Alice Memorial Hospital, at Eastbourne, in which medical institution the Royal family has taken great interest since it was opened by her Royal Highness and the Prince of Wales some years ago.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

Mr. Walter Paget, our Special Artist with the army of General Sir Gerald Graham at Souakim, contributes to this week's publication a Sketch of the fighting on Sunday, March 22, at the zereba, or three connected zerebas, occupied by the troops under command of Brigadier-General Sir John McNeill, consisting of the Indian contingent, the Berkshire Regiment, and detachments of Royal Marines and Royal Engineers, with some of the Naval Brigade. The Arabs made their attack on the zereba about half-past one o'clock that day. From a private letter written by Mr. Walter Paget, the following passages are extracted:—

"The arms had been piled; most of the men were 150 yards away, cutting down bushes to make the zereba; others were sitting at their dinner; and the camp-followers and drivers were far apart from the troops, tending their horses and mules; when suddenly, there was a shout, 'Run to your arms, men!' and the Haddendowas came rushing down upon us. The confusion that ensued is quite indescribable; and I cannot understand, even now, how the soldiers rallied as they did. You should have seen the Berkshire Regiment and the Marines at the beginning of that fight. Their behaviour was magnificent; it was entirely owing to them that any of us came off alive. At the moment the rush was made, I was just inside the entrance to the zereba, sketching a Gardner battery which was being mounted. I ran out to where my horse was tied up to a cart, fifty yards away. I could see the Haddendowas rushing through the bushes right before me. I just managed to cut the horse loose, and tear back into the zereba, with the Arabs close at my heels. Then the firing began; and, for about five minutes, the sides of the zereba were like a sheet of flame, while a storm of bullets swept over the ground outside. It killed, by scores, the poor wretched camp-followers and others running to the zereba, who were too late to get in; but our soldiers were obliged to shoot; for the Arabs were close upon us. It was a pitiful sight to see those poor fellows trying to get shelter, and falling dead under the hail of shot, while the Haddendowas were leaping among the fugitives, at the same time, spearing and stabbing them, utterly regardless of the volleys fired from the zereba. But my attention was soon diverted from what was going on outside, when the Arabs got into the zereba and began a hand-to-hand conflict. Just in front of me, a transport-driver and a Haddendowa were in fierce combat, the Arab with a frightful-looking sword, and the driver with his sabre—slash, slash, slash, like two men at a regular prize-fight in a little ring of their own. I made a sketch of them on the spot, as I sat on my horse; but the Arab was killed a minute or two afterwards, and the driver was also killed. My sketch of the scene in general can only give a faint idea of what it was like; you must have the frightful din, and the dire confusion, and the sickening smell of blood, to know the reality of such a fight. Wounded men seem to swarm around you, with all manner of ghastly hurts, and simply covered in blood; the poor wretches crawl up to you, and point to their mouths for water. I emptied my own water-bottle for them, and then cut away the bottles from some dead soldiers, to give a drink to many poor beggars. You are perhaps wondering whether I killed anybody. No, and I don't intend to; I had some of the enemy within a yard of me, and had my finger on the trigger ready, but I always waited for somebody else to kill them. The fight did not last more than twenty minutes, and we were all glad when the Arabs were cleared out of the zereba, and that the soldiers had behaved so splendidly. We felt safe; and, when we could look about us, we got the wounded men attended to, and the place put in order a bit. Then we went out looking for the poor wretches outside, of whom very many were brought in; and we got in the unhurt transport animals; but most of the animals were killed; they were lying dead in heaps.

"I slept in the zereba that night, and came in (to Souakim) with the baggage and wounded next morning. All along the route home, there were dead bodies of fellows who had been cut off; who had run for their lives, without anything in their hands to defend themselves with, and had been overtaken and killed. In one place, there were half-a-dozen together, who had evidently got back to back, and had made a fight of it; they lay dead on the top of each other.

"War is a horrible, ghastly business; especially this sort of thing. Why, in front of the zereba, there were little boys, about ten years old, lying there with their spears in their hands; and women too, one quite a young, handsome girl, of about eighteen or twenty. Is it not horrible? I think the Arabs always send a certain number of women and children with the troops, as sacrifices to the gods, to win victory. I can tell you, it makes one pretty sick to see young girls lying about with half-a-dozen bullet-holes through them."

The other subjects of our Special Artist's Sketches are "Difficulties of Transport" and "A Halt on the March." There have been no incidents during the past week that seem worth mentioning as recent news of the war in the Soudan. On Wednesday week, the Coldstream Guards and the New South Wales contingent advanced to Handoub, twelve miles from Souakim, preceded by a body of cavalry, who acted as scouts. General Graham joined the troops later. Handoub was found to be deserted, but a few of the enemy were seen at a distance. The troops formed two small and one large zereba at Handoub, where the Coldstreams and Australians will remain. The Scots Guards have also proceeded to Handoub, and other troops will follow. A quantity of water slightly brackish, was found at Handoub. It is believed that it is not intended to carry the railway much farther than Handoub for the present.

The Royal Horticultural Society held a show of spring flowers and fruit on Tuesday in their Conservatory at South Kensington.

Before a large audience, at the Society of Arts, on Tuesday night, Mr. H. H. Johnston read an interesting paper descriptive of his adventurous journey to Kilima-njaro, in Eastern Equatorial Africa, and urging that in this rich region lay an excellent field for the employment of English capital.

The offer of Mr. Joseph Crosland, local banker and manufacturer, to give £5000 in aid of the foundation of a new library for Huddersfield not having been accepted by the Corporation, who also declined the offer of Sir John Ramsden to give, rent free, a suite of rooms for ten years for the same purpose, Mr. Crosland has given £1000 to the Huddersfield Infirmary, expressing a wish that it should be used in establishing a children's ward, which is greatly needed at that institution.

The Drapers' Company have given £25, and the Mitchell Trustees a third donation of £50, to the East London Union for Advanced Education, Stepney Centre.—The West London School of Art has lately received a grant of £100 from the Clothworkers' Company towards the general funds. This school has been very useful in promoting the study of technical design, one student having obtained the only gold medal awarded in London in the National Competition, and another the £30 prize for design offered by the Goldsmiths' Company in competition with the whole country.

OBITUARY.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK.

The Right Hon. Dunbar James Douglas, sixth Earl of Selkirk and Baron Daer and Shortcleuch, in the Peerage of Scotland, Lord Lieutenant of the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, a representative Peer and Keeper of the Great Seal of Scotland, died on the 11th inst. He was born April 22, 1809, the only son of Thomas, fifth Earl, by Jane, his wife, daughter of James Wedderburn Colvile, of Ochiltree, and was educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxon, where he graduated First Class Mathematics in 1830. He succeeded his father April 8, 1820, and married, June 29, 1878, Cecely Louisa, daughter of Sir Philip De Malpas Egerton, of Egerton and Oulton, but had no issue. The earldom of Selkirk had peculiar limitations, and it would seem that, under the new patent, dated Oct. 6, 1688, it now devolves on the Duke of Hamilton.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND.

The Right Hon. Sir Edward Sullivan, Bart., of Garryduff, county Cork, LL.D., Lord Chancellor of Ireland, died suddenly, at his residence in Fitzwilliam-place, Dublin, on the 13th inst. A great lawyer, a wise and upright politician, an able and elegant speaker, Lord Chancellor Sullivan leaves a void it is wellnigh impossible to fill. The universal grief caused by his death evidences the respect and veneration and affectionate regard in which he was held. He was born in Mallow, July 10, 1822, the eldest son of the late Mr. Edward Sullivan, of that town, and received his education at Middleton School, county Cork, and Trinity College, Dublin, where he had a brilliant University career. In 1848, he was called to the Bar; in 1858, obtained a silk gown; in 1860, was appointed Serjeant; and in 1861, Law Adviser. From 1865 to 1866 he held office as Solicitor-General for Ireland; as Attorney-General, 1868-70; as Master of the Rolls, 1870 to 1883; and as Lord Chancellor from the last-named year to the period of his deeply-lamented decease. A baronetcy was conferred on him, Dec. 29, 1881. Sir Edward sat in Parliament for Mallow, 1865 to 1870. He married, Sept. 24, 1850, Bessie Josephine, daughter of Mr. Robert Bailey, of Cork, and leaves surviving issue, three sons and one daughter. The eldest son, now Sir Edward Sullivan, second Baronet, barrister-at-law, was born Feb. 27, 1852.

THE COUNTESS OF SELBORNE.

Laura, Countess of Selborne, died on the 10th inst., at 30, Portland-place. Her Ladyship was born March 17, 1821, the second daughter of William, eighth Earl Waldegrave, and was married, Feb. 2, 1848, to Roundell Palmer, the distinguished lawyer, now Lord Selborne, Lord Chancellor of England, by whom she leaves one son, Viscount Wolmer, and four daughters.

THE LORD MAYOR.

Mr. Alderman George Swan Nottage, Lord Mayor of London, died last Saturday morning, after a brief illness, from pleurisy, following a chill taken at Brighton on Easter Sunday. The unexpected event caused a deep feeling of sorrow in the City, where his Lordship, who had every prospect of a brilliant and successful mayoralty, was very popular. Telegrams of condolence were sent to the Lady Mayoress by the Prince and Princess of Wales and other members of the Royal family; and the Courts of Aldermen and Common Council and the Commissioners of Sewers passed resolutions of condolence with the family. Allusion to the sad event was made last Sunday by Canon Liddon at St. Paul's Cathedral, and by the preachers at most of the City churches. Lord Mayor Nottage was sixty-two years of age. He was elected Alderman of the Cordwainer Ward in November, 1875, and served the office of Sheriff in 1877. He was a member of the Carpenters' Company, and when elected Lord Mayor occupied the office of Master. For many years the deceased was engaged in the iron business of his uncle, Mr. R. W. Kennard, late member for Newport; and he founded the London Stereoscopic and Photographic Company. In politics he was a Liberal, and he was a member of the Church of England. He was appointed a magistrate for Middlesex in January last; and only last week was decorated with a Servian order by the Minister of that country. His last public appearance was on Tuesday week, when he presented the Easter gifts to the Bluecoat boys. On the suggestion of the Court of Common Council, and with the sanction of Dean Church, it has been resolved that the remains of the late Lord Mayor shall be interred in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral, the funeral, which is fixed for to-day (Saturday), being of a public character.

SIR G. R. SARTORIUS.

Admiral of the Fleet Sir George Rose Sartorius, G.C.B., Count De Penhatirme in Portugal, Grand Cross of St. Bento d'Avis, Grand Cross of the Tower and Sword, and a Portuguese Vice-Admiral, whose death is just announced, was born in 1790, the son of Colonel J. C. Sartorius, H.E.I.C.S. He entered the Royal Navy in 1801, and attained the rank of Admiral of the Fleet in 1869; was present at the battle of Trafalgar, and commanded H.M. ship Slaney at the surrender of the Emperor Napoleon I. In 1833 he assumed the command of Don Pedro's fleet, and was nominated Vice-Admiral in the Portuguese Navy. He was Naval A.D.C. to the Queen, 1846 to 1849. He married, 1839, Sophia, daughter of Mr. John Lamb.

MR. WEGUELIN.

Mr. Thomas Mathias Weguelin, J.P., late M.P. for Wolverhampton, died on the 5th inst., at 44, Grosvenor-gardens, aged seventy-six. He was youngest son of the late Mr. William A. Weguelin, of Weymouth-street, and was long connected with commercial pursuits as a Russian merchant in London, filling at one time the office of Governor of the Bank of England. From 1857 to 1859 he represented as a Liberal Southampton in Parliament, and from 1861 to 1880 Wolverhampton. He married, first, Charlotte, daughter of Mr. A. H. Paulett Thomson; and secondly, Catherine, daughter of Mr. Charles Hammersley. Mr. Weguelin's son, Christopher, sat in Parliament for Youghal.

GENERAL LANDERS.

General John Edmonstoune Landers, late of the Bengal Infantry, died on the 6th inst., aged eighty-two. He entered the Army in 1820, and attained the rank of General in 1877. When Major he commanded the Bhopal contingent in an engagement with the insurgents.

HON. E. H. PRIMROSE.

Colonel the Hon. Everard Henry Primrose, whose death in the Soudan has caused so much regret, was born Sept. 8, 1843, the second son of the late Lord Dalmeny, by Catherine, his wife (now Duchess of Cleveland), daughter of the fourth Earl Stanhope. In consequence of Lord Dalmeny predeceasing his father, Colonel Primrose, on his brother, the present Earl of Rosebery, succeeding to the family honours, was given a Patent of Precedence. He entered the Army in 1868, and became Major of his regiment, the Grenadier Guards, in 1883. He passed the Staff College in 1875, and served as Brigade-Major in the Home District from 1876 to 1878. He then became Military Attaché at Vienna, and resigned last September in order to accompany Lord Wolseley on special service in Egypt.

MR. PATESHALL, OF ALLENSMORE.

Evan Pateshall, of Allensmore Court, county Hereford, J.P. and D.L., died on the 9th inst., at his seat near Hereford. He was born 1817, the fourth son of Mr. David Thomas, of Welfield, High Sheriff, county Radnor, 1829. In 1874 he was elected M.P. for the city of Hereford, which he represented as a Conservative until 1878. He married, May 24, 1842, Anne Elizabeth, only child of Mr. William Lechmere, afterwards Pateshall, of Hereford, and assumed by Royal license, in 1854, the name and arms of Pateshall, in compliance with the testamentary injunction of Mr. Edmund Burnam Pateshall, of Allensmore Court.

MR. EDEN, OF BEAMISH PARK.

Mr. John Eden, of Beamish Park, in the county of Durham, J.P. and D.L., High Sheriff, 1849, died on the 4th inst., at 15, Wilton-crescent, in his ninety-first year. He was second son of the late Mr. Henry Methold, by Dorothea, his wife, elder daughter of Sir John Eden, Bart., M.P., and assumed by Royal license, 1844, the surname and arms of Eden, having succeeded to Beamish Park at the death of his uncle, Mr. Morton John Davison, in 1841.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Mr. Frederick Field, F.R.S., formerly Professor of Chemistry at St. Mary's Hospital and the London Institution.

Mr. Michael Aylmer, of Courtown, in the county of Kildare, J.P., a descendant of the ancient family of Aylmer, on the 4th inst., aged sixty-four.

Colonel C. E. Harvey, Royal Engineers, on the 6th inst., aged fifty-one. He was Second Commandant of the School of Military Engineering.

The Rev. Henry Perceval, Rector of Elmley Lovett, in the county of Worcester, third son of the Right Hon. Spencer Perceval, Prime Minister, on the 1st inst., at Hill End, Salwarpe, in his eighty-sixth year.

Lieutenant-Colonel Richard Hasell Thursby, late Coldstream Guards, on the 5th inst., aged forty-eight, youngest son of the Rev. William Thursby, of Ormerod House, in the county of Lancaster.

The Hon. Lady Duncan, widow of Captain the Hon. Sir Henry Duncan, R.N., K.C.H., C.B. (brother of the first Earl of Camperdown), at Pau, on the 7th inst. She was a daughter of Captain Coutts-Crawford, R.N., and was left a widow in 1835.

The Rev. William Blackley, M.A., late Vicar of Stanton-upon-Hine-heath, at Garforth House, Upper Sydenham, aged eighty-seven. He was author of some religious works, and edited the diplomatic correspondence of the Right Hon. Richard Hill.

Mary, Dowager Lady Ruthven, widow of James, fifth Lord Ruthven, and daughter of Walter Campbell, of Schawfield and Islay, by Mary, his second wife, daughter of Mr. William Nisbet, of Dirleton, on the 5th inst., at Winton Castle, Pencaitland. She was married Dec. 20, 1813, but had no issue.

Edith, Viscountess Parker, wife of the eldest son of the Earl of Macclesfield, and daughter of Mr. Frederick Paul Harford, of Down Place, Windsor, on the 4th inst. She married, first, Mr. Thomas Rumbold Richardson, 1st Life Guards; and secondly, 1878, Viscount Parker.

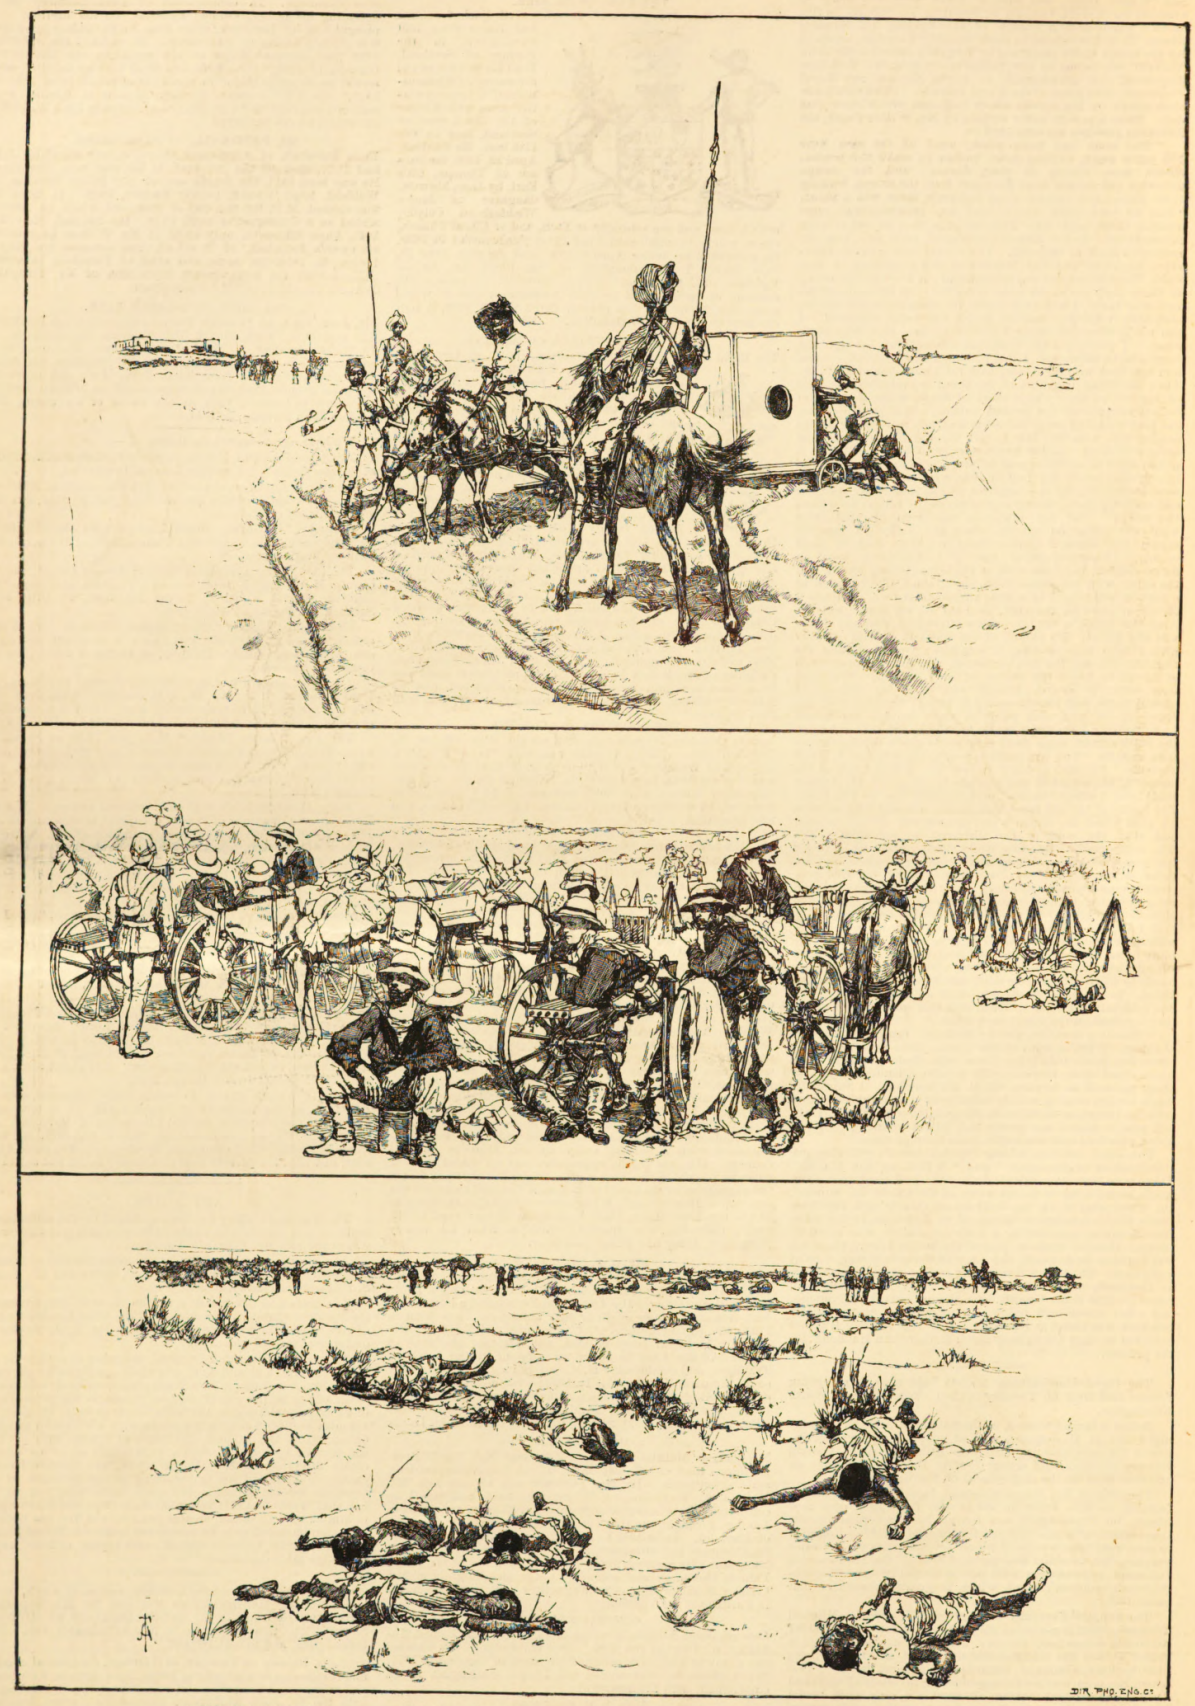
Emily Theophila, Viscountess Ashbrook, widow of the fourth Viscount Ashbrook, daughter of Sir Thomas Metcalfe, Bart., and mother of Charlotte Augusta, second wife of George, sixth Duke of Marlborough, on the 9th inst., in her ninety-fifth year.

The Hon. Lady Lynch-Blosse (Elizabeth), eldest daughter of William Conyngham, Lord Plunket, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and widow of the Rev. Sir Francis Lynch-Blosse, ninth Baronet, of Castle Carra, on the 3rd inst., at 22, Clyde-road, Dublin, in her eighty-sixth year. Her eldest son is the present Sir Robert Lynch-Blosse, Bart.

Anne Elizabeth Emily, Dowager Lady Cremorne, on the 11th inst., at her residence at Prince's-gate, at an advanced age. Her Ladyship was the third daughter of Mr. John and Lady Anne Whaley, and married, March 10, 1815, Richard Thomas, second Lord Cremorne, by whom she had issue three sons, of whom the present Earl of Dartrey is the last survivor.

ART NOTES.

The National Gallery has been enriched by the addition of fourteen new pictures: it receives this generous gift under the will of the late Mrs Elizabeth Vaughan.



At a special assembly of the Incorporated Society of British Artists held on the 10th inst., Mr. J. C. Gotch and Mr. James S. Hill were elected members.

The travelling studentship, of the value of £50, given by the Painters' Company to a student of the West London School of Art, has been awarded this year to Mr. E. J. Taylor, a designer of stained glass.

Messrs. Hollender and Cremetti, referring to notices in our Issues for March 21 and April 4 of their exhibition of pictures in the Hanover Gallery, New Bond-street, write as follows:—"We beg to inform you (1) that we guarantee the authenticity of every picture hung on the walls of our gallery; (2) that the Hanover Gallery has been reopened with the special purpose of exhibiting the highest specimens of foreign art; (3) that the picture by Courbet, which your critic seems to doubt, comes direct from M. Georges Petit, the famous French expert, who assisted his Government in the purchase of the Courbets for the Louvre. We quite agree with you in the fact that Monsieur Pillet is a great authority; and if you apply to him he will, no doubt, answer you that our firm has been of long enough standing to be considered to have sufficient knowledge to discern between originals and copies, at least, as far as foreign art is concerned."

On Tuesday afternoon the foundation-stone of a new workhouse for the Holborn Union was laid by Mr. Benjamin Garrod, the chairman of the Holborn Guardians, at Mitcham, Surrey. The new workhouse is to accommodate 1000 able-bodied poor, and to cost £60,000.

Lady Brassey on Tuesday, at Hastings, distributed medals and certificates to a number of ladies, local firemen, fishermen, and members of the police and volunteer corps, in connection with the St. John Ambulance Association. Since the formation of the centre, 118 men and 235 women have obtained awards.

1. Difficulties of transport. 2. A halt on the march. 3. Outside the zereba on the morning after the fight of Sunday, March 22.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.

The performances of operas in English at Drury-Lane Theatre (which began on Easter Monday) are pursuing a successful career. Since our last week's notice, "Carmen" has been more than once repeated, with the strong cast already commented on, including the fine performances of Madame Marie Roze in the title-character. "Faust," the English version of "Lucia di Lammermoor," and Balfe's "Bohemian Girl," have been given during the past week, with Madame Georgina Burns's meritorious performances as Margaret, Lucy, and Arline; and the effective singing of Mr. Maas as Faust and Edgar; Mr. B. Davies having been the Thaddeus in "The Bohemian Girl." The co-operation on different occasions of Misses J. Yorke and M. Burton, Mr. B. McGuckin, Mr. Snazelle, Mr. Ludwig, Mr. L. Crotty, Mr. C. Lyall, and Mr. B. Foote, contributed largely to that general efficiency which characterises the performances of this company. The orchestral and choral details are excellently rendered, and the stage management gives admirable proof of the special skill of Mr. Augustus Harris in that department. The ballet action, under the experienced direction of Madame Katti Lanner, is another commendable feature in the arrangements. The operas are ably conducted by Mr. Randegger and Mr. Goossens in alternation.

The English version of "Il Trovatore" was given on Monday, when the characters of Leonora and Manrico were, respectively, very effectively sustained by Madame Marie Roze and Mr. Maas; the cast having also included the efficient performances of Miss J. York as Azucena, and Mr. Ludwig as the Count di Luna. Mr. Randegger conducted.

The principal event of the season is the production of "Nadeshda," the new opera composed expressly for the Carl Rosa Opera Company by Mr. A. Goring Thomas, whose "Esmeralda," brought out by Mr. Rosa (also at Drury-Lane Theatre) in 1883, proved so eminently successful. "Nadeshda" was announced for Thursday last, and of course cannot be noticed by us until next week. The cast included Madame Valleria in the title-character, and Miss J. Yorke, Mr. B. McGuckin, and Mr. L. Crotty in other parts.

This (Saturday) afternoon the twenty-ninth series of Crystal Palace concerts will come to a close—to be followed, on April 25, by the usual supplementary concert for the benefit of Mr. Manns, the conductor. The recent programmes have not offered anything calling for very special comment. At the eighteenth concert Berlioz's "Harold" symphony was finely performed, the important viola obbligato well played by Mr. Krause; the Festival Procession music from Goldmark's opera "The Queen of Sheba" was given for the first time, and Madame Jessie Morrison made a favourable impression as solo pianist; Mr. E. Lloyd having been the vocalist. At last week's concert, M. Adolf Fischer played with great success a well-written and effective concerto for the violoncello, composed by M. Saint-Saëns, and was also heard in smaller pieces; and Madame Hughes-Paltzer was very successful in her vocal performances, in which she displayed a voice of considerable power and compass and much dramatic expression. For this week's closing concert of the series an interesting novelty is announced—the first performance in England of Berlioz's "Te Deum," a very elaborate work, in which three choirs, orchestra, and organ are employed.

Señor Sarasate is to give the first of four grand concerts this (Saturday) afternoon at St. James's Hall.

At the sixth National Concert to be held at the Royal Albert Hall next Thursday evening (St. George's Day) Madame Christine Nilsson and Mr. Sims Reeves will sing the duet "Parigi o cara"; and Mr. Sims Reeves will also sing "The Message," by Blumenthal, and "The Death of Nelson," by desire. The other vocalists announced are Miss Patti Winter, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Signor Foli.

The concert of the late Madame Sainton-Dolby's Vocal Academy, announced for April 24, will take place then at Prince's Hall. The second part of the programme will be appropriated to music composed by the deceased lady, and Mr E. Lloyd will co-operate in this.

The appearance of a new singer, Mdlle. Grazia Riani, at one of M. Rivière's concerts in Her Majesty's Theatre, was warmly welcomed. She is gifted with a fine clear powerful voice, of the timbre known as dramatic soprano; and her rendering of the "Ave Maria" of Gounod, notwithstanding the nervousness invariably attending a first appearance, was almost faultless; her voice in the last passage ringing out clear above the orchestra. She was enthusiastically encored. In the second part of the concert she gave "To love, to love," by Lord Henry Somerset, with exquisite finish. With care and perseverance, Mdlle. Riani may make a brilliant career on the lyric stage.

In connection with the Musical Division of the International Inventions Exhibition, the Executive Council have decided to organise a series of choral and brass band competitions. Entries for the choral competitions were received up to the 15th instant, and may be sent in for the brass band competitions up to May 1. Conditions and forms of application can be obtained on application to the Secretary of the Exhibition, South Kensington, London, S.W. The competitions will take place in September, and arrangements have been made with the railway companies for special fares and facilities to competitors from any part of the country.

The far-famed Richter Concerts will open a new series of nine evening performances at St. James's Hall on April 27, previous to which the orchestra and its distinguished conductor will make a provincial tour, from April 20 to April 25 inclusive: Nottingham, Liverpool, Leeds, Manchester, Sheffield, and Oxford being the towns to be visited. An enthusiastic reception may be anticipated in each of these places.

We have already given an outline of the arrangements for the Hereford Musical Festival, the solo singers engaged for which are Mesdames Albani, Patey, and Enriquez; Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Brereton. As before stated, the performances take place on Sept. 8, 9, 10, and 11.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

The arrangements for this important event at the Crystal Palace are now in a very forward state, engagements having already been completed with the following solo vocalists:—Madame Albani, Madame Valleria, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Miss A. Marriott, Madame Suter, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, Mr. Santley, Signor Foli, Mr. F. King, Mr. B. Foote, and Mr. Bridson. The orchestra and chorus will be on the same grand scale as heretofore, numbering nearly four thousand executants. The plan of former festivals will be adhered to; and with reason, as no better representative scheme could be devised. There will be a grand public rehearsal on Friday, June 19, the first Festival day proper being on the following Monday, when "The Messiah" will be performed. On Wednesday, June 24, selections from the secular and sacred works of Handel will be given, and on Friday, June 26, the Festival will close with the finest of his choral works, "Israel in Egypt." The approaching celebration will be given twelve months in advance of its prescribed triennial recurrence, the reason being that this year is the bi-centenary of Handel's birth; a sufficient justification for this departure from precedent, as it offers the grandest possible artistic tribute to his memory. Mr. Manns will be the conductor, as on the last occasion, in 1883, when he suddenly replaced Sir Michael Costa, whose serious illness (soon after terminating fatally) prevented him from occupying the post which he had so worthily filled since the origin of these Festivals in 1857. The great success of Mr. Manns in the arduous task, which he undertook at very short notice, rendered his reappointment this year a foregone conclusion.

ABOUT BOOKS.

Books are my dearest friends. I seem to know them better than my aunts and cousins, and a great deal better than the men I dine with daily at the club. At times, the intimacy between us is so great, so affectionate, that I forget the love is all on one side, and that the companions on my shelves speak to me and enchant me without knowing it. It is hard not to be able to tell the writers what they have done and are still doing, how much pain they have soothed, how much sadness relieved, how much strength supplied,—hard that one cannot have a talk over it all with them, so that although they have left us, many of them long ages ago, they may still hear of their triumphs. I should like to summon those I love best by name—the dear authors whose books I put under my pillow when a child, and those not less dear who are my daily companions now. It often happens that they are the same, and yet changed, too, as I am, and loved with a larger love.

The intimacy does not become less as one grows old. In London streets, in country rambles, on the deck of a steamer, as well as in the happy silence of the library, the people of the past as they live and move in books occupy my attention more than the good neighbours living in the same village. And it matters not whether these people were once breathing men and women, or are creatures of the imagination. I like to remember what Pope or Swift said, what Dr. Johnson said, what Scott and Lamb and Coleridge said and did on their passage through this world. I like to connect the little incidents of my own life with words uttered and things that have happened long ago. It prevents a man from feeling a mere unit, shows him his kinship with the race, and, I venture to think, enlarges his humanity. But, as I was saying, the imaginative folk who fill the pages of poets and novelists, are just as real to me as the clergyman who steps in to afternoon tea, or the benevolent old lady who calls upon me so frequently for a contribution to her little schemes of charity. Miss Piper is a most excellent old maid, but I like Miss Bates better; the Rev. Stenton Stornway is a gentleman and a Christian, but I shall never be so familiar with him as I am with Mr. Gilfil, with Dr. Primrose, and with that delightful fool, Mr. Collins. My library is peopled with friends of this kind, and with some that are dearer still. Looking up from the desk, my eye rests on Shakspeare and Scott; on Thackeray, Dickens, and George Eliot; on Chaucer, Spenser, and Jeremy Taylor; on Tennyson and Browning; on Goldsmith and Burns: and yet there are chance acquaintances who would persuade me that I am lonely and want society. The truth is—and being just now in a frank humour it may as well be confessed—there are moments when I think I live too much in society. These great authors are not a little exacting. Men like Shakspeare and Scott are not satisfied with a bow and a good-bye. And the more the friendship grows the more do they seem to claim, so that with such associates to detain him one is in danger of neglecting the duties known in Parliament as "urgent private affairs." No; I sometimes think I must banish these dear comrades and go into retirement—I mean into the world. How shall I do it? If I travel, be sure the choicest of these friends will go with me. My pockets will be as capacious as Porson's; and as John Gilpin carried a bottle on each side to make his balance even, I shall weigh a Keats and Shelley against a Coleridge and Wordsworth. If I devote myself to business matters, and exchange Horace for a day-book and ledger, I may find, as the poet found long ago, that though you drive out Nature forcibly, she will inevitably have her own way and come back again.

So I hold to my books still, and deem the air of a library the most exhilarating upon earth. When disinclined to read—and there are times when our choicest pleasures pall—I like to see the volumes on the shelves, and to scan their dresses. It may be necessary perhaps to have what Southey called a "ragged regiment" for frequent use, but the man who, unforced by poverty, allows his books to go shabbily is scarcely to be trusted. To dress himself well and to let a fine edition of Dante or of Molière stand shivering in the nakedness of paper, or with the pretence of clothing afforded by cloth, is to give indications of a corrupt nature. Such a man will be shunned by the bibliophile. Who knows but that with a disposition so evil he may not beat his wife and starve his daughter? I admit that there are cases in which the book lover does well to keep a precious volume in its original garment—"an Elzevir in its paper wrapper may be worth more than the same tome in morocco stamped with Longepierre's fleece of gold"; but such instances are too rare to be quoted in excuse by the man who buys books and neglects them.

I say "buys books," for there is a lower depth to which a reader may sink in these days. Instead of spending a fair share of his income on books—say, half as much as he spends on his butcher or wine merchant—he is too often content with subscribing two or three guineas a year to the London Library, to Mudie's, or the Grosvenor. I leave him alone; he is beneath my criticism, probably would despise it.

Let me not be misunderstood. If I fail to comprehend the feelings of the man who is content to have his books carted to him, perhaps chosen for him weekly, I can sympathise to some extent with the man who says boldly that he does not care for books at all. Everyone is not born with the same tastes. "Nature," says Thackeray, "makes folk differently. Some love books and tea, and some like burgundy and a gallop across country." There are healthy souls who prefer action to study, and wisely: there are men and women to whom Nature is all sufficing: there are artists who live for painting, soldiers, like the noble hero we have just lost, who live for duty: happily, all the world is not cast in the same mould: a dull world it would be if this were so.

Chacun à son goût. I hope my taste is neither a selfish nor a useless one. I can testify that though it made me poor at first, and keeps me so, it has all my life long yielded infinite delight.

The Illustrations published last week of the industrial employment of Afreedi and other convict prisoners in the jail at Peshawur, and of the manufacture of druggets and carpets, and of the cloth and silk markets in that town of the Punjaub frontier, were furnished by a series of photographs, comprising many other scenes and incidents of life at Peshawur, for which we are indebted to Lieutenant-Colonel A. G. Owen, of the 19th Bengal Lancers, and of the Bengal Staff Corps.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, April 15.

The Russian defeat of the Afghans has put the whole subject of peace or war in an entirely new position. On the first arrival of the news, war was regarded as inevitable; and a panic ensued upon the Stock Exchange such as had not been seen since the declaration of war between France and Germany. But there has since been some recovery; diplomacy still continuing as though a peaceful decision were yet attainable. The fall on the week is, however, still very considerable; and it is not likely to be wholly made good until peace is really reassured. As a rule, our people act as though war were inevitable; while the Continental operators are still pledged to the belief that war will not result. Consequently, the tendency here is to sell more than can be delivered; and, on the Continent, it is to buy more than can be paid for. This explains the experience at the settlement which closes in London to-day. Principal stocks have been scarce in many cases, and in some instances sellers have paid heavily for delaying the completion of their transactions. The Money Market remains very strong, with low rates and large unemployed balances. Commercially, certain interests are being benefited by the prospect of war, more particularly in connection with the preparation to move goods whose transit would be affected by the outbreak of hostilities. The advance in the price of wheat will be very welcome to many interests.

For a long time past, copper-mining shares have been steadily going down in market estimation, the low prices ruling for the metal making it perfectly clear that reduced dividends, if nothing worse, would be the result. This expectation has been verified by the dividend announcements of the Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company, Mason and Barry, and the Rio Tinto Company, three of the best-known undertakings carrying on operations in Spain. The first-named company pays 20 per cent for the past year, a satisfactory return enough, but comparing with 27½ per cent per annum for the two previous years. On Mason and Barry shares 8 per cent is to be paid for the past year, as against 12½ per cent per annum for some time previous, while the Rio Tinto Company's dividend is to be 8 per cent, contrasted with 14 per cent per annum for the three previous years. The above results are the more interesting from the fact that they represent the first year's operations since the expiration of the working agreement between the undertakings referred to. Under this arrangement, the output at the mines was limited to certain proportions, so as not to unduly depress the metal market, and it would appear that a continuance of the arrangement would have been to the interest of all concerned.

The affairs of the Rio de Janeiro Gas Company, Limited, have attracted more than ordinary attention of late, owing to the unfortunate difference between the company and the Government, particulars of which have from time to time appeared in this column. So far, however, the shareholders have had no reason to complain as to the lucrative character of their investment, 10 per cent dividends having been regularly paid for many years, including the year just ended. In their report, to be submitted on the 24th instant, the directors state that two tenders have been presented by Brazilians for lighting the City of Rio, and that they have also heard that another tender has been sent from Paris, but they are in possession of no particulars as yet.

Attention has already been directed in this column to the reduction in the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul Railroad dividend. From a circular since issued by the directors it appears that the earnings of the line for the year were quite sufficient for the payment of the usual 7 per cent, and that the lowering of the rate was due to the fact that the company has a floating debt of 3,500,000 dollars, which, in the opinion of the directors, should be liquidated before a return to a higher distribution takes place. No reference is, however, made as to any sum having been devoted to this purpose out of the past year's revenue.

The Grand Trunk Railway report is now out. It is a powerful statement, and almost every question raised during the recent period of anxiety is met as satisfactorily as circumstances will permit. But there is no possible qualification for this staring fact, that the year 1885 began with a debit balance of £31,435, all reserves and special sources of revenue being exhausted, while the gross traffic income to date is £107,430 less than in the corresponding fourteen weeks of 1884. Speculators are, however, buying the stocks.

A telegram from Brussels says that a convention has been signed by the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, by which the company undertake to reconstruct the pier at Queenborough, with the view of establishing a day service by the Flushing route to the Continent. Nothing is said as to the amount of the capital necessary; but it can hardly be much in proportion to the important object to be attained.

President Cleveland has appointed Mr. Russell to be Consul at Liverpool.

A meeting of the Victoria Institute took place on Monday evening, when a paper on "Human Responsibility" was read.

Mr. F. Talfourd presided on Monday evening, at Exeter Hall, over the annual tea and public meeting held in connection with the Metropolitan Open-Air Temperance Mission and Advocates' League.

Messrs. W. H. Allen and Co. have issued a new edition of "London in 1885," by Mr. Herbert Fry, illustrated by eighteen bird's-eye views of the principal streets. This well-known and useful guide to the metropolis has been revised and corrected to the latest date.

At the meeting of the Royal Geographical Society on Monday evening, it was announced that the gold medals had been awarded to Mr. Joseph Thomson for his services in East Central Africa, and to Mr. H. E. O'Neill for his thirteen journeys of exploration along the coast and in the interior of Mozambique.

In a general order, the Duke of Cambridge, Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, expresses the opinion that the Easter Monday Volunteer manœuvres at Brighton were admirably conducted; and Major-General Feilding, in his official report on the Easter Monday Volunteer manœuvres at Dover, remarks that the various regiments did their work very much to his satisfaction.

The thirty-second report of the Charity Commission, issued on Monday, refers to the proceedings of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on charitable trusts. The result of that inquiry, says the report, has fully justified the expectation that it would have the effect of dispelling the misapprehensions which have been so widely and so mischievously entertained as to the law by which charities are regulated, and as to the practice which has been adopted by courts of equity, and by the Board in giving effect to its provisions. The Select Committee, in their report to the House of Commons, expressed their approval of the past administration of the Charitable Trusts Acts, and their opinion that the powers and duties conferred upon the commissioners may safely be enlarged.

THE ADVANTAGES OF DULNESS.

I am myself a dull man. So, at least, my friends tell me, and I do not care to dispute their opinion. The truth is, the reputation for dulness has been of great service to me in life. When I was young, a cousin, with whom I was on the best of terms, kindly told me one day that the young ladies of her acquaintance generally considered me a bore. She said this for my good, and out of pure affection. It was thoughtful of her, and I profited by the information. A brilliant young man is liable to waste much time in female society; it distracts his mind, and, if he is fool enough to fall in love, probably ruins his prospects. He has other temptations. If he can sing and dance, talk easy nonsense, and make himself amusing, Fashion marks him for her own. He is wanted at balls, at picnics, at lawn-tennis parties, at picture galleries, at concerts. He is expected to have opinions on the events of the day, to know men and books, to be familiar with the latest witticisms, and yet to be sufficiently serious to appreciate Mr. Oscar Wilde. He must dress well, too, and make what is called a figure in society, and is forced to spend money without having much time to make it.

I escape all these dangers and annoyances by being dull. I may sit now in any little back parlour from Christmas to Whitsuntide without a single invitation to dinner, just as twenty years ago I sat here without being once asked to a dance, or to a ball. Day succeeds day with the steadiest monotony, and what I resolved to do when my cousin so considerately gave me a character, I am doing still. Do you ask me what it is? Making money. This a labour not incompatible with dulness, a quality of mind, or a deficiency of mind (which is it?), eminently fitted for the steadiness of purpose required. It is your dull men who make fortunes, and who keep them when they are made. They stick to their desks in all weathers, and don't run out larking in the streets directly they have made a good bargain. That is what the men and women of genius do. They get money sometimes by accident, but they spend it—they spend it. There is that George Eliot, whom people talk about. She, I am told, received £7000 for a novel, and then, instead of sitting down and writing another the next morning, flies off to the Continent, and scatters her sovereigns more freely than I spend sixpences. Pity she was not dull. With all her success, I like my books better than hers. There is a ledger in Mincing-lane which I find far more amusing than her novels—but then, you know, I am a dull man. By-the-way, a wit of the last century, of whom I chanced to hear—I think his name was Addison—says somewhere that if ordinary abilities unfit a man for studies of a higher nature he may be "perfectly well turned" for trade and commerce. I think so, too, if he is not too scrupulous. To be successful in business, and yet strictly honest, needs more ability than a dull man is blessed with. Genius, so far as I can ascertain, generally means failure. Sir Walter Scott—the biggest man, I suppose, of this century—lost his fortune by it, and then his life. Genius has killed a score of poets, too, who, had they been dull men, might have been living to this day; and of former times the same story is told. Bacon failed, Essex and Raleigh failed, for they lost their heads; so did Sir Thomas More; so did Strafford; so did Laud, who ought to have known better, for he was not without a vein of dulness. Bunyan, having nothing but piety and genius to commend him, was shut up in prison. Defoe, who wrote "Robinson Crusoe"—the only story I ever read through—stood in the pillory. Goldsmith, another story-teller, died in debt. Collins went mad. Chatterton committed suicide. Cowper lived and died in despair; and as far as I can make out, after studying a Biographical Dictionary for a whole hour, genius makes a man miserable in life, and leaves him poor in death. Poets, artists, musicians, don't understand affairs; they dream when they ought to act, and never know that they are dreaming. How nervous and excitable they are, and how absurdly sensitive to the least word of blame!

Now, I am not sensitive. People may say what they like about me, but I do not heed it, since it is enough for me that I am known in the City as a "warm" man. And to show you that I am not sensitive, I will relate something that occurred last week. I have a nephew who is, unfortunately, a bit of a genius. He writes poetry, I am told, or quotes it. Well, we had a quarrel. This clever young man tried to convince me that I ought to do more for a poor relative, when I allow her half a crown a week already, and some day, I suppose, shall have to pay for her funeral. Well, this nephew, being a clever man, has strong feelings, and his face flushed up as he denounced my cruelty to a sister (he should have said she was a half-sister, but let that pass), while on the contrary, having first resolved to close my purse-strings, I kept my temper. The youth was not content with boarding me at Mincing-lane, the seat of my triumphs. He wrote an angry letter the next day, saying that he should give my sister 10s. weekly out of his small income, having found out that it is not wealth but good sense and right feeling that make a man charitable. It seems to me, he added in his wrath, that a couplet written by the great poet Dryden specially applies to you—

> The midwife laid her hands on his thick skull
> With this prophetic blessing: Be thou dull.

Here was a slap in the face from a young upstart of twenty! but, being a dull man, I did not resent it; and, having previously dropped his name from my will, could afford to smile at the affront. I cannot respect a person who flies into a passion; if it be a sign of wit, then I thank Heaven that I was born a dullard.

I could say a great deal more about the advantages of dulness, but I do not understand what is called composition, and much prefer double entry. Indeed, I find it so hard to express myself that I am afraid of being as dull in print as I am elsewhere, and were it not for the lively interest I feel in the subject, I could not write at all. My heart is in it. It is your dull men who rule the world through their purses, which are generally full. I like them when they can talk of nothing but the Funds; I love them when they drive a good bargain; I respect them when they outwit persons who are considered brilliant; and when, above all, I see a successful piece of legislative dulness, my heart leaps up responsive. A man does so enjoy the success of his relatives when it does not interfere with his own:—

A fellow-feeling makes one wondrous kind.

So strongly am I conscious of this, that I never meet a dull man without being ready to give him my blessing if he is poor, and my money on safe security if he is rich.

Before closing this paper, let me, at the risk of repetition, enumerate some of the advantages of dulness. A dull young fellow does not fall desperately in love with the first beautiful girl he sees, does not lie awake at night thinking of her, is not mad enough to marry her offhand. Not he. He sleeps over the matter, thinks over it, and makes careful inquiries about her prospects. Then, he is not ambitious to gain knowledge, to learn languages, to visit foreign countries, to paint pictures, or to write for the newspapers. There is no fear from him of any wild escapade. He is in no danger of making a runaway match, like Lord Eldon, or of enlisting as a common soldier, which I have heard the poet Coleridge did. He may be a fool, but he keeps his folly at home; he may be somewhat of a knave, but he will not publish his rascality to the world, like Tom Jones and Charles Surface. Mind, I have no personal knowledge of these gentlemen, but have been always told they were scapegraces, and the reverse of dull. Then, your dull man is never much elated or much depressed. He has no strong feelings, and bears with equanimity the worst blows of fortune. (Excuse me a moment while I read a telegram. . . . What! How? The whole affair a swindle—the company smashed up—the secretary absconded, and the liability unlimited! Then I am ruined, irretrievably ruined, not a chance for me any more in this world! What astounding folly! And my nephew warned me, too, that the concern was a bubble. Could I think he understood business better than I did? Verily, there is no fool like a dull fool, after all.)

THEODORE TEAPE.

Baron Ferdinand De Rothschild has consented to preside at the anniversary festival of the Metropolitan Free Hospital at Willis's Rooms on May 21.

We need only refer to our Map of Afghanistan and the adjacent territories of Persia (Khorassan), Russian Turkestan (with Bokhara), the Punjaub and Quetta, of which so much has been said in this Journal. Good maps of these countries, suitable for the present occasion, have just been brought out specially by Messrs. Stanford, Charing-cross; George Philip and Son, Fleet-street; and W. and A. Keith Johnston, Warwick-lane.

RUSSIA AND ENGLAND IN ASIA.

The violent outrage perpetrated by the Russian military commanders, General Komaroff, Governor of the Trans-Caspian Provinces, and Colonel Alikhanoff (formerly Ali Khan, a Circassian Mohammedan), Governor of Merv, has excited just indignation in England. It looks very much like a wanton breach of faith and a gross insult. In spite of all the moral and political wisdom available for the guidance of statesmen, on either side, this deplorable incident may be the spark to kindle a vast conflagration, a war of tremendous proportions between the two great European nations which possess mighty Empires in the Continent of Asia. We would not, and dare not, at such a critical moment, write and print one sentence that might seem calculated to inflame the passions of either nation to hostility against the other. We dread and detest the prospect of such a war, not merely because it would certainly bring upon our own country, even if victorious, a huge addition to the public debt, and to our taxation for a long series of years, and would certainly cause the loss of many thousand valuable English lives, with life-long sorrow to widows and bereavement of orphans among us—not merely because it would also cause to India, for whose welfare England is responsible, financial embarrassment which might be fatal to the plans of economic and administrative benefit which are now in progress—but for the general interests of humanity. We feel concerned for the credit and influence of that general movement of civilisation, proceeding from modern European Christendom, which is at length finding its way into Asia, and which promises, if it be not untimely checked by the ambition of military conquest and by the vices of Imperial despotism, to afford the means of raising the Asiatic races of mankind to a higher standard of social life. Let us at once declare our conviction that Russia, as well as England, has evidently a genuine mission to perform in the improvement of the condition of Asia. We doubt not that Russia is capable, if her policy were rightly directed, of effecting a great amount of good in those parts of the immense continent which lie within the proper scope of her natural advance to the East. We believe, indeed, that she has actually done some good in several Asiatic countries, and among some of the populations. We consider that no event could be happier, no settlement could open a fairer prospect, than a just and secure mutual understanding between Russia and Great Britain, especially with reference to the treatment of Central Asia.

It is abundantly shown by the history of the past, and by the accurate researches of geography and ethnology recently completed, that Central Asia is a region abounding in the natural resources, as well in the race qualities of its human inhabitants, as the physical conditions of soil, climate, and internal water-privileges by lakes and rivers and inland seas, which have furnished in old times, and might again be made to supply, the materials of a rich and various civilisation. It was the ancient and primitive seat, if there be any reliance upon the undesigned testimony of cognate words, proving an original community of language—it was the birth-place and cradle of the progenitors of all the civilised nations of Europe, and of those which in ancient Persia and India, before the commencement of recorded history, learnt the arts of social life. They were people who tilled the earth, built houses and towns, chose rulers, devised and obeyed laws for the public welfare, adopted customs and manners of refined intercourse, invented religious and philosophical systems, formed regular governments, and raised armies for national defence. These were the works of the Aryans, the "Ploughmen," the husbandmen or settled cultivators of land, whose valour, industry, and wealth no doubt excited the wonder and the envy of Semitic pastoral tribes wandering over the grassy steppes with their flocks and herds and tents, as many Asiatic nations do to this day, apparently with no disposition to emulate the improvements of the more settled communities. It seems pretty well agreed that the quarter in which the Aryan race, the ancestors of the most advanced and cultivated portion of mankind, including the Greeks and Romans, all the modern nations of Celtic, Teutonic, Gothic, and Slavonic breed in Europe and America, the ancient Persians, and the Brahmin race in Upper India, began to live a collective life, was in Central Asia, between the Paropamisus range and the Oxus, and thence down towards the Caspian Sea. This region was one of the Old Worlds of prehistoric civilisation, though it has, by ages of oppression and spoliation, been cruelly stripped of cultivation and of population, and by the neglect of irrigation, which the land requires, has been reduced in many parts to a barren desert. With peace and good government, with security for personal liberty and for property, with agricultural enterprise and industry, and with the access of foreign commerce, these countries of Central Asia might once more be brought into a flourishing condition. The adjacent parts of Khorassan and Afghanistan must be included in this estimate; and it will be a disgrace to Christian Europe if some political arrangement cannot be made, without a fierce and profligate war between two Great Powers, for defining the mode in which European influence shall be applied to develop their resources.

This is, we believe, the real essence of the question of Central Asia; and not, as some ingenious political speculators have imagined, any considerable danger of Russian interference with India. There are few, indeed, at the present day, among those correctly acquainted with our Indian Empire, who believe it would ever be possible for Russia, by a direct invasion and conquest, to deprive us of that dominion. The defensive strength of India, concentrated and employed as it would be in British hands, and supported by the land and sea forces of Great Britain, which are within three weeks of Bombay and Kurrachee, would certainly be enough to repel such an invasion, supposing the enemy to reach the plains of the Punjaub. Nor do we expect to hear much more, after the proofs lately given of the loyalty of the Native Princes, of the Nizam, of Scindia and Holkar, of the Sikh Chiefs, and of the rulers of Cashmere and Nepaul, about the supposed facility of Russian intrigue among either the subjects or feudatories of our Indian Empire for the overthrow of British supremacy, which they feel to be a safeguard instead of a burden. The idea that, because an Afghan dynasty once reigned in India, above three centuries and a half ago, before the Mogul Empire, or because the Afghans broke into the Punjaub again, for a brief period, and got hold of the Rohilla country, shortly before the English conquest of Bengal, India could now be disturbed by the mere name of the Afghans, and either terrorised or seduced to surrender to Russia, is a wild fancy indeed. We do not approve of the wars against Afghanistan under the Indian Governments of Lord Auckland and of Lord Lytton; both were unjust and needless, and were attended by some disastrous incidents; but, in either case, the general result was finally such as must have inspired every man of our Native Army, and every class of the population in India, with a conviction that the Afghans were not a Power to be feared. Being also the nearest neighbour to India, it is but natural that Afghanistan should be the most hated of all Asiatic States; and we may be sure that, if ever Russia were to enter India hand-in-hand with the rapacious Afghans, as Nadir Shah of Persia did in 1739, the effect would be to arouse a more desperate resistance.

In short, we can perceive no grounds whatever in the calculation of probable results, for assuming that Russian aggression in Afghanistan is prompted by the ulterior design of subverting the British Empire in India. There is a spirit of hostility, we fear, still rife in the minds of Russian military officials in Central Asia. There are individual Russians, like the late General Skobeleff and others, who have openly advocated plans for the invasion of India, at times when Russia seemed about to be engaged in war with Great Britain upon the question of Turkey in Europe. These utterances are not those of Russian statesmen; and their value, as essays on a purely military problem, is about equal to that of the famous "Battle of Dorking." The authors are never tired of telling us that Alexander the Great of Macedon, Mahmoud of Ghuzni, Genghis Khan and Tamerlane the Tartars, Sultan Baber, and Nadir Shah, actually marched into India by way of Afghanistan. Well, the first of those conquerors, Alexander, soon had to take himself away by a different route, having got but half-way across the Punjaub; and the last, Nadir Shah, after pillaging Delhi, found it expedient to return. General Skobeleff, in January, 1877, when everybody was thinking of war between Russia and England, wrote somewhat to the same effect as Generals Duhamel and Khruleff, in 1854 and 1855, upon the practicability of diverting the British forces by an attack on India.

According to General Khruleff's plan, 30,000 Russians were to march by the route of Meshed, in Khorassan, to Herat, and on to Candahar, "sending an embassy thence to Cabul, which would finally dispose the natives in our favour, and raise our influence over that of the English." General Duhamel proposed to send infantry, artillery, and ammunition over the Caspian, and to Asterabad, to be joined by a cavalry force travelling overland from Circassia through Persia; this army would advance through Khorassan to Afghanistan. "Comparatively easy," says Duhamel, "would be the march through half-civilised Persia, which is already so bound by treaties that it is incapable of any serious resistance, and is, moreover, threatened from all sides, especially from Circassia, and so rendered powerless. What more then remains to be desired? Any active co-operation on the part of the Persians involves active co-operation on the part of the Afghans," (we do not at all understand this,) "on account of the active hostility which exists between the two; and this is just the sine qua non of an attack upon India." General Duhamel certainly reckoned without his host. The Russians, by his plan, were to make friends with the Afghans at Cabul, and then to advance, with the Afghans, through the Khyber Pass to the Indus, which they would cross at Attock, and move on to capture Lahore and Delhi. "The choice of this route would create a rebellion in the very heart of England's possessions, and cause all the Mohammedan tribes to rise against her. In this direction lies, for the Afghans, the most tempting prospect of booty and acquisition of territory. Should this be the means of winning over the Sikhs, so much the better; but the Afghan alliance is of the greatest importance. This once accomplished, all is won; for we do not invade India with a view to making conquests, but to overthrow the English rule, or at least to weaken English power. In order to effect this, only a small army is needed, to form the kernel of the invasion, around which all the conquered tribes would cluster, and which might be gradually reduced as a general rising caused the attacking forces to increase." These suggestions and predictions of the Russian General in 1854 only prove his utter ignorance both of India and of Afghanistan. He imagined that, with a small Russian force just to lead the way, and to be afterwards reduced, since Russia would not care about occupying India herself, the Afghans would easily conquer India, and would be heartily welcomed and supported by all sections of the native population.

General Skobeleff, in 1877, was not much better informed; in fact, he knew nothing at all about India, and very few Russians do. "Everyone has declared"—"it is said by everyone who has studied the question"—are the accustomed phrases by which speculative projectors, military or political, disguise their want of accurate knowledge. Skobeleff was cock-sure that "the position of the English in India is so precarious, than an approach to the frontier would be enough to raise a rebellion." He therefore proposed, if war should break out between Russia and England, as was then expected, to dispatch a mission to Cabul and form at Samarcand a column of ten battalions of infantry, fourteen "sotnias" of Cossack horse, and forty guns, making a total of ten or twelve thousand men, which "should positively be the minimum of our aggressive force." Shere Ali, then Ameer of Cabul, was to be drawn into a Russian alliance, and the Mission was "to open relations with the disaffected natives of India." The column of Russian troops was to be pushed through Bamian to Cabul, and to be kept waiting there until the native rebellion in India should be organised, while measures would be taken also "to organise masses of Asiatic cavalry, which, to a cry of 'blood and booty,' might be launched into India, as the vanguard, thus renewing the times of Timour!" Skobeleff went on to say, "The further operations of the Russian column from Cabul" (the ten or twelve thousand Russians) "cannot be sketched in this plan of campaign (!). At best, the operations might terminate in the presence of the Russian banners at Benares; at worst, the column might retire (?) with honour to Herat, meeting a force dispatched from the Caucasus, which should consist of several battalions, with six guns to every thousand men." Only fancy this handful of Russians, with Skobeleff himself in command, retreating through the Khyber Pass, if they could escape being all slain or made prisoners by the Bengal Army in the Punjaub! The audacious projector of this campaign might well say that, "the enterprise would be a risky one; but if we were successful, we should entirely demolish the British Empire in India." He would have it understood among the troops, before crossing the Hindoo Koosh, "that every man must feel that he had come to Afghanistan to conquer or die; let each man know that the Emperer required even his death;" and then, he adds, "We should not be reproached for leaving our standards in the hands of the enemy, if not a single Russian warrior remained alive beyond the Hindoo Koosh." Such was the wild, fantastic, almost insane scheme of the famous General Skobeleff, which has been held up as a bugbear to frighten Englishmen with the fear of losing India. So much for the attack.

On the other hand, we are deliberately of opinion that the defensive military capabilities of India under British Imperial administration, and associated with the maritime ascendancy of Great Britain, exceed those of any Empire that ever yet existed in the East. They are so great, because they are so compact, so favoured by the peninsular situation of India, and by its wonderful barrier of mountains to the north—in these respects singularly like Italy when the Romans were a warlike and ruling nation—and because the immense population of India, the cities, the railways, the seaports, and the trade, supply incalculable resources and facilities of military defence. There is no single Power, no possible combination of allied Powers, that could wrest India from our hands against the will of the native population. We think no more of what Napoleon I. said about it, or what he put into the crazy head of the Emperor Paul, than we do of the apocryphal "Will of Peter the Great," who died, by-the-way, some years before the victories of Clive laid the first stone of the structure of British Empire in India. It is not worthy of us—it betrays a want of faith in the undegenerate virtues of our nation, and in the ability and efforts, on the whole successful, of British administrators of India to make their rule serviceable and acceptable, which is to make it secure—that any of us should think it likely to be supplanted by Russia.

While upon this topic, we have the pleasure of quoting a high Native authority, the present Minister of the most important Mohammedan State in India, who expresses in a recent letter the sentiments with which British rule is regarded by his countrymen. The State of Hyderabad, containing nearly ten millions of people, under the Government of the Nizam, has been so wisely and faithfully administered by a great Native statesman, the late Sir Salar Jung, during thirty years, that its internal prosperity will bear comparison with the best-managed provinces under the immediate administration of British officials. Mr. William Digby, secretary to the National Liberal Club, in his book just published, "India for the Indians and for England," gives a precise statistical account of the Hyderabad Government and its results, from 1853 to 1882, showing the great reforms that were effected, the remission of vexatious taxes, the economy in collection of revenue, the reduction of debt, the encouragement of agriculture and trade, the care for education, and other good work still continued by the late Minister's son. Now, Hyderabad, in its domestic concerns, is an independent Native State, and it is one which remains of those originated by the Mogul Empire superseded by the British Empire; so that the spontaneous testimony of its rulers in favour of the British Empire, as generally beneficial to India, cannot be suspected of undue partiality or servility; yet here is Mehdi Ali, Political and Financial Secretary to the Nizam's Government, writing a few days since, with the utmost enthusiasm, denouncing "Russian despotism and Russian corruption," and declaring that all India, but especially the Mussulman part of India, will fight most eagerly on the British side.

"But the Russian theorists say," writes Mehdi Ali, "that India is sighing under the yoke of an alien conqueror, and will welcome us as deliverers. Is this true? Again I say, No! At what stage of the world's history has there been a free and united India? Was it when the Aryans poured in crowds over the Hindoo Koosh, settled in the fertile valley of the Ganges, spread towards the south, and made subject every aboriginal race that came across their path? Was it when every Hindoo kingdom was fighting against the other? Was it when the Mohammedan armies, under the Caliph's Generals, subdued the north? Was it when there were at least a dozen independent Mohammedan kingdoms, with as many Hindoo Rajs? Was it when the Afghans took Delhi, or when the Tartars founded a dynasty? And, finally, was it free and united when the Mogul Aurungzebe subdued every Prince, whether Hindoo or Mohammedan, from Peshawur to Cape Comorin, or after Aurungzebe's death, when the Mogul Empire fell to pieces? Was India free and united when ravaged by the hordes of Gholam Khader, of the Mahratta Peishwas, and of Nadir Shah? Again, No! India has never been free until the British appeared on the scene, and she did not know what peace meant until she heard of the Pax Britannica. Are the English more alien to the people of India than Afghan Sultans or than Mogul Emperors? For seven hundred years the States of India fought against the alien rulers, whose main policy was bloodshed and rapine. It is only during the last eighty years that we have enjoyed peace, because our present rulers have left us nothing more to fight for. English peace we know, and English justice and civilisation. Can, then, anyone for a moment think that we shall welcome Russian despotism and Russian corruption? It is said that the Native States are dissatisfied, and the people discontented. Are there any grounds for these statements? No doubt there are many who have grievances. Mysore would like to have her tribute reduced; Hyderabad would like to get back the Berars; Scindia would like to have the fort of Gwalior restored; Travancore would like to have two more guns added to her salute; the educated Baboos and B.A.'s would like to have more appointments thrown open to them. All this is, no doubt, true; but does the ventilation of these grievances mean disloyalty and discontent? Again, No! What are these grievances compared with what the princes and the peoples have had to suffer for centuries before the British rule? In former times a conqueror made a desert, and called it peace. Death was often the punishment for defence against an unprovoked attack. The nephew assassinated his uncle; the son poisoned his father and murdered his brothers; a faithful servant was rewarded by fine, imprisonment, and often death. No one put forward a grievance unless he had an army to back it up with. As for the people, they were silent, for protest meant further oppression. It is because the people of India have learnt to put faith in British justice that now so many complaints are heard. They have learnt that courts of justice are independent, that a British Judge does not hesitate to give an award against the Government if the latter is in the wrong; that the higher official is ready to hear an appeal against the order of his subordinate, and that British justice is no respecter of persons, and gives the lowest subject the opportunity of appealing to the Court of the Empress. This is the reason why they now come forward with confidence. Their complaints are proofs rather of loyalty than of disloyalty. Of course, in an empire so large as India it is impossible that all can be satisfied. Even British officials are human, and humanum est errare. The British as a nation are just; but still there are individuals who commit injustice. In the name, therefore, of my fellow-subjects, I protest against an expression of grievances being considered a sign of disloyalty. I have, I think, answered the question as to whether the natives of India wish for Russia."

This does not look at all like an opening for Russian intrigue or Russian conquest; nor could any such projects against India find much encouragement in the eagerness of all the native Princes, Mussulman, Hindoo, and Sikh, to put their troops at the disposal of Lord Dufferin for the expected war on the Afghan frontier. Scindia of Gwalior, and Holkar of Indore, the descendants and namesakes of the once powerful Mahratta Chiefs, hasten to meet the Viceroy at a railway station passing their dominions, to make this offer in the most unqualified terms; the Nizam is as ready to send his contingent to Afghanistan as he was to the Soudan; the Maharajah of Mysore, the Ranee of Bhopal, the Maharajah of Cashmere, the independent state of Nepaul, with its hundred thousand Ghoorkas, the Rajpoot provinces of Oodeypore, Jeypore, and Jodhpore, and the Punjaub Rajahs of Jheend, Puttiala, and Kapurthulla, are pressing their services on the British Government. We are quite aware that their armies, though in the aggregate nominally large, consist mainly of undrilled and ill-armed militia, liable to serve by the feudal tenure of their land, and chiefly useful as rural police; but then, while they cannot at present be dangerous to the Indian Empire, they are capable of being converted, with a superior equipment and a short training, into an immense and thoroughly efficient regular military force. This is, after all, merely a question of arithmetic; the population of India under direct British rule is nearly two hundred millions, and that of all the Native States of India amounts to fifty-five millions; we may usually reckon, at the rate of European armies raised by conscription, one man in a hundred of the population to be in military service. India is thus capable of raising, if it were required, and if the rulers of India were so disposed, above two millions and a half of soldiers. We should be very sorry to contemplate such a state of affairs, but it would not be worse, simply as a draught on the population for army purposes, than some of the Continental nations of Europe have endured. There is France, with less than thirty-eight millions of people, keeping half a million under the colours in time of peace; there are Germany and Italy, more or less on a corresponding scale; there is Russia, with 780,000 soldiers "on the peace footing," and 2,300,000 on the war footing, out of a hundred million subjects. For a defensive emergency, therefore, the enormous Indian population, including many races of the finest fighting qualities, could put in actual array, upon the soil of India, an army greater than the whole nominal army of Russia, and ten times greater than Russia could ever send into the field. The equipment, armament, transport, and maintenance of armies must always be a question of money, vastly to the disadvantage of an invader coming a distance of several thousand miles; and the defence of India with England for the paymaster, in case of need, would probably cost less than the attack, the expense of which Russia could never think of incurring.

For these reasons, which Russian statesmen must long have been accustomed to consider, the idea of an invasion of India, in any case, may be dismissed as chimerical. It is not more likely now than it was half a century ago. Some politicians, however, who do not think Russia could possibly make a conquest of India, and who believe that the greater part of the natives of India would not accept Russian rule, still apprehend that it is the intention of Russia to set on foot in Afghanistan, if she can get there, secret agencies for promoting sedition in India, and for stirring up local or tribal insurrections, and perhaps corrupting the allegiance of the native army. This is to be done, they suspect, not in order to procure the establishment of the Czar's dominion in India, but to provide means of giving occasional trouble and annoyance to England, of distracting her attention from European diplomacy, or checking and punishing her when she thwarts Russian designs on Constantinople and in the Levant. It is a very curious theory of political motives, but examples may be found without going out of Europe, which can hardly be supposed to encourage Russian statecraft in any hope of influencing British foreign policy by a contrivance of that kind. If Russia were mistress of Herat, or even of Candahar and Cabul, she would be no nearer to a commanding position over the British dominion of India, by mere juxtaposition of territories, than she is with regard to Prussia and Austria. No conditions of close neighbourhood, and opportunity of tampering with the allegiance of alien subjects, can be imagined more objectionable, or more formidable for mischief, than the relative positions of the three great Empires of Eastern Europe. The partition of Poland gave each of them a slice of Polish territory and a segment of the Polish nation to govern; Prussia has her Posen, and Austria her Galicia, while Russia has the bulk of the ancient Polish kingdom. But this has not prevented Austria from again and again opposing Russia on the Eastern Question, and it has not rendered German policy subservient to that of St. Petersburg. It is incredible, therefore, that any Russian Minister or Emperor should indulge the hope of being able to control the European policy of a British Government by setting on his agents to procure a revolt of the hill tribes on the Punjaub frontier, the Wuziris, the Afreedis, the Yuzufzais, and others, who have had to be periodically chastised by a small military expedition from time to time. We do indeed remember that it was once imputed to Russia, some thirty or forty years ago, that she knew too much about the origin of a certain insurrection of the peasantry in Galicia; but that was perhaps a calumny; at any rate, it did not deter Austria from holding the Danubian Provinces against her during the Crimean War.

These arguments have not been adduced in extenuation of the conduct of Russia towards Afghanistan, which we deem wholly unjustifiable and intolerable; but in order to deprecate anything like alarmist passion or panic. India is not directly or indirectly attacked, and is certainly not endangered; but Afghanistan, which is a State intimately allied with India, and which it is our interest and our duty, as guardians of India, to defend, is grievously wronged, and stands in imminent peril. This is a Central Asian question, rather than a properly Indian question; and a survey of the conditions of Central Asia, with an adequate estimate of their importance to the world in general, and of the part that England should take in making the best of them, may be useful at the present crisis. We often hear the city or the district of Herat called "the Key of India." It is not so—very far from it; but Herat is the Key of Central Asia; and we do not think it ought to be in Russian hands. The reader will form his own opinion about this from a brief survey of the progress of Russian conquests in Asia, with a view of their probable aim and destination; and from some description of the geographical situation of Herat and the surrounding countries, with a notice of the historical evidences of its importance as a centre of commerce and an instrument of power.

Peter the Great, if we may go back to him, in the year 1713, just after his wars with Charles XII. of Sweden, was visited by a Turkoman chief, who told him that gold sand was to be found in the Amoo Darya, the river which was anciently called the Oxus. The same informant told Peter that this river had formerly flowed into the Caspian, but that the Khan of Khiva had artificially changed its course, and had made it flow into the Aral Sea. This story inflamed Peter's ambitious imagination with a desire to bring back the gold-bearing river to the Caspian, where it would be within reach of the Russians. He sent an expedition of several thousand men, under Prince Bekovitch, to visit Khiva and Bokhara, cities famous and wealthy in the heyday of the Turkish mediæval kingdoms of Central Asia; and to see what could be done with the Oxus. They were also to find a road to India, if possible, and to visit the Grand Mogul at Delhi. The expedition crossed the Caspian in boats, landing on the eastern shore, and marched to Khiva, arriving there in August, 1717. The Khan seemed at first doubtful about the intentions of the Russians; but soon, finding them bent on conquest, showed fight, and Bekovitch, with all his men, perished in the conflict and massacre. This was the first Russian adventure in Central Asia. Several attempts were made by individual Russian travellers, in 1731, in 1741, and in 1793, the last time by an oculist whom Catherine II. sent to cure a Khivan Prince of ophthalmia; and reports of the existence of gold-mines and silver-mines tempted the cupidity of the Russian Court. It is not unlikely that these notions were originated by a misunderstanding of the name "Zarafshan," or "Gold-dispenser," given to one of the streams tributary to the Oxus, above Bokhara, on account of its fertilising effect in the irrigation of the soil. The Russian Emperor Paul, who was really a sort of madman, sent a force under Count Orloff to Khiva in the year 1801, but the news of the assassination of the Czar induced Orloff to return. In 1819, Captain Mouravieff was dispatched from the army of the Caucasus to examine the eastern coast of the Caspian, and to select a site there for the construction of a fort. He went on to Khiva, where he was imprisoned by order of the Khan, and was detained seven weeks. On his return to Russia, Mouravieff gave an account of his travels, relating the barbarous and tyrannical conduct of the Khan, and the cruel treatment of other Russian captives in Khiva. He pointed out, moreover, that Khiva stood in the way of the advance of Russian commerce to Bokhara and to "Northern India." From this period—say the year 1820—began the persistent attempts of the Russian Empire to acquire possession of the countries extending due eastward of the Caspian—namely, the Turkish Khanates of Khiva, Khokand, and Bokhara, collectively termed the region of Turkestan, watered mainly by the two great rivers, the Sir-Darya (the ancient Jaxartes) and the Amoo-Darya or Jihun (the ancient Hydaspes), which fall into the Sea of Aral.

The whole region, including the deserts of the Kizil-Kum (Red Sand) and the Kara-Kum (Black Sand), which occupy the southern and western parts, has an extent of 1400 miles from the Caspian to the source of the Oxus in the Pamir plateau—the Bam-i-Dunya, or "Roof of the World," which connects the Himalayas and Hindoo Koosh mountain ranges with the Tian-Shan range to the north. It is geographically and historically distinct from Siberia, the conquest of which by Russia was achieved long before, and which has not been concerned in the transactions here related. The entire surface of the land slopes very gently westward down to the Caspian, the level of which sea is 85 feet below that of the Mediterranean; but the Oxus and the Sir-Darya, instead of reaching the Caspian, turn their course northwards and pour their waters into the Aral, which is 245 feet higher in level than the Caspian. It is considered probable that, in former ages, these two rivers united by a channel which can partly be traced, and then formed one grand river flowing westward to the Caspian. If that were the case, it must have traversed the Kara-Kum, which country would not then be a desert, but may have been fertile and populous; and the Murghab and Heri-Rud (or Tejend), flowing from the mountains above Herat, would be tributaries of the Oxus. A great change of physical conditions has apparently taken place in the south-west part of this region, along the Atak or northern boundary of Khorassan, and to the north of Herat; it has become a desolate and sterile wilderness, with a few oases, such as Merv, where one of the rivers above mentioned, by artificial means, is made to dispose beneficially of most of its remaining water. The Turkomans, of various tribes, who are not to be confounded with the proper Turks of the Usbeg family, inhabit the Kara-Kum oases, and are the last people that have come under Russian dominion. The settled and civilised people of Bokhara, Samarcand, Ferghana or Khokand, and Khiva, are chiefly Usbeg Turks, but mixed with Tajiks of the old Persian or Iranian race. These countries attained in the Middle Ages a high degree of civilisation, of the Mohammedan type, and the cities just named were rich and stately, though now sadly decayed. It is pleasanter to describe cities and cultivated districts than dreary deserts. Bokhara was the most powerful Turkish capital; its vast bazaar shows the great amount of former traffic, in which the products of China and India were exchanged for those of Europe, forwarded usually by Italian merchants, and conveyed through Aleppo, Bagdad, Southern Persia, and Herat. The situation of Bokhara, in a fertile district watered by the "Gold-dispenser" Zarafshan, was exceedingly propitious to agriculture, fields of grain, cotton plantations, and orchards or gardens yielding a variety of fruit. The city, which has now about 70,000 inhabitants, may have had 200,000 or more. Its noble mosques, colleges of Mussulman learning, and other public institutions, were renowned in the Eastern world; but its glory became diminished by the rise of Samarcand, the Tartar capital, which has also, by its own irrigation works, robbed Bokhara of some of the wealth-producing water of the bounteous Zarafshan. In the city of Samarcand, now a favoured town reviving under Russian rule, are found some of the grandest architectural monuments of Islam, the mosque of the Shah-Zindeh and several great colleges, besides the citadel and palace of the old Ameers. Tashkend, however, the present head-quarters of the official administration, is a much larger city, with a population of 100,000, including five thousand Russians; and there is also the town of Khokand, formerly the residence of a sovereign Khan, in the province of the Sir-Darya. Descending the Oxus to near the Sea of Aral, we arrive at the Khivan oasis, which first attracted Russian ambition, and which is a sort of Little Egypt, consisting of the delta of that large river, a space of 5500 square miles, intersected by numerous canals for irrigation, with dams, aqueducts, and other such works, designed of old by the Sultans of Khaream. The city itself is by no means splendid; it is surrounded by a mud wall four miles in circumference, and there is an inner town, with another wall for its defence as a citadel, the Khan's palace, and religious and official buildings. Khiva is about four hundred miles distance from the Caspian; and, being the weakest and the most accessible of the independent Turkish States, naturally fell a prey to Russian conquest before the others.

It must be admitted, however, that Russia had some provocation. The atrociously bad government of the Khivan Khans had become the greatest nuisance to the Russian provinces of Orenburg and Astrakhan, at the north of the Caspian, or at least to the Kirghiz Tartar people under a Russian protectorate dwelling between the Caspian and the Aral. Khiva had become a mere slave-market, to which the Turkoman kidnappers and man-stealers, far more cruel than those of the African Soudan, yearly brought for sale thousands of Russian and Persian subjects, while they plundered every caravan of trade or travel setting forth eastward from the Caspian shore. It was not likely that Russia, with the Volga and the port of Astrakhan, since Peter the Great's time, forming her main outlet to Asia, would for ever be content to endure such an obnoxious neighbour. No other European nation, under similar circumstances, would have shown much greater patience. For the detailed narrative of events from 1820 to 1873, when Khiva was finally reduced to subjection, our readers may be referred to a very opportune publication, a new volume by Mr. Sutherland Edwards, called "Russian Projects against India" (Remington and Co., publishers), which is a good piece of historical work, though we do not recognise the propriety of its title, seeing that Khiva and India are a thousand miles apart. It does contain, however, those paper schemes of invading India, which were so flimsy and frivolous. We learn from this book that in 1822, when many Turkoman tribes acknowledged the authority of the Khan of Khiva, "the kidnapping of Russians from the frontier increased tenfold; piracy on the Caspian, moreover, took serious proportions, and inflicted great injury on the Russian fishermen; the Russian caravans, escorted by considerable detachments, were pillaged as before," of which remarkable instances are mentioned. "Every year some two hundred Russians were captured on the Caspian and sold in the Khivan market: a special fund was held in trust for their ransom." In 1826, the Khan of Khiva proposed to send an envoy to St. Petersburg, and was told that it could only be permitted on two conditions; that he should indemnify the Russian traders for the robbery of their caravans; "and secondly, that all the Russian prisoners detained in Khiva should be sent back, and that all traffic in slaves should for the future be prohibited. These conditions were not agreed to by the Khan, and the envoy was sent back to Khiva." In 1830, to quote an official report of that date, "at Khiva, according to reliable information, there were more than two thousand Russians in bondage. Russian prisoners were sold at the Khivan bazaars; and the traffic was participated in, not only by the highest Khivan officials, but likewise by Khivan traders who visited Russia every year, and who, when frequenting the Khirghiz encampments for purposes of trade, incited the Kirghizes to make prisoners, buying them up beforehand and giving money in advance. Although the Orenburg Frontier Commission had at its disposal a sum of 3000 roubles for the redemption of Russian prisoners, it was only able to procure the liberation of a very small number, as sentence of death was awarded at Khiva to any one who consented to sell his slave in order that he might be restored to his native country." ("Russian Projects against India," page 51.) We read further how the Russians held in slavery, if they were caught in an attempt to escape, had their noses and ears cut off, and for a second attempt were punished with torture and death. We wonder how long England would tolerate the continual treatment in this manner of Englishmen captured by a barbarian kingdom on the opposite shore of the Channel or the North Sea?

It was in March, 1839, after many remonstrances, warnings, and threats, that the Russian Government resolved upon an expedition against Khiva. It was not intended to annex that territory to the Czar's dominions, but to replace the existing Khan by a trustworthy ruler, who would give security and freedom to Russian subjects trading there. We cannot but regret that it should have been thought necessary, upon such an occasion, to counteract the possibility of English mercantile agents supplying the Khivans and Kirghizes with arms and ammunition. Commercial rivalry between the two nations in Central Asia had become rather active in the preceding years, and it is apt to give rise to political intrigue. Other English travellers, of a higher and more responsible character, visited Bokhara and Khiva; the names of the Rev. Dr. Wolff, whose mission was for the relief of some persecuted Jews, of Captain Abbott and Captain Shakspear, who aided in procuring the release of Russian captives at Khiva, and of Colonels Stoddart and Captain Conolly, who were put to death by the Ameer of Bokhara, will be remembered. There was a strong disposition in England, at the time of the first Afghan War, on account of the Russian intrigues at Cabul, to regard with extreme jealousy the movement against Khiva. The expedition, nevertheless, started from Orenburg, under the command of General Perofski, in October, 1840, consisting of 5325 men, with twenty-two guns, rockets, pontoons, and mining implements, the stores carried by 10,000 camels; but the campaign, which ended in the following April, was a rather disastrous failure, though with no defeat in battle and with very little fighting. The winter proved very severe, and the deep snow on the steppes, with the storms and extreme cold, made it difficult to march, killed most of the camels, and caused great sickness and mortality among the troops, who had not been well selected. They got only about half-way to Khiva. Many years passed before anything more was done in that direction. In the meantime, British diplomacy had been at work, in 1844, to procure from Russia an engagement or understanding that the three Khanates of Central Asia, Khiva, Bokhara, and Khokand, should be left independent, "as a neutral zone interposed between the two Empires, so as to preserve them from dangerous contact." This idea of "a neutral zone," wider or narrower, in Central Asia, has been entertained by our Foreign Office until a very recent period. No one seems inclined to lay much stress upon the necessity of creating or preserving "a neutral zone" between great Empires on the Continent of Europe; the frontiers of Russia, Germany, and Austria lie close together, and so do, in part, those of Germany and France. In Asia, moreover, the territory doomed to serve as "a neutral zone," if it happens to be overrun with Turkoman marauders, and its established rule be a flagrant example of corruption and imbecility, like those of Khiva and Bokhara, can hardly answer the ends of peace. The "neutral zone," in this case, was more than twelve hundred miles wide, and seems a pretty large slice of the earth's surface to give up to perpetual anarchy, to unrestrained cruelty and rapacity of the worst kind, for the political convenience of European diplomatists. Conventions and memorandums, formal promises, or simple professions and declarations of intentions, present or contingent, may be all very well, and it is right that they should be observed, when they are made; but if they forbid a responsible Power to do, in any case, that which may perhaps become its duty, then one would say that it was wrong of the other party to exact such promises. In the month of June, 1873, the Russians captured the town of Khiva; and Mr. Macgahan, the Daily News Correspondent, who was there, wrote as follows:—"As to the good done by the Russians in Central Asia, the Persian and other slaves hailed with delight the approach of the Russians; for the emancipation of the slaves has always followed the occupation of any place in Central Asia by the Russians." In like manner, with reference to Bokhara, we must agree with Mr. Sutherland Edwards that no reader of Vambéry's shocking account of the hideous cruelties formerly practised there can regret that the Russians have put down such barbarities. With regard also to the Akhal Turkomans and the Tekke Turkomans on the border of Khorassan, have we not the testimony of our Special Artist, Mr. Simpson, throughout his journey from Persia to Herat, that he everywhere saw proofs and heard reports of the terrible havoc yearly perpetrated by those banditti, and was assured that only the Russian conquest of the adjacent territory had put a stop to it? It is conceivable that circumstances might occur in which "a neutral zone" would be more honoured in the breach than in the observance.

The particulars of occasion, agents, and instruments by which the Russian Government became supreme over the whole of Turkestan, are not an edifying history, from a moral and humane point of view. Soldiering against barbarians, in most countries and in most ages, is sometimes dirty as well as bloody work—intriguing, cheating, and bribing is still dirtier; and we should be glad to cut out some chapters of the early history of English conquests in India, and perhaps of later achievements or attempts in Africa and elsewhere. It takes a good deal of all sorts to create a great military empire, which may nevertheless be subsequently administered, by wise, just, and diligent rulers like those we now have in India, for the real benefit of mankind. Putting aside, however, a large amount of diplomatic meddling, remonstrating, and promising or "understanding," for some thirty years of political vanity, the bare facts are these. In 1858, General Ignatieff was sent on a special mission to Khiva and Bokhara, and on his return was appointed Director of the Asiatic Department in the Foreign Office at St. Petersburg. Envoys from both Khanates were received at the Russian Court. Demands were made, including the free navigation of the Oxus, to which the Khivan Government refused consent, but that of Bokhara was more amenable. The state of those countries seemed not to be in the way of improvement; if there were fewer Russians held in slavery, there were many thousands of Persians, and the inevitable conflict was only postponed. In 1872, when European diplomacy was fully occupied with anxieties following the war between France and Germany, the Russian Government determined on another expedition to Khiva. Acts of hostility had the year before this been committed by the Khivans against the Russian military detachment at Krasnovodsk on the Caspian shore; and the excuse which the Khan made was, that the Russians had been mistaken for Persians. He then sent an envoy, who was told that he could not have access to the Emperor of Russia until all the Russian captives in Khiva were released, and until the Khan explained in writing the insolent treatment of the preceding Russian Mission. No explanation, apology, or redress was given; and in March, 1873, all being prepared, an advance was made of three forces simultaneously from the Caucasus, from Orenburg, and from Tashkend in the north-east part of Turkestan, to be united under command of General Kauffmann, forming an army of twelve thousand men, with fifty-four guns and other artillery. By an accidental failure to come up to time, the enterprise was achieved with only a portion of this; the Orenburg column, under General Vereffkin, joined by that from the Caucasus, reached Khiva about the first day of June, while the Turkestan column, with General Kauffmann, Commander-in-Chief, was on the other side of the Oxus. The terrified Khan of Khiva sent out his Russian captives, prisoners, and slaves, and begged for peace; but the city had to be taken. Vereffkin made his attack on June 9, after waiting some days for Kauffmann, and several hours' fighting took place on the canals and walls, and at the gates; next day, General Kauffmann arrived to find that the Khan had fled, and the town had surrendered. It was occupied by the Russian troops, and a treaty of peace was made, by which the Khanate of Khiva, restricted to the left bank of the Oxus, was to be a dependency of the Russian Empire ruled by its own Khan; a sum of nearly £300,000 was to be paid as indemnity for the Russian expenses, and all Khivan territory on the right bank of the Oxus was to be ceded to Russia, which handed it over to the Khan of Bokhara. Thirty thousand Persian, Tartar, and other slaves were set free and sent to their homes, and the Khiva slave-market was closed for ever. It was not, altogether, a bad piece of work, but it was very wrong to have promised not to do it. The promise, however, was not to annex Khiva; and Russia therefore contented herself with compelling the Khan to conduct his government as a vassal, assisted or controlled by a council formed of Khivan dignitaries and Russian officers; the Khan has since then requested to exchange his sovereignty for a pension. The Khan of Bokhara has been persuaded to accept a dependent position.

The north-eastern part of Turkestan, beyond the Sir-Darya or Jaxartes, together with the adjacent Siberian province of Semipalatinsk, was in 1867 detached from the Orenburg government, and was constituted a separate province, with its capital at Tashkend. This measure, which was the actual commencement of Russian dominion in Central Asia, met with no political objection, because that country does not lie at all in the road to India. Khokand, which is still further to the east, was in 1858 at war with the Ameer of Bokhara, and he asked the Russians to interfere, which they did ultimately by suppressing the Khanate of Khokand, as it had done some mischief to the neighbouring Russian province, like Khiva, by harbouring a host of robbers. The Khan of Khokand was at first merely reduced to submission and salutary control; but in 1875, his two sons raised a rebellion, and he was deposed and driven from his capital, taking refuge at Orenburg, whereupon the Russians put down the revolt, and annexed the territory, now called Ferghana, to the Russian dominions. The Bokhara Sovereign, whose treachery and cruelty were notorious, in 1868 became openly hostile, and raised the standard of a "Jihad" or Mussulman Holy War against the nations of Christendom. He was defeated by General Kauffmann, who captured the city of Samarcand, took possession of the fertile valley of Zarafshan, and brought down the Khan of Bokhara to the position of a vassal of the Russian Empire.

So far, Russia had only had to deal with the Turkish and other semi-civilised inhabitants of the old Khanates, who are not a warlike race, but effete, cowardly, and lazy, and were ruled by contemptible monarchs. It was very different when Russia was obliged to undertake the task of taming the plundering, man-hunting, merciless Turkomans of the Kara-Kum Desert, whose perpetual yearly raids for pillage and for procuring slaves had so long made desolate the borders of Persia. There are several families of these; we shall only mention a few of the principal of them. The Yomuts are a very large family; they live principally to the east of the Caspian, from which they extend to near Khiva. The Goklans are also numerous, and their aouls, or collections of tents, are along the Gurgan river, on the Persian frontier; some of this tribe acknowledge the sovereignity of the Shah. The Tekkes are classed under three heads—the Merv Tekkes, who dwell near or about Merv; the Akhal Tekkes, who were the tribe which defended Geok Tepe, and were conquered at last by Skobeleff; and the Ata Tekkes, another branch of this tribe, on the Persian frontier: their aouls are near to a range of hills which separate Khorassan from the desert. This range is called Atak, which is said to mean "on the Border." We are told by our Special Artist, Mr. Simpson, who has lately gained much acquaintance with some of these wild folk, that in the language of the Turkomans, "khalk" is the word used for a tribe; a subdivision of the khalk is the "taife," or horde; and the horde is formed of "tires," which may be something like the clan, or family. Their government is of the primitive patriarchal form, all matters being left to the decision of the "Ak-Sakkals," which term means the "white-beards," or the elders. "It may be supposed that their laws would be of a very loose nature, and liable to many changes, but 'Deb,' or custom, is the great authority with them; it is the guide which rules their conduct, and is the basis of whatever law and order there may chance to be in Turkestan. The Turkomans are Sonni Mohammedans, and have the moral code of the Koran as a guide. They are religious according to their own views on that subject; and a strange aspect of this existed in the old raiding days, examples of which might be given as having taken place in other parts of the world. When a raid was about to start, the Mollahs were in attendance, and pronounced a blessing, wishing it, in the name of Allah, victory and success, and that it might return with ample spoil and a multitude of slaves. The law of the Koran is that no Mohammedan can hold another in slavery. Kaffirs, or unbelievers, may be made slaves. This being the case, some have supposed that the Sonni Turkoman considered the Shiah Persian as no better than a Kaffir, and worthy only to be a slave. But it is easy to suppose that Deb, or custom, combined with self-interest, had a stronger hold on the Turkoman mind than the teaching of the Koran."

Now, some of our English philanthropists have recently been disposed to sanction a hasty, profitless, and not very glorious British war in the Soudan, because they suppose it is the best way to put an end to the practice of kidnapping people and carrying them off to be sold into slavery. If they had studied the history of Sir Samuel Baker's and General Gordon's rule in the Soudan in Ismail Pasha's reign, they would be aware that this horrible system was originated and maintained by the connection with Egypt as a great slave-market; and precisely in the same manner, the great Asiatic slave-markets of Khiva and Bokhara used to encourage the raiding Turkomans to perpetrate cruelties of a similar kind. "Russian aggression"—"Russian encroachment"—Russian conquest, more than justified, in our opinion, by the position of Russia in Asia, has absolutely put an end to all those enormities; and when we are called upon to feel very angry because Geok Tepe and Merv, dens of the worst of robbers, the stealers of men, women, and children, have been captured by Russian arms, what becomes of our own justification, or of General Gordon's, for the doings which we approve in the Soudan? The storming of Geok Tepe, in 1881, seems to have been, like the storming of Badajos, a terrible act of war, though Skobeleff, a chivalrous soldier, endeavoured to check the rage of his Cossacks, infuriated by a most fierce and sanguinary resistance. The capture of Merv, by sheer trickery and cunning, with a mere show of force and scarcely any bloodshed, was achieved little more than a twelvemonth ago. We must positively decline to entertain sentiments of regard for the independence of the Akhal and Tekke Turkomans, and of indignation at their being deprived of it; because we know that they were, as communities, the plague and terror of Central Asia for hundreds of miles around their villanous nests. If the Sarik Turkomans on the Murghab deserve a better character, it is but a few years or months since they have begun to deserve it.

What is the real amount of the Russian acquisitions in Turkestan, which some of us grudge? A big dismal space on the map. A total population of 6,332,000, including two millions in Bokhara not directly ruled by Russians, and 700,000 in Khiva, and half a million of Akhal and Tekke Turkomans, the wildest race in Asia. A trade monopoly with Russian exports of £1,327,142 to the whole of Asia, in return for cotton, silk, wool, and cattle. A native Asiatic army reckoned at 30,000 on the peace footing, and 80,000 on the war footing. A revenue from Turkestan of £450,000, with an expenditure of £1,400,000 yearly, making an annual deficit of £950,000. It is pretty much what England would gain by annexing the Soudan; though private speculators, contractors, land-jobbers, railway-jobbers, and concoctors of bubble companies might put something in their pockets! What folly is this territorial ambition!

We have brought our historical review down to the "complication" which arose last year from the nearness of Merv to the undefined frontier of the Afghan territories. We consider that, until the question of an actual encroachment on the recognised or reputed Afghan frontier had arisen, there was nothing done by Russia, in the matters above related, which ought to be resisted or resented by the English nation. Afghanistan has become our own affair by the distinct pledges that we have given, and wisely given, to the Ameer of Cabul, that we will defend his territories, comprising Herat as well as Cabul and Candahar, against foreign attack. The Afghans are a very troublesome nation for him to rule; but it is for our interest, as concerned in India, that they should be united under a single firm and competent ruler of their own princely dynasty; it is for their own good, and for the good of some two millions of other races dwelling in the plains of southern and western Afghanistan, whom we hope to see restored, by a less barbarous system of government, to the benefits of civilisation. While Abdurrahman and his legitimate successors continue loyal and true to their engagements with British India, we mean to stand by him, not meddling with internal factions in his country, but holding the shield of Britannia—ay, the British bayonet as well as the sword of India—in front of Afghanistan, at the very "Gates of Herat," in case of attack by another Great Power. Our readers have been abundantly instructed, by the interesting letters and descriptive notes, as well as by the accurate Sketches, of Mr. William Simpson, who has travelled and laboured with Sir Peter Lumsden's Boundary Commission since last September; and they may also have read his letters in the Daily News. These sources of information we know to be trustworthy; and we rely more upon them, from our confidence in the writer, not only as the most truthful of Special Artists, but as an experienced traveller and a careful inquirer, than upon anything else yet published on the subject. The topography of the country north of Herat, between the Heri-Rud and Murghab rivers, the nationality of its present occupants, and the local evidences of its former condition, especially in the remains of numerous thriving towns which must have been connected with the once great commercial city to the south of the neighbouring hills—these appear to be most important elements of the controversy now going on. Mr. Lessar, the Russian official geographer and semi-official diplomatist, who has been endeavouring to convince us in London that Penjdeh and Maruchak, Ak Tapa and Pul-i-Khisti, never belonged to Herat, and must not be supposed to belong to Afghanistan, is sufficiently confuted by Mr. Simpson's Sketches. For there is no doubt whatever that only Herat, the magnificent and wealthy capital of ancient Khorassan, and the prosperous mart of traffic from all parts of Central Asia in the splendid times of the Turkish kingdoms there, could have been the metropolis of such a thriving district as it was on the banks of the Murghab and the Kushk, when for many miles, along the great road to regal Bokhara, towns were built and inhabited, bridges and aqueducts were erected, forts and garrisons commanded the approach to Herat. The assertion that such a country as Badghis must formerly have been—cultivated with admirable industry by its works of irrigation, certainly then populous, and filled with the monuments still remaining of a fair degree of Oriental civilisation—belongs to the Desert and the Turkomans, the most recently conquered subjects of Russia, is an affront to commonsense. We gave some account of Herat, compiled from several travellers' books, and partly from Colonel Malleson's brilliant sketch of its history, in the Number of our Journal published a fortnight ago. It is a city which European visitors are rarely permitted to examine, but its present decayed and squalid condition does not hide the proofs of its supremacy in the past, which is enough for our argument upon this occasion. It is to be hoped that the Russian Government will not be so misguided as to conceive the design of extending its conquests to Herat, seeing that the price of that acquisition, at this moment or at any future time, is nothing less than war with Great Britain.

As for Russian military and political officials on the frontier, there is no assurance that they may not, like persons intrusted with similar functions by other European Governments, prove capable of that kind of folly. It is scarcely necessary here to recite the alarming incidents of the last two months, the proceedings of General Komaroff and Colonel Alikhanoff, in defiance of international rights, of a formal agreement between their Government and ours, and of the courtesies due to foreign officers invested with proper authority; and their conduct in forcing a quarrel upon the Afghans, and causing useless bloodshed without the excuse of war, merits the severest reprobation. On Thursday, last week, the news of this unprovoked act of hostility, as we believe it was, committed on the 30th ult. at Pul-i-Khisti, close to Ak-Tapa, at the junction of the Kushk and the Murghab, arrived in London. It was received here with feelings which have been vehemently expressed in some quarters; but we prefer not to augment the flow of angry declamation, and we trust that the Emperor Alexander III. and his chief Minister, M. De Giers, of whom Lord Dufferin cherished the best possible opinion, will soon disavow, reprove, and redress such a wrongful and disgraceful act. Some apology and compensation should be made to the Ameer, with a proper expression of regret addressed to the Government of our Queen, whose Commissioners were insulted by this wanton breach of the peace in their presence; they have indeed been ill-treated by the failure of the Russian Commissioners to meet them for the joint work appointed. The Russian troops should at once be withdrawn from all the positions which they have no right to occupy; and the work of the Boundary Commission should be peacefully taken up and properly completed; or else the Russian Government should ask permission to withdraw from this undertaking, if it finds any serious difficulties in the way, and let a frontier be settled by impartial arbitration upon the reports of official surveyors on both sides. We earnestly hope that it may not even now be too late to obtain reasonable satisfaction, if the Russian Government at St. Petersburg has no unjust intentions of taking, by force or by fraud, that which nowise belongs to Russia. There is a verse in the Bible, "Cursed is he that removeth his neighbour's land-mark."

The following telegraphic despatches contain the news referred to:—

GULRAN, April 3.

The Russians, making a pretext of a change in the position of the Afghan outposts, attacked the Afghans at Penjdeh on March 30, and drove them out.

The Afghans fought stubbornly, but the day was wet and their muzzle-loaders were ineffective.

Two companies defended one position till every man was killed.

The Afghans retreated in perfect order to Meruchak, and no pursuit was made.

The Sariks remained neutral, but plundered the Afghan camp.

The Russian loss is said to have been great.

The British officers remained till the Afghans had effected their retreat, and then joined General Lumsden's camp.

The Russian Account of the Affair.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 9.

General Komaroff attacked the fortified position of the Afghans on both banks of the Kushk river on the 30th ult.

An engagement ensued, and the Afghans, whose force consisted of 4000 men with eight guns, were defeated and dispersed with the loss of about 500 killed, the whole of their artillery, two standards, the entire camp, with the park of artillery and provisions.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 9 (11.10 a.m.).

The Official Messenger this morning publishes the following:—

"General Komaroff reports that, in consequence of the provocative and manifestly hostile proceedings of the Afghans, he was compelled on the 30th ult. to attack their fortified positions on both banks of the Kushk river. The Afghan detachment, numbering 4000 men, with eight guns, was defeated and dispersed with the loss of 500 killed, two standards, their whole camp, and all their artillery and provisions. The Russians had one Turkoman officer killed and Colonel Nakchitch slightly wounded. Three subaltern officers were wounded. Of the Cossacks and Turkoman soldiers ten were killed and twenty-nine wounded. When the fighting was over, General Komaroff returned across the Kushk river to his former position. When some British officers, who were eye-witnesses of the engagement, but had not taken part in it, saw that the Afghans were beaten, they asked the Russians for protection; but unfortunately the convoy which was immediately dispatched by General Komaroff was unable to overtake the Afghan cavalry, who, in their flight, had carried away the British officers with them."

The Official Messenger of St. Petersburg on Sunday published a telegram from General Komaroff to the Minister of War, dated Dash-Kepri, April 1, in which General Komaroff says:—

"On the 25th ult. our detachment approached Dash-Kepri on our side of the Kushk river. When near the bridge I saw an intrenchment occupied by the Afghans. In order to avoid a conflict, I stationed my troops at a distance of five versts from the Afghan position. On the 26th ult. negotiations commenced with Captain Yate. When the Afghans were convinced that we had no intention of attacking them, they daily drew nearer to our camp. On the 27th, they dispatched against our company intrusted with covering a reconnoitring party, three companies with one gun and some cavalry. Their audacity and arrogance went on increasing little by little until the following day, when they occupied the height which commanded the left flank of our camp. They commenced to throw up intrenchments, established a cavalry post to the rear of our line, and placed a picket at gunshot distance from our ford. On the 29th, I sent to the commander of the Afghan detachment an energetic summons, giving him till the evening to evacuate the left bank of the Kushk and the right bank of the Murghab as far as the mouth of the Kushk. I received a reply from him that, acting upon the advice of the English, he refused to retire behind the Kushk. I then sent him a private letter, couched in amicable terms. On the 30th ult., in order to support my demand, I marched with my detachment against the Afghan position, still counting on a pacific issue of the difficulty, but the fire of the Afghan artillery and the attack of their cavalry compelled me to accept the combat, the results of which are already known."

Mr. Gladstone stated in the House of Commons, on Friday, that our Government were informed by Sir Peter Lumsden, on the 29th, that the Russians were drawn up in force almost within range of the Afghan position, though the Afghans had neither attacked nor advanced, and though Penjdeh was perfectly quiet. The Russians attempted to pass forcibly through the Afghan pickets. Captain Yate met the Chief of the Russian Staff, who told him that they had received no orders to refrain from advancing, which had been promised to our Government on the 17th; and they would give no assurance not to attack without previous notice, but claimed a right to turn out the Afghan posts whenever they might inconvenience the Russians. The attack made on the 30th, says Mr. Gladstone, "bears the appearance of an unprovoked aggression."

THE ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND.

THE DRAWINGROOM AT DUBLIN CASTLE.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES IN IRELAND.

The arrival of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and Prince Albert Victor Edward of Wales in Dublin, on Wednesday last week, has been rather briefly narrated in a part of our last week's impression; and some fuller account of this gratifying event must now be given in connection with the Illustrations that appear in our present Number. Their Royal Highnesses, as already stated, left London on the Tuesday evening by special train, and arrived soon after midnight at Holyhead, where they went at once on board the Royal yacht Osborne, which at half-past five on Wednesday morning steamed off to cross the Irish Channel, and reached Kingstown, Dublin Bay, at eleven o'clock. The passage across St. George's Channel was quite calm, though a north-easterly breeze prevailed. The passage was more than half accomplished before their Royal Highnesses appeared on deck; but they found the prospect so bright as to tempt them to frequent appearances from the saloon, and they preferred at length to remain above. Howth Head was sighted not long after breakfast. The weather was clear, and the sun occasionally lighted up the green promontories and the Wicklow mountains. When Dublin Bay was entered and Kingstown had been sighted, the tall masts and long hulls of the Channel Squadron soon appeared in view, gaily dressed from bulwark to peak with bunting. The vessels in the harbour were likewise decked out with gay banners, which showed in company with the flags of the public and other buildings, which are conspicuous when viewed from the sea. On approaching the Channel Squadron, the Royal visitors were greeted with the strains of the "National Anthem," while the seamen manned the yards, and a salute came booming over the water from the guns of the Belleisle, the guard-ship lying in the harbour. The speed of the Osborne was slackened as she passed the stately squadron, consisting of the Achilles, Northumberland, Sultan, Minotaur, and Agincourt, and steamed round the eastern breakwater and came in sight of the Carlisle Pier, which projects in the centre of the harbour. An immense crowd, most of whom had travelled from Dublin earlier in the morning, had assembled on the pier and the esplanades, and as the Osborne entered the harbour, a hearty cheer gave the Royal visitors an earnest of the kind reception which awaited them.

The Lord Lieutenant, Earl Spencer, with Countess Spencer and suite, were waiting on the jetty to go on board the Osborne. His Excellency was escorted by a brilliant military cavalcade, and amongst the officials who accompanied him to Kingstown were General Sir Thomas Steele, Commander of the Forces in Ireland; Colonel Stevenson, Deputy Adjutant-General; Colonel Buchanan, Deputy Quartermaster-General; Colonel Boyle, Military Secretary; and Major Stopford, Aide-de-Camp. A guard of honour of the Highland Light Infantry, 200 strong, had preceded the Viceregal party to Kingstown, and a detachment of the Royal Artillery had been told off to fire a salute at the East Pier as the Prince and Princess and their son landed. Precisely at ten minutes to twelve, the Lord Lieutenant arrived at the Carlisle Pier, off which the Osborne was lying; and his Excellency, with the Countess and suite, at once went on board the yacht to welcome the Royal visitors. The greeting between the Viceroy and his illustrious guests was witnessed by thousands of persons, whose incessant cheers and waving of hats and handkerchiefs testified to the cordiality of their greeting.

It had been arranged that the Lord Lieutenant and the Countess should precede the Prince and Princess of Wales to Dublin, in order to receive them at the Castle, and the whole party therefore landed, the Royal Artillery firing a salute from the East Pier. The Princess of Wales was escorted to the station by Earl Spencer, and the Countess by his Royal Highness, who expressed his gratification at the warmth of his reception and the kindly feeling which had been shown by the people of Kingstown. At the station, the Lord Lieutenant took temporary leave of the Royal party, and departed for Dublin. In the brief interval before the starting of the second special train, the Princess was presented with a magnificent bouquet by Miss Watson, the daughter of the managing director of the City of Dublin Steam-Packet Company. The Prince was then presented by Mr. W. R. J. Murphy, chairman of the Kingstown Town Commissioners, with an address of hearty welcome, expressing a fervent hope "that affectionate devotion to their common Sovereign and to the members of the Royal family may ever unite the people of Ireland in the closest friendship with those of every other portion of her Majesty's dominions." His Royal Highness handed Mr. Murphy a written reply; and the Royal party, amidst the loud cheers of the crowd, who also, in response to calls, gave special cheers for Prince Albert Victor, then entered the special train, which at once steamed off for Dublin, the visitors being heartily greeted at several of the stations through which the train passed. The Westland-row terminus was reached at a quarter to one o'clock, and their Royal Highnesses were welcomed by a large assemblage, which had been admitted by ticket to the prettily decorated station. An escort of two hundred men was in waiting outside, furnished by the 18th Hussars, the 16th Lancers, and the 1st Battalion of the Northumberland Fusiliers, and the streets along the route taken by the procession were lined by the Grenadier Guards, the Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry, the 18th Hussars and 16th Lancers, the Highland Light Infantry, the King's Own Borderers, and detachments of the Commissariat and Transport Corps. Before their Royal Highnesses left the station, the Prince was presented with an address by Mr. Wigham, the Honorary Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, on behalf of an influential Committee representing a vast number of the Dublin citizens.

This address of welcome contained a suggestion "that it would be a great gratification to her Majesty's loyal subjects in Ireland if a permanent Royal residence should be established in our country, and if some members of the Royal family should see fit to make their home amongst us for some part of every year." There was a reference also to the Royal Commission of Inquiry on the dwellings of the working classes, which was about to hold its sittings in Dublin, and the Prince was asked to give it his assistance. His Royal Highness, in reply to the address, said:—

"On behalf of the Princess of Wales and myself, I thank you heartily for the address you have read to me, and I am very grateful to the citizens of Dublin, who, through you, have welcomed me to their city. It gives the Princess and myself much gratification once more to visit a country where we have received so much kindness, and I regret the length of the interval which has elapsed since we last were in Ireland. I fully appreciate your sentiments of loyalty to the Throne and Constitution, and I will take care to communicate to the Queen your expressions of devotion and attachment to her Majesty. It will give me much pleasure to renew my acquaintance with Dublin, and see the results of the civic and private enterprise to which you refer. The furtherance of the welfare of all classes of the realm is an object which is dear to me, and I trust that the efforts of the Commission of which I am a member will tend to the improvement of the dwellings of those who contribute by their labour to the prosperity of our great towns, and will thus add to their public utility as citizens as well as to their private and domestic happiness. I hope to visit many parts of Ireland, and to see much of the work as well as share in some of the amusements of the Irish people. The kindness with which you have greeted me encourages me to look forward with pleasure to my visit to a country where courtesy and hospitality have ever been the characteristics of the people."

The Royal party were then escorted to their carriages, amidst continued cheering from the people in the station, which was taken up immediately by the crowd outside as soon as the Prince and Princess made their appearance. Traffic in the streets had been temporarily suspended, and the imposing procession at once formed was seen to the best advantage by the crowds who lined the streets. The route taken was through Lincoln-place, Nassau-street, Grafton-street, College-green, Dame-street, and Cork-hill to the Castle. The crowd was densest at College-green, and it was here, significantly enough, that the loyal demonstrations were most pronounced. The Princess of Wales was, as might be expected from Irish gallantry, honoured with peculiar tokens of interest. Her Royal Highness appeared to be in the best of health and spirits, and, as well as the Prince and son, repeatedly acknowledged the cheers of the crowd. The scene was one which few who were present will soon forget. The brilliant escort, the richly adorned Royal carriage, drawn by four magnificent horses, the wealth and variety of the decorations, the kindly demonstrations of the crowd in the streets, and of the people who occupied the windows of the houses and many of the shop windows, made up a picture which could not but leave a permanent record upon the minds of the spectators.

The procession arrived at the Castle about half-past one, and the Royal guests were there received by the Earl and Countess Spencer, and conducted to the State apartments, which had been refurnished and redecorated for their use. Lunch was served shortly after the arrival, and between three and four o'clock they left for the Cattle Show of the Royal Dublin Society, held in the spacious grounds at Ball's Bridge. The Prince and Princess, with an imposing escort, arrived at the grounds, having, all the way from the Castle, been saluted by the people with quite as much cordiality as they were on their entry two hours before. The Princess of Wales wore a dark green poplin of Irish manufacture, trimmed with Irish lace, a bonnet of the same shade, with feather and shamrocks, and a jacket of velvet, trimmed with fur to match. Their Royal Highnesses' reception in the Show-yard was overwhelming in its enthusiasm. The Grand Stand was filled with the fashionable people of Dublin, every seat having been engaged beforehand. A portion of the Grand Stand had been specially set apart for the Royal party, and their carriages were driven round the ground used in the jumping competitions of the hunters. Their Royal Highnesses remained at the Show about an hour and a half, and after a brief inspection of the Dog Show they re-entered their carriages for return to the Castle, the route taken this time being through Elgin-road, Clyde-road, Upper and Lower Leeson streets, Stephen's green, East and North Dawson, Nassau, and Grafton streets, College-green, and Dame-street. The Castle was reached at half-past five, and this concluded the public programme of the first day.

On Thursday, the second day of their Royal Highnesses in Dublin, the Prince with his son personally examined some of the dwellings of the poor in Dublin, and in the afternoon held a Levée at the Castle.

His Royal Highness, with Prince Albert Victor, Mr. Knollys (private secretary), and Captain Hammond, left the Castle about eleven o'clock in a close carriage, which was driven down Ship-street to Golden-lane, a locality which has for years enjoyed the reputation of being the worst hot-bed of misery and vice in Dublin. The Princes entered one of the most uninviting of the large dilapidated houses now crowded with lodgers of the poorest class, and went over the floors, speaking kindly to the inmates, who received his attentions with gratitude. Their Royal Highnesses were next taken through Canon-place and Deane-street to the Coombe, in order to inspect several blocks of artisans' dwellings erected in Reginald-square, by the Dublin Artisans' Dwellings Company, a Corporation formed in 1876, with Sir A. Guinness (Lord Ardilaun) as chairman, for the purpose of providing better accommodation for the working classes. The Prince expressed his approval of the arrangements made, which, indeed, seemed perfect, and expressed the hope that many more such dwellings might be erected. His Royal Highness questioned several inmates of the house with respect to the amount of rent they paid and the wages they earned. The Princes next drove to the Royal Hospital at Kilmainham, where they were received by Sir Thomas Steele, Commander of the Forces in Ireland, who gave orders that the Pensioners should parade in the Hospital grounds. Their Royal Highnesses returned through Island Bridge-road and along the southern quays to the Castle, which was reached a few minutes before one o'clock.

The Levée held by the Prince of Wales on behalf of her Majesty commenced at two o'clock. It was very largely attended, and included nearly all the leading aristocracy of Ireland, with many of the English nobility. The gentlemen were first ushered into St. Patrick's Hall, whence they were called into the Throne-Room and duly presented to his Royal Highness. The spectacle presented in the hall, owing to the variety of the dresses worn by the military and naval officers, Deputy Lieutenants, Church dignitaries, and Judges, was very brilliant. The hall has been newly decorated, and one of its most conspicuous features is the display of the banners of the Knights of St. Patrick.

The Prince of Wales, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor, entered the Throne-Room at two o'clock. In attendance on his Royal Highness were Lord Suffield, K.C.B.; Lieutenant-General Sir Dighton M. Probyn, K.C.S.I.; Mr. Andrew Pepys Corkerell; Colonel Christopher Teesdale, C.B.; and Colonel Arthur Ellis, C.S.I.; Colonel Kingscote, and Mr. Francis Knollys. The Sword of State was borne by the Right Hon. H. Campbell-Bannerman, Chief Secretary for Ireland. The number of gentlemen present was over 2000, and the presentations to the Prince were about 1500. The Lord Lieutenant was present at the Levée, attended by Sir Bernard Burke, Ulster King of Arms; Mr. Courtenay Boyle, Private Secretary; the Earl of Fingall, State Steward; Colonel Caulfield, Comptroller; the Hon. Gaston T. Monsell, Gentleman Usher; Colonel Dease, Chamberlain; the Very Rev. H. H. Dickinson, Dean of the Chapel Royal; Colonel Forster, Master of the Horse; the Hon. Edmund Boyle, Colonel Donaldson, and Mr. John R. Dasent, Gentlemen in Waiting; and the other members of the Viceregal Household.

The Princess of Wales, attended by Earl and Countess Spencer, drove to the Alexandra College, at Earlsfort-terrace, an institution for the education of women, founded nineteen years ago, and, as its name implies, under the patronage of her Royal Highness. The Princess was received by the members of the council, the secretary of the college, the Rev. W. Graves, and the Dean of the Chapel Royal.

The Princess held her Drawingroom at Dublin Castle, when St. Patrick's Hall presented a magnificent sight, with its fluted Corinthian pillars and newly-decorated walls and ceiling, filled as it was with the beauty of Ireland in the most bewitching of costumes, which had kept the milliners of Dublin hard at work for weeks. The crushing and waiting were willingly endured. The Princess of Wales was in a dress of cream satin duchesse, trimmed with gold and silver embroidery, embroidered with gold and silver shamrocks, the constant wearing of which Irish emblem is most popular. Never did her Royal Highness look more charming. Countess Spencer wore a train of azure-blue duchesse satin, on silver ground, embroidered with large bouquets of silver lily, and lined with the richest satin, and her tiara, stomacher, and rivière of diamonds. Lady Osborne was in a train of the richest dark-grey velvet, the Countess of Kingston in sapphire broché velvet, the Countess of Fingall in a Court train of the richest cream brocatelle; the Marchioness of Ormonde was in grey, a colour much affected by married ladies; and the Countess of Meath looked very handsome in violet velvet, but Mrs. Findlater's gold and white dress was the admiration of the sex. The number of the Irish aristocracy and gentry present was enormous, and one would not have imagined the times were bad. There was a large contingent from England, a sudden anxiety to visit Dublin having been developed on the part of English relatives and friends. The presentations of ladies were to the number of between eight hundred and a thousand.

On Friday, at noon, the Prince of Wales, accompanied by the Princess and Albert Victor, and by Lord and Lady Spencer, received various addresses presented to him in St. Patrick's Hall. They were from the Archbishops and Bishops, the Royal Irish Academy, the Dublin Chamber of Commerce, the Royal Irish Agricultural Society, the magistrates of the county of Kilkenny, the Presbytery of Dublin, the Incorporated Law Society, the Royal Horticultural Society (headed by the Duke of Leinster), the Hibernian Academy of Arts, the Methodist Church in Ireland, the Grand Master and Brethren of the Masonic body, and the Academy of Medicine. After the presentation of the addresses, which occupied about three quarters of an hour, his Royal Highness acknowledged them in a suitable reply.

The business of Friday afternoon was laying the foundation-stone of the new buildings for the Science and Art Museum and Library, in the courtyard at Leinster Lawn, and a visit to the Royal University of Ireland, in Earlsfort-terrace, where honorary degrees were conferred on their Royal Highnesses. The latter was a very interesting occasion; the Prince and Princess were received by the Chancellor, the Duke of Abercorn, and the Vice-Chancellor, Lord Emly. Their Royal Highnesses were conducted to their robing-rooms, where the Princess was robed by Miss Isabella Mulvany, a bachelor of arts, and another young lady who, in addition to a bachelorship of arts, has also obtained a degree in music. Dr. Meredith robed the Prince of Wales. Their Royal Highnesses were then conducted to the hall; the Prince of Wales wore the robe of a Doctor, and the Princess never looked more beautiful than when wearing her academic robe, which was made of white silk with pink silk facings. The cap is of black velvet, lined with sky-blue silk, and trimmed with a broad band of gold lace, and has a gold tassel. The Senate of the University were present, and it was formally announced that the Senate had resolved to confer the degree of Doctor of Laws, honoris causâ, upon his Royal Highness Albert Edward Prince of Wales, and also the degree of Doctor of Music, honoris causâ, upon her Royal Highness Alexandra Princess of Wales, and that their Royal Highnesses had been graciously pleased to intimate that they would accept those degrees. The Chancellor then read and presented to his Royal Highness the address from the University, after which the name of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was announced, and the Chancellor conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws. The honorary degree of Doctor of Music was conferred on the Princess of Wales with similar ceremony, amidst renewed and prolonged cheering.

A State ball was held in the evening at the Castle, which was largely attended. The Prince and Princess of Wales accompanied by Earl and Countess Spencer, and attended by their suite, entered St. Patrick's Hall, the Prince wearing the uniform of a field officer. Her Royal Highness wore a dress of bronze velvet draped in gold embroidery and embossed with shamrocks, and a train of the same fabric lined with gold satin and bordered with marabout feathers. The ball opened with a quadrille, in which the Prince danced with Countess Spencer, the Lord Lieutenant dancing with her Royal Highness.

On Saturday their Royal Highnesses went to see the port and docks of Dublin; and the Princess, with a little ceremony, gave her own name, "Alexandra," to the large tidal basin heretofore known as the North Wall. It was "christened" by dashing a suspended bottle of champagne against the edge of the quay, which the Princess did by pulling a cord. They afterwards visited Trinity College, Dublin, where an address was presented by the Vice-Chancellor, the Right Hon. J. T. Ball. At a later hour, the Royal party paid a visit to the Industrial School at Artane. This establishment is under the direction of the Society of Christian Brothers, and is intended to provide homes for boys between nine and sixteen, who have lost one or both parents. About 750 lads are here instructed in trades, handicrafts, and professions. In the evening, there was a State dinner at the Castle.

Their Royal Highnesses attended Divine service at the Chapel Royal on Sunday. On Monday, the last day of their sojourn in Dublin, the Prince of Wales presented new colours to the Cornwall Regiment. The Prince and Princess of Wales, with their son, left Dublin on Monday for Convamore, the seat of Lord Listowel, in the county of Cork. Later particulars will be found briefly reported in another part of this Paper.

The weight of fish delivered at Billingsgate last month was 10,645 tons, of which 7767 tons were brought by land, and 2878 tons by water. The officers of the Fishmongers' Company seized at and near Billingsgate, and on board boats lying off that place, 23½ tons of fish as unfit for human food. Among the fish seized were cockles, cod, herrings (twelve tons), lobsters, mussels, oysters, perch, periwinkles, plaice, salmon, shrimps, sprats, and whiting. The fish condemned at Columbia Market, in March, weighed one and a quarter tons, and at Farringdon Fish Market four hundredweight.

SIR HENRY TAYLOR'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.*

The autobiography of an eminent man is a form of literature which is universally attractive. And such a narrative is doubly interesting when it is the work of a contemporary, and refers on almost every page to men and women with whom, by name at least, all readers are familiar. Sir Henry Taylor is now in his eighty-fifth year, and his greatest work, "Philip Van Artevelde," has been before the world for half a century. He has lived to gain all that makes old age desirable—honour, love, and troops of friends; and has shown how possible it is, while dignifying official life, to win delight and fame in that poetic life which has been dearer to him still. In a necessarily brief notice like this we can but touch on a few characteristic points of a narrative which abounds with suggestive topics and with interesting details.

The boy's education seems to have been strangely neglected; he was never sent either to a public school or college, and up to the age of twenty-three, with the exception of a year spent at sea, he was allowed to dream or to study at his own will. His father, who was a farmer, and a man of large acquirements, lived chiefly among books, and the future poet, having the run of a fairly good library, acquired no doubt a large amount of miscellaneous knowledge. He relates that in those early years he was languid and lazy, lounging a good deal of time away in the stables, whilst his favourite place of reading was nestling among the hay in the hay-loft. At Witton-le-Wear, in Durham, the county of his birth, some years of early manhood were spent, and here he studied or read for some hours daily, and wrote verses "in more or less abundance." The ambitious youth, too, sent an article to the Quarterly on "Moore's Irish Melodies," which was accepted by Gifford. At this time, Taylor had an attack of the Byron fever; but his poetical constitution was uninjured by it. Possibly, his loyalty to Wordsworth in later years did injure him by limiting his range as a poet. His creed, to judge from these volumes, is a narrow one. There are no signs that he loved the earlier poets, with the exception of Shakspeare; nor that he had any appreciation of Dryden or the literature of the eighteenth century. Indeed, the only poet of whom Sir Henry writes with enthusiasm is his friend Mr. Aubrey de Vere; and, whatever may have been his acquaintance with foreign poetry, it does not seem to have exercised any influence on his genius.

At twenty-three, the young poet left his home for London, hoping, like so many other ambitious youths, to earn his bread by literature. He called on Gifford, who was then in a dying state, but gave a friendly welcome to his new contributor. Literature, however, was not to be his means of livelihood. Taylor brought an introduction to Dr. Holland (afterwards Sir Henry), breakfasted with him once or twice, and was then told, to his infinite surprise, that the Doctor had been in communication with the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, and, to quote the writer's words, that "'if my engagements would allow of it,' it was proposed that I should be appointed to a clerkship in that office, with a salary of £350 at once, which it was expected would shortly be increased to £600—the increase did in fact take place within twelve months—and which would ultimately rise to £900. It was abundantly plain to me that 'my engagements would allow of it.'" For forty-eight years Sir Henry served the State, and might, had his ambition been equal to his merit, have attained a high position. He was offered the Governorship of Upper Canada and the Under-Secretaryship of State, but declined both posts. Whatever ambition he did possess was in the direction of poetry, not of politics; and the fact that for many years Sir Henry never read the newspapers, shows his indifference to public affairs outside his own department.

There is no scandal in these volumes, neither is there any idle gossip. Of course, when the writer comes across wits like Rogers, Whately, and Sydney Smith, he has witticisms of theirs to record; but, for the most part, his pages are more thoughtful than amusing. He confesses that he never cared much for scenery; that he knows little of art; his travels, though he went to Italy for health's sake, and once or twice to Holland with Southey, seem to have been extremely limited; and it would appear that, next to poetry, Sir Henry has found in friendship the greatest pleasure of his life. Although he did not marry till he was forty, he loved the society of women and children; and, as a friend said, with a dash of exaggeration, liked any woman better than any man. On one occasion, Taylor met Garibaldi under Alfred Tennyson's roof, and wrote a poem confessing that the charms of a beautiful girl who was there at the time occupied him more than either of the two great men. Here are, by-the-way, some pleasant reminiscences of the Poet Laureate, who spoke once of Jane Austen as next to Shakspeare, and thanked God that he knew nothing of her, "and that there were no letters preserved, either of Shakspeare's or of Jane Austen's; that they had not been ripped open like pigs." Unfortunately, this can no longer be said of the author of "Emma." Many a pleasant hour was spent at Farringford, "the most beautifully situated house" Taylor ever beheld, and it is interesting to think of him as the associate of Southey and Wordsworth in the first half of the century and of Tennyson in the second. More frequent were his visits to the Grange and to Lady Ashburton, whose society, not always to his wife's content, Carlyle enjoyed so much. "With Lady Ashburton's death" Sir Henry writes, "my social life may be said to have come to an end. On looking back to it, I think all that was worth having in it came to me through her." A reviewer of this "Autobiography," with space at his command, might readily fill two or three columns with advantage to his readers. The choice of material is ample, and there seems no reason, save the want of room, why one subject should be mentioned and another left unnoticed. These volumes may not satisfy, nor are they intended to satisfy, public curiosity, but they will richly reward the labour of perusal. We hope, too, they will send the reader to the works which have justly given to Sir Henry Taylor a great although not a wide reputation. One virtue his dramas possess of special value in these days of confused poetical utterance. The poet knows what he wishes to say, and says it so that the reader cannot mistake the meaning.

Before leaving Melbourne, Mr. Blackburne, on Feb. 7, gave a farewell exhibition, playing on the occasion twenty members of the Victoria Chess Club, simultaneously. He won eighteen and drew two, the unconquerable competitors being Messrs. Simpson and Crewe. Mr. Blackburne has since visited Warrnambool, en route for Sydney, and there played a large number of games under the same conditions, and with his usual success.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated May 25, 1873) of Joseph Hilaire Geneviève, Marquis de Preaulx, formerly of No. 89, Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré, Paris, but late of the Château de Pouancé, Maine and Loire, France, who died on Dec. 3 last, at Nantes, was proved in London on the 20th ult. by Alphonse Vincent Victor Dubourg, the sole executor, the value of the personal estate in England amounting to over £70,000. The testator leaves the usufruct of all his property to his wife, for life; and, subject thereto, he leaves various estates to his cousin Charles Louis Alain de Rohan-Chabot, Prince de Leon, and to his god-daughter, Mdlle. Agnes Josephine Marie de Rohan-Chabot; and an estate to his cousin Count Gaston de Preaulx; 400,000f. to his cousin Charlotte de Preaulx; 100,000f. to Viscount Charles de Preaulx; 50,000f. to Antoinette de Preaulx; 25,000f. to the Church Corporation of Pouancé, to provide a salary for an almoner to say a daily mass at the Chapelle of the Château de Pouancé; 10,000f. to the Charity Fund of Pouancé; and many other legacies. He appoints the said Prince de Leon and the said Mdlle. de Rohan-Chabot his universal legatees.

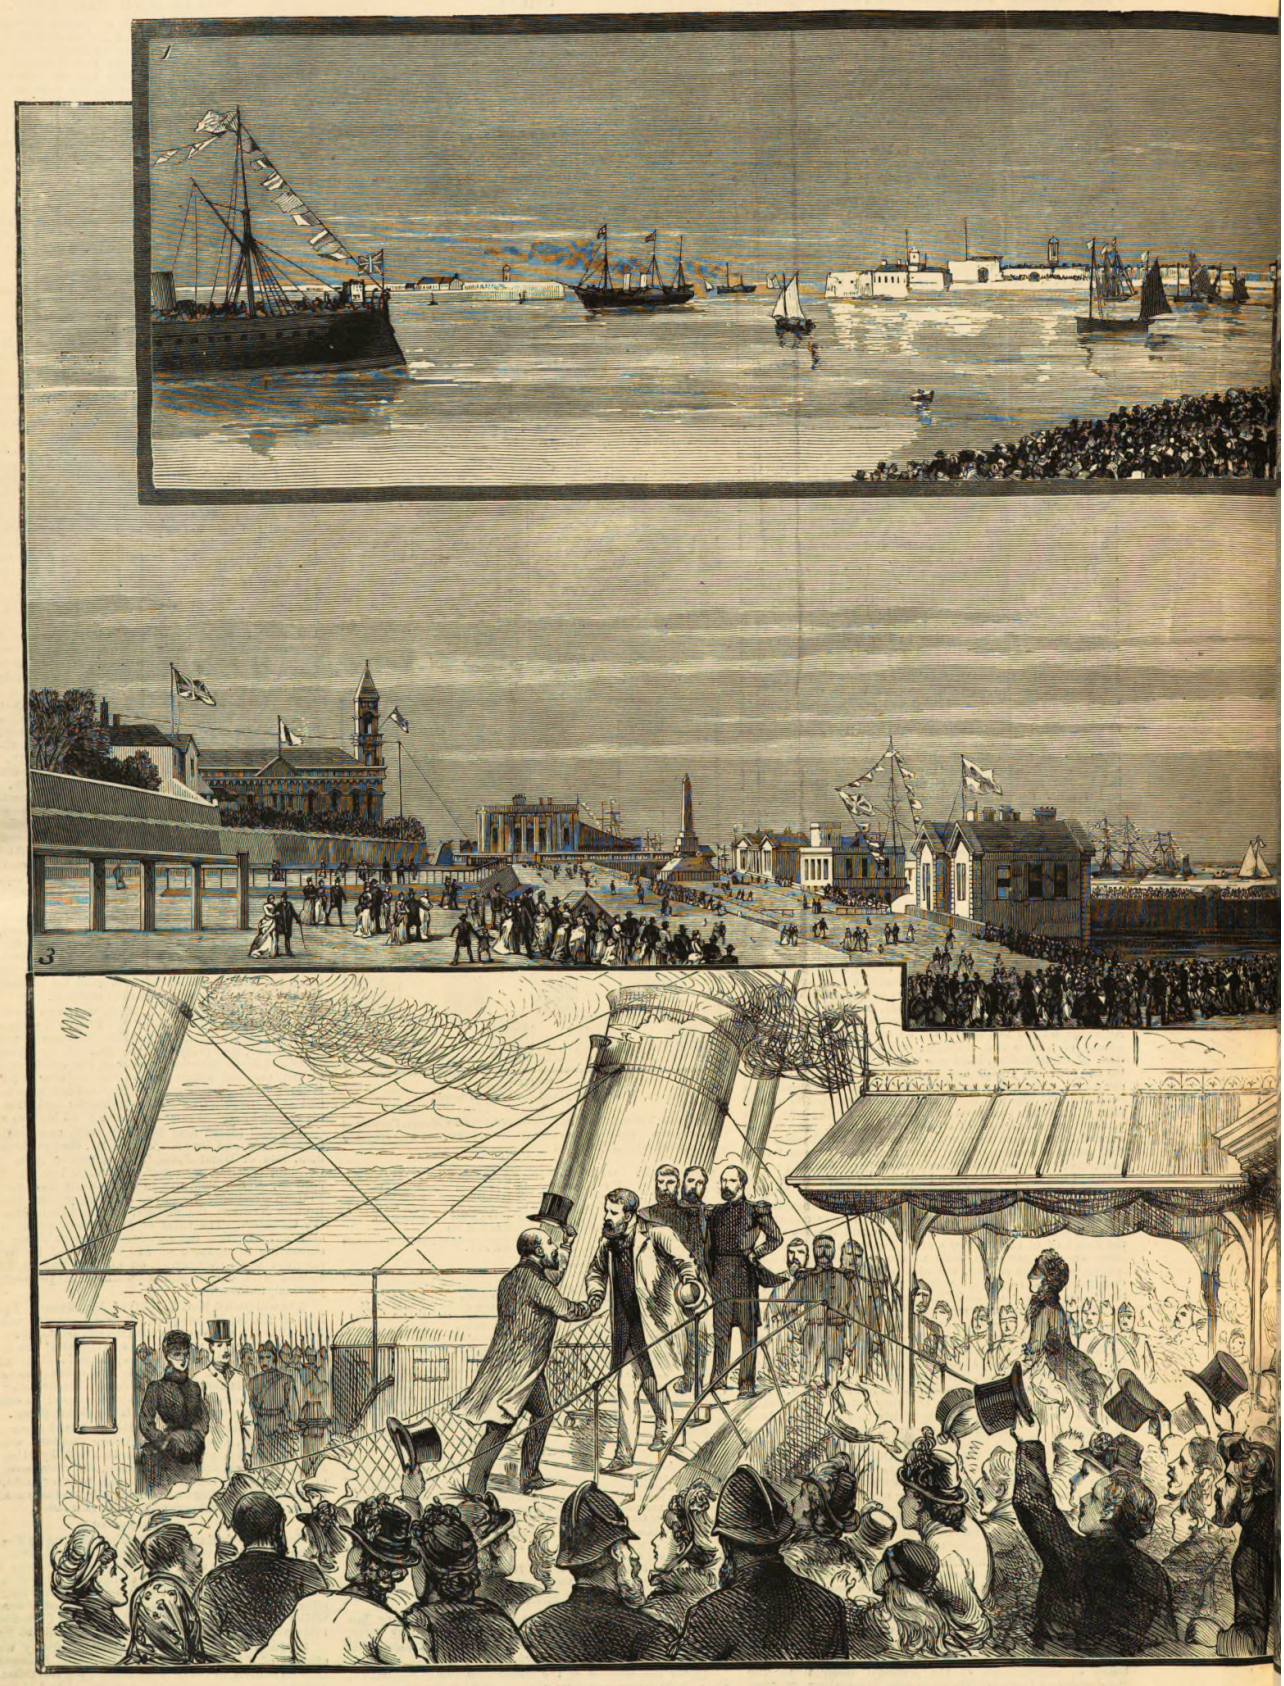
The will and two codicils of Mr. Henry Turner, late of Lisson-grove, and 71, Finchley-road, Hampstead, who died on Jan. 3 last, was proved on the 4th ult. by Mrs. Sarah Turner, the widow, and Henry John Turner, the son, two of the executors, the personal estate amounting to above £95,000. The testator, after specific legacies to his wife and certain of his children, leaves the residue of his estate upon trust for the benefit of his wife and children. The will contains a power for the executors and trustees to make any arrangement they may consider fitting and reasonable with reference to his business, and to allow any capital to remain therein for such time and on such conditions as they shall think fit.

The will (dated June 16, 1879), with a codicil (dated Sept. 10, 1884), of Mr. John Christopher Augustus Voelcker, late of No. 39, Argyll-road, Kensington, analytical chemist and Doctor of Philosophy, who died on Dec. 5 last, was proved on the 13th inst. by Mrs. Susannah Voelcker, the widow, and John Augustus Voelcker, the son, two of the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £84,000. The testator bequeaths £200 to the British and Foreign Bible Society; £100 each to the London Baptist Missionary Society, University College Hospital, and the German Hospital, Dalston; his horses, carriages, furniture, pictures, plate effects, wine and consumable stores, and £500, to his wife; the library of books at his residence and at his laboratory, specimens, apparatus, articles in use, and the tenancy of his laboratory to his said son; and £200 to Thomas Howard, his principal assistant at Salisbury-square, if in his service at his death. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held, upon trust, to pay the income to his wife, for life, and then for all his children, in equal shares.

The will (dated Aug. 5, 1865), with a codicil (dated Feb. 17, 1882), of Mrs. Margaret Lloyd, late of No. 11, Queen's Gate-terrace, who died on Dec. 21 last, was proved on the 19th ult. by the Countess Elizabeth Anne Guidoboni Visconti, the daughter, and John Meurice Edward Lloyd, the nephew, two of the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £53,000. The testatrix makes some bequests of jewellery, plate, and ornamental china to her daughters; and the residue of her personal estate she leaves, upon trust, for her daughters, Mrs. Margaret Maria Attye, the Countess Guidoboni Visconti, Marian Lloyd, Augusta Jessie Lloyd, and Edith Lloyd, and the children of her deceased daughter, Mrs. Bellerina Alice Gosling.

The will (dated March 14, 1879), with a codicil (dated Oct. 19, 1883), of Mr. Francis Alexander Sydenham Locke, of the firm of Messrs. Locke, Tugwell, and Meek, of the Devizes and Wiltshire Bank, late of Rowdeford, Bromham, Wilts, who died on Jan. 7 last, was proved on the 18th ult. by Thomas Abdy Fellowes and Joseph Jackson, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £50,000. With the exception of legacies to his indoor servants, the testator leaves all his property, real and personal, to, or upon trust for, his daughter, Mrs. Katharine Selina Morant, her husband, Colonel Horatio Harbord Morant, and their children.

The will (dated July 13, 1883), with two codicils (dated May 21 and July 30, 1884), of Mr. Charles Lawrence, late of No. 71, Lothian-road, Camberwell New-road, who died on Feb. 26 last, was proved on the 19th ult. by Edmund Lawrence and Jesse Lawrence, the sons, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £34,000. The testator makes specific gifts of freehold and leasehold houses, and of Metropolitan stock, to children; and the residue of his real and personal estate he leaves to all his ten children.

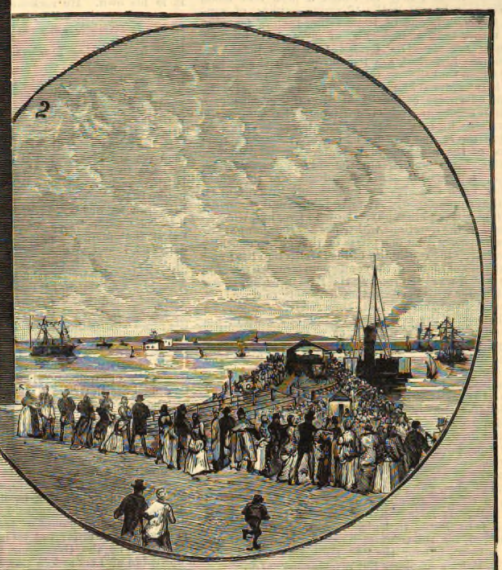


The will (dated Aug. 20, 1864), with two codicils (dated Sept. 9, 1880, and Jan. 9, 1885), of Mr. George Gunnell Newman, late of Hurst Place, Bexley, and of Nos. 75 and 76, Cornhill, solicitor, who died on Jan. 24 last, at Ennismore-gardens, Kensington, was proved on the 2nd inst. by Mrs. Frances Josephine Newman, the widow, the Rev. Francis Browne Newman, the brother, and Cecil Clare Marston Dale, the executors. The value of the personal estate amounts to over £27,000; this is exclusive of various sums of money, amounting to upwards of £25,000, settled by him, at his marriage and subsequently, on his wife and children. The testator gives, devises, and bequeaths all his property, real and personal, to his wife.

The will (dated Nov. 5, 1884) of Mr. Richard Trott Fisher, late of No. 30, Eaton-place, Belgrave-square, who died on Feb. 19 last, was proved on the 12th ult. by the Rev. Frederick Horatio Fisher, the nephew, the sole executor, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £24,000. The testator bequeaths £3000 to each of his late wife's nieces, Frances Augusta Martin and Edith Philadelphia Martin; and numerous legacies to other of his late wife's nieces and to others. The residue of his property he gives to his said nephew.

The will (dated Nov. 28, 1884) of Mrs. Esther Benetfink, late of No. 21, Pembury-road, Lower Clapton, who died on Dec. 11 last, was proved on the 18th ult. by Miss Elizabeth Leng, the sister, and George Evans, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £24,000. The testatrix, after giving some legacies, leaves the residue of her estate, both real and personal, to her said sister.

Her Majesty's staghounds finished hunting on the 10th inst. in the East Berks country, the meet being held at the Royal Hotel, Ascot. The deer, enlarged a short ride from Bracknell, gave an excellent run in the Wokingham, Warren House, and East Hampstead districts, the going for the first half hour and after the check, although the weather proved showery, being rather fast. The Royal Hunt dinner to the Berkshire farmers takes place on Thursday, April 30, at Maidenhead Townhall.



Sir John Lubbock was present on Thursday week at the opening of a Free Library and Museum at Shrewsbury, and gave an address in which he enlarged upon the value of books, and the resources which that Institution placed at the disposal of the labouring and mechanic classes. The buildings, which were formerly the Shrewsbury Grammar School, were declared open by the Mayor, and speeches were delivered by the Earl of Bradford and the Bishop of Lichfield.

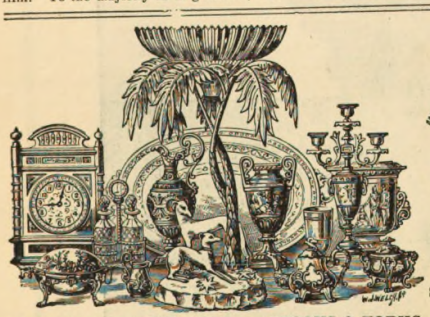
NEW BOOKS.

If the reader be in search of amusement for an idle hour he may be advised not to take up Mr. Walter Pater's two new volumes, Marius the Epicurean; His Sensations and Ideas (Macmillan and Co.). Marius is a fictitious character, but he cannot be said, like the creations of our great novelists, to possess what, with some license, may be called a flesh and blood existence. He is a being, as the titlepage implies, of sensations, and the book is one of ideas rather than of facts, of suggestions rather than of incidents, of philosophic musing, not of definite action. The figures that pass before us, although some are historical, are for the most part shadows, the voices to which we listen are echoes; but in both we discern much which is interpreted in our own lives. The entire absence of humour, of adventure, of love-making, in this account of a young man is in accordance with the visionary character of the book, and explains its sombreness. Marius, who is supposed to have lived in the second century of our era, was for a time in the service of the philosophic Emperor Marcus Aurelius. He has wealth at his command, and the culture characteristic of the period; but neither the outward glory of the world nor the higher fame to which an ambitious youth might be attracted by the acquaintance of men like Lucian and Apuleius, allures him from divine philosophy. How to live, and what to live for—these are the questions which absorb the thoughts of Marius. How he passes from one phase of thought to another, yet without breaking the continuity of his intellectual life; and how, in the progress of his mind, the young man is drawn towards the new faith which was then moving the Roman world, is described by Mr. Pater with his accustomed felicity of style. It was after perfection Marius had been striving when he worshipped beauty, "the perfection of but one part of his whole nature—his capacities, namely, of feeling, of receiving exquisite physical impressions, of an imaginative sympathy, but still a true perfection of those capacities"; and it was the desire after a larger perfection which animated him at last. The road traversed by Mr. Pater is not always a plain one. He who runs over it hastily may not be able to read the sign-posts; but the slower plodding student will be well rewarded. Scenes of the most delicate colouring frequently arrest the attention; and if the writer does not succeed in moving the heart (and the reader is conscious of no regret when Marius dies), he enlarges the range of thought and gladdens us with images of beauty. The way in which the author links that far-off time with our own, and shows how the riddles of that age are by no means solved in this, might almost lead us to fancy that he had lived in both. It is impossible, however, to describe a flavour; and it is its flavour that gives a charm to this book—not for all, indeed, for the volumes have scarcely an element of popularity in them, but for the "fit audience" who listen willingly to Mr. Pater's scholarly but mystic utterances.

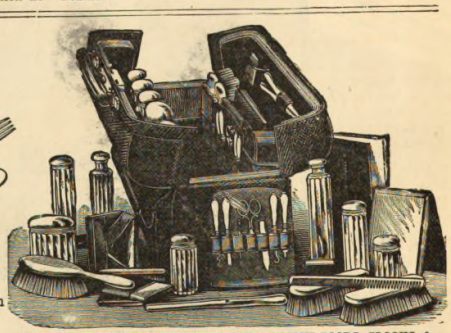
This is the age of newspaper and magazine utterances, and whether readers agree or not with the opinions expressed in Writings by the Way, by John Campbell Smith, M.A., Advocate (Blackwood and Sons), they will allow that the author's trumpet has no uncertain sound. Some of the "writings" were originally delivered in the form of lectures, and these are the most successful; for Mr. Campbell Smith is, perhaps, stronger in rhetoric than in argument. Of Carlyle he is a hero-worshipper, and, we need scarcely add, is by no means a worshipper of his biographer. Most prophets, he says, have an advocatus diaboli appointed for them after death, but it would appear that Carlyle nominated his own by will. "Does the growling dyspeptic tyrant," he asks, "disclosed in Froude's 'Life of Carlyle,' present you with much more than a caricature of the man whose benevolence burns so fiercely in 'Sartor Resartus'?" Then we read that of all the wives that ever fell to men of genius, Mrs. Carlyle was somewhere about the best; that Carlyle is among the greatest, if not the very greatest, literary man of his time, and that the only writings known to the critic that are so little tiresome and not less profound are David Hume's and Sir W. Hamilton's in prose, and Byron's both in prose and verse. But Mr. Smith's rhetoric grows a little unmanageable when, after observing that there was the same restless discontent in Byron and Carlyle, he adds that "the material" in Byron "eddies and laughs, and scorches and abolishes, in the stanzas of 'Don Juan.'" In a paper on Sir Isaac Newton, the attempt is made to place his fame on a level lower than that generally awarded him. To the majority of Englishmen, Mr. Smith observes, Newton's name suggests no definite idea of any kind. "The cultivation of physical science will never secure the highest honours of human intellect, because it does not call forth the highest powers of human intellect. Patience and good eyes are the requisites of that sort of business; accident, one condition of success." And again, we read:—"Of one opinion only do we almost approve in the estimate of Newton's character, and it is his own. He reckoned himself a common man, with uncommon patience." Mr. Smith praises Newton's modesty, which is strange, since in his estimate of the philosopher there is an apparent want of that virtue. On the other hand, the writer's eulogium of Burns is carried to an unjustifiable excess. To praise his genius too highly would be difficult; but, in spite of many fine qualities, the moral character of that great poet merits more blame than pity. Remembering his connection with Jean Armour, with Clarinda, with his Highland Mary, and the date of that triple connection; recollecting, too, how Burns exhausted one of the finest intellects the world ever saw in what, were any ordinary man concerned, we should call coarse dissipation, how is it possible to agree with Mr. Smith that he fought his life's battle bravely and well and conquered, that—"though he fell before noon, he fell as heroes fall"? Burns's own estimate of his character was more truthful. "Thoughtless folly laid him low," he said, "and stained his name." It is a vulgar notion that genius is a full excuse for all moral aberrations, a notion that has done infinite mischief in the world; and in entertaining it, instead of showing our love for Burns, we do injustice to his manly honesty and freedom from cant. A eulogistic notice of the great Scotch philosopher, Sir William Hamilton, will be read with interest. Of his "Dissertations" it is said that no book in the English language of the same size contains so much condensed thought and condensed learning; and "for candour, sincerity, and red-hot logical power" Hamilton is "unsurpassed." We may add that a goodly portion of the volume consists of "Biographical Notices" of well-known Scotch lawyers. Whatever Mr. Campbell Smith writes is eminently readable.

The post of Assistant Director of the Grosvenor Gallery, occupied by Mr. J. Comyns Carr, has obviously suggested to him the majority of the Papers on Art (Macmillan, 1885) of which this volume of pleasant reading is composed. The winter exhibitions at that gallery seldom displayed anything more valuable to art students than the drawings by the old masters, which form the subject of Mr. Comyns Carr's first paper. It may, however, be doubted whether, now that the collection is again dispersed, it is possible to follow in memory the development of technical method from Leonardo da Vinci downwards; but we cannot forget that it was to the exhibition at the Grosvenor Gallery that we owe a juster knowledge of Leonardo's powers. His finished pictures are few in number, and for the most part hopelessly damaged; so that without the drawings lent by her Majesty, Malcolm of Poltalloch, and others, we should fail to do justice to the artist, who was pre-eminent among his fellows in subtle analysis of the human face as the mirror of the mind. In like manner, we owed to Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Russell those Raphael, Pinturrichio, and Signorelli drawings which gave a keener insight than could be otherwise obtained into the processes by which the artists attained their marvellous powers of blending the various elements of beauty into graceful forms expressive of the religious fervour which marked the period in which they lived. In a word, this paper on the "Old Masters" gives a rapid and excellent summary of the guiding principles which influenced the Schools of Italy and Germany in the fifteenth century; and if Mr. Carr would but somewhat prune his style and avoid the temptations of a facile pen, he would offer a practical handbook to both artists and amateurs. Reynolds and Gainsborough, whose works have recently been brought together at the Grosvenor Gallery, in like manner furnish the author with texts for two papers. In speaking of the former, Mr. Carr brings out very clearly Reynolds' love of beauty in the abstract—his constant desire to discover it in all his surroundings, and the fascination exercised by children over his genius. "The art which we profess," said Reynolds at the close of his career, "has beauty for its object, and this it is our business to discover and express; but the beauty of which we are in quest is general and intellectual—it is an idea that subsists only in the mind; the sight never beheld it, nor has the hand expressed it; it is an idea residing in the breast of the artist which he is always labouring to impart, and which he dies at last without imparting." With regard to Gainsborough, Mr. Carr thinks that his farewell words to his great contemporary were the keynote of his artist life. "Gainsborough was content with Vandyck, and with his narrower ambition he escaped the sort of failure that his rival was forced to confess." Of the other two papers—one on Rossetti's influence on Art, and the other on James Barry—we speak with more hesitation, for Mr. Carr tells us more of the influence of contemporary influences on Rossetti than of the painter on his contemporaries or of the lessons he has impressed upon his students; whilst, in the lecture on James Barry, we are told more of Mantegna than of the curious rugged English artist and his attempts to revive "le grand art," of which Sir James Thornhill had been the last exponent in England. Barry's cartoons at the Society of Arts, in John-street, show him to have been an artist who had strong convictions; and the story of his quarrel with the Royal Academy—from which he was expelled—would have formed an instructive episode in the history of English art which Mr. Carr might with advantage have revived.



Nothing beyond a "hors d'œuvre," or "pot-boiler," to use a more homely term, is to be expected by readers who take up Matt: by Robert Buchanan (Chatto and Windus), though the volume contains some notable specimens of the author's powers as a dramatic, descriptive, conversational, imaginative, and humorous writer. But the tale is very slight, and its purport is soon told. A young artist, familiar with the paint-brush, takes it into his light head to go rolling about the country in a caravan—that is to say, about the island of Anglesea, where he falls in with a gentleman, who is morally a villain, with a vulgar man, who is a scoundrel and a wrecker withal, and with a very original young woman, who is a sort of ward under the joint care of the gentlemanly villain and the vulgar scoundrel, by whom jointly, if not equally, she is kept out of a very handsome inheritance. She has her likeness taken, gratis of course, by the young painter, unless kissing is to be considered payment; and what with taking likenesses and kissing and the conversation that would necessarily ensue, the young painter and the young girl get their hearts transplanted, in a manner, into one another's bosoms. Something must come of it, evidently; and by way of helping the something to come, the young painter, assisted by the usual lawyer and the inevitable detective, is instrumental in obtaining for the young woman, transformed into a young lady, justice and the restitution of her rights. That is about all the story, whereof the interest lies chiefly in the manner of telling it; and for due appreciation of that manner the book itself must be consulted.

We learn from the Solicitors' Journal that through the death of Earl Cairns there is now not a single law lord in receipt of a pension as an ex-Lord Chancellor, a state of things unprecedented for nearly sixty years.



The unveiling of the monument, erected by subscription in honour of the late Robert Moffat, D.D., missionary to South Africa, will take place at Ormiston, East Lothian, to-day (Saturday), the 18th inst., Sir William Muir, Principal of the University of Edinburgh, performing the ceremony.

A meeting of ladies, convened by the Duchess of Buccleuch at the request of the Princess of Wales, was held in Edinburgh last week, to form a sub-committee for Edinburgh of her Royal Highness's branch of the National Aid Society. The Countess of Aberdeen presided, and the Duchess of Buccleuch explained the objects of the society. A resolution was adopted forming a large committee, the Duchess of Buccleuch being elected president. Miss Harrison, daughter of the Lord Provost, was appointed treasurer, and Miss Neaves, secretary.

The Conference of the National Union of Elementary Teachers was resumed and concluded at Norwich on the 9th inst. It was resolved that, in the opinion of the Conference, a Minister of Education should be immediately appointed, who should have charge of elementary and secondary education in the United Kingdom, and who should be responsible to Parliament for all Parliamentary grants for educational purposes. It was also resolved that the Merit Grant had failed to fulfil the purpose for which it was intended, had increased over-pressure, and should be abolished, and that a fixed increase in the grant for average attendance should be substituted for it. Next year's conference is to be held at Bradford.

TESTIMONIALS.

The attention of LADIES is directed to the following HIGHLY SATISFACTORY CASE, which is worthy of the closest investigation by all who suffer from these DISTRESSING IRREGULARITIES.

From Mrs. J. HAWKEY, 16, Matilda-street, Barnsbury, London, N., Aged 47, 1883.—"I have received great benefit since wearing your ELECTROPATHIC BELT. Wearing it has improved my health every way. I fail to express in words the satisfaction it gives me. I have not felt so well for years as I have since wearing your Belt. I was under the care of a physician for six months, suffering from the usual irregularities incidental to debility and bad circulation. I was despairing of ever feeling well again, when I was recommended your ELECTROPATHIC BELT. I cannot say enough in favour of it, but I shall be glad to communicate with any lady who would like further particulars of my case."

INDIGESTION AND KIDNEY DISORDER.

From Mr. H. FINCHAM, 58, Lugard-road, Peckham, S.E., Oct. 1, 1884:—"Before I commenced using your treatment I was a great sufferer with intense agony from Indigestion and Kidney Disorder, and had been to many doctors, but could get no relief. Before wearing your Electropathic Belt I must say I had very little faith in it, but I am now completely cured."

TESTIMONIALS.

NERVOUS DEBILITY.

From Mr. W. A. SMITH, 6, Exeter-street, Woodhouse-lane, Leeds, Oct. 23, 1884:—"I am heartily thankful that I ever came to you for advice with regard to my advanced stage of Nervous Debility. I do not feel like the same man I did previous to wearing your ELECTROPATHIC APPLIANCES. I am more fitted for business, for study, and better able to converse than ever before. I have every confidence in the ELECTROPATHIC BELT, &c. You can give publicity to this if you wish."

BRONCHITIS.

The Rev. E. AUBREY, Rose Cottage, 120, Ystrad-road, Ystrad, Pontypridd, writes, Jan. 3, 1885:—"I have great pleasure in giving a favourable report of the Child's LUNG INVIGORATOR, received last October for a little relative of mine who suffered from Bronchitis. It has materially benefited her, and produced a wonderful change in her general health."

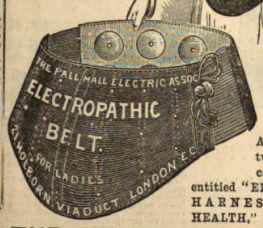
TESTIMONIALS.



INDIGESTION AND CHRONIC DIARRHŒA.

Mrs. C. HITCHCOCK, Brasinfield, Bicester, Oxon, Jan. 5, 1885.—"I am thankful to tell you what great benefit I have derived from your ELECTROPATHIC BELT. I wish I had had one long before I did, and thus prevented so much suffering. I am a great deal better in every way; sometimes I felt nearly dead from exhaustion, and after suffering so many months from a fearfully weak digestion and a very sluggish liver, bringing on chronic diarrhœa until I was almost helpless. I had not worn your ELECTROPATHIC BELT a week before I began to feel stronger, my chest got gradually better, until I may say my digestion is almost perfect; my liver is much more active, and the diarrhœa gone long since. I was so ill and weak I even felt afraid to try your Belt, but it has strengthened me more than all the food I took before, because I could not digest it. I say again, I wish I had purchased one before, and remain, yours thankfully, C. HITCHCOCK."

RHEUMATIC GOUT.

Major PAKENHAM, Longstone House, Armagh, writes:—"Feb. 27, 1885.—I am very happy to inform you that the ELECTROPATHIC BELT which you supplied me with has completely cured me of the Rheumatic Gout, from which I had suffered such intense agony for nearly two years, and I now feel as strong and active as I have ever felt in my life. Several of my friends have, on my recommendation, tried these Belts, and in every case the result has been most satisfactory."

Allen & Hanbury's "Perfected" COD-LIVER OIL.

ALLEN & HANBURYS' MALT EXTRACT

Forms a valuable adjunct to Cod-Liver Oil, being not only a highly concentrated and nutritious food, but a powerful aid to the digestion of all starchy and farinaceous matters, rendering them easy of assimilation by the most enfeebled invalid. It is thus utilised in the manufacture of ALLEN and HANBURYS' Malted Farinaceous Food for Infants. Both it and the Food can be obtained through any Chemist. The Malt, in Bottles, 2s. and 3s. 6d.; the Food in Tins, at 6d., 1s., 2s., 5s., and 10s.

"Is as nearly tasteless as Cod-Liver Oil can be."—Lancet.
"Has almost the delicacy of salad oil."—Brit. Med. Journal.
"No nauseous eructations follow after it is swallowed."—Medical Press.

It can be borne and digested by the most delicate; is the only oil which does not "repeat"; and for these reasons the most efficacious kind in use. In capsuled Bottles only, at 1s. 4d., 2s. 6d., 4s. 9d., and 9s.

THE "HALL" TYPE-WRITER.

Price £8 8s. Weight, 7 lb. Size, 14 by 7 by 2½ in.

The only portable and complete machine extant. Unique in its simplicity.

The "Times" referred to this Machine on March 11, 1884, as follows:—"A new TYPE-WRITER, which is both cheap and portable. . . . A beautiful little machine. Fitted with capital and small letters, stops, numerals, &c. . . . . The manner in which the machine is finished seems to leave nothing to be desired."

The following Testimonials, amongst many others, have been received:—

From W. H. GLENNY, Esq., Madras:—"I have much pleasure in authorising the publication of my testimony to the excellence of the 'HALL' TYPE-WRITER. . . . . Of such thoroughly honest workmanship that the dry heat of the Deccan hot weather, and the dampness of the rainy season, have not had the slightest effect either on itself or on its working. I have carried mine about without special precautions, and have used it in tents in all weathers. . . . . I would not be without my Type-Writer for three times its cost."

From the Hon. F. L. WOOD, Burton-on-Trent:—"I am very much pleased with the machine, which fully bears out all that was said of it in the prospectus."

From S. DUKINFIELD DARBISHIRE, Esq., M.D. Oxon:—"I have very great pleasure in testifying to the excellence of the 'HALL' TYPE-WRITER; it is invaluable to me in my literary work and in my correspondence. I have only had the machine a few days, and I can already print with it as quickly as I can write with a pen."

OUR NOTE-BOOK

With the Craven Meeting, which is the earliest of the seven (sometimes six, and occasionally eight) meetings at Newmarket, and which commenced on Tuesday, horse-racing may be said to be in full blast, though it is seldom nowadays that any of the "crack" three-year-olds opens a series of successes at that meeting. Their best opportunity is generally the Biennial, for three-year-olds (won this year by Gracchus, who won a race last year, but was not placed for the Dewhurst Plate, and who is engaged in the Derby, but not in the Two Thousand); as a rule, however, the future winner of the Derby is beaten (should he run) for that race (dating from 1859), as was the case with Caractacus (1862), Blue Gown (1868), Favonius (1871), George Frederick (1874), and Silvio (not so much as placed in 1877, when the awful weather was supposed to have "put him off"). On the other hand, the winner of the Biennial has frequently won one or more of the great races afterwards in the same year: The Ranger (Grand Prix de Paris, 1863), Ceylon (Grand Prix de Paris, 1866), Vauban (Two Thousand, 1867), The Earl (Grand Prix de Paris, 1868), and Pero Gomez (St. Leger, 1869). The Craven is the youngest of the seven regular meetings at Newmarket, though it is the earliest of the season; it dates from 1771, a remarkable epoch in the history of horse-racing, for then was introduced the Craven Stakes, the first public race in which two-year-olds were admitted to run, though there had been a match or two between two-year-olds or a two-year-old and an older horse as early as 1769, and perhaps earlier.

"Look here upon this picture and on this." The first is a highly-coloured sketch in the newspapers of a "splendid cotton crop in Egypt," so splendid that a testimonial of some sort is to be presented to the gentleman whose "system of irrigation" is supposed to have brought about so satisfactory a result. The second is a portrait of the "Egyptian bondholder," who sees that, notwithstanding the "splendid cotton crop," or "prospects of a splendid cotton crop," his "Coupon No. 17" of the Preference Stock is not only to be reduced in value, as usual, by the more than usual income tax, but is to be still further depreciated by a deduction of "five per cent, as per Decree." The powers that be might just as well have diminished the interest once for all to four and three quarters instead of five per cent. It is all very fine to say that the tax will be taken off and the sum raised thereby will be repaid if it be found that the tax was not or will not be required; but when was such a discovery ever made, before or since the days of Columbus? Taxes of some kind, such as the window tax or another, may be removed; but an income tax, never. Witness the income tax, par excellence: that was to have been temporary, but it seems likely to exist, in an aggravated form too, up to the date of the millennium. Oh! dear.

Musicians, exclusive of Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, and their peers (if their peers exist, or ever existed), appear to be slowly progressing towards immortality. Mr. S. S. Stratton, it is said, has calculated, or has made out a "bill of mortality" from which somebody else has calculated, that the average age at which members of the "musical profession" are in the habit of dying rose from fifty-nine years and five months in 1882 to fifty-nine years and six months in 1883, and to sixty-one years and two months in 1884. Even at this rate, it will be long before most of them begin to live for ever.

The East London Postal and Telegraph Employés may be accounted fortunate. They possess a literary institute, which numbers more than 600 members, and in connection with it a library at nearly every post office where messengers are employed in a district covering an area of fifty square miles. The institute, moreover, has classes for purposes of education, and its members have also a swimming club, a cricket club, and an athletic club. The value of such an institution is, we are glad to see, fully recognised by the permanent secretary of the General Post Office, who says, truly enough, that what we want in these days is more brains and more bone. The admirable example offered by this healthy East London institute will, it is to be hoped, be followed not only in other metropolitan districts but also in the provincial towns. There is no class of men that does its duty more effectively than the servants of the Post Office; and it is scarcely necessary to say, for it holds good in all departments of labour, that by increasing the health and happiness of the men employed, we add to the value of their services.

The sight of a good man struggling with adversity is said to be a spectacle for the gods; what then shall be said as to the sight of a good man (at billiards), like Mr. John Roberts, jun., the Champion, struggling with the spot-stroke against him? This is a sight for both gods and men; and it was to be seen last week, when Mr. J. North, with permission to play "the spot," proved too much by 645 out of 12,000 for the Champion, confined as he was to "all-round" play. The most remarkable thing about the game was that the Champion had four successive chances at the same, or very nearly the same, cannon (not a very difficult one—for him) and missed every time, each time "fluking" a "double." One would have thought that there is no conceivable cannon which the Champion would not make once out of four tries. In fact, he must have been out of form; as was to be inferred also from the frequency with which he "missed cue" and left the balls touching. The question of playing "spot barred" against "spot in" requires adjustment. As at present played between a John Roberts, jun., and a North, to give the "spot in" is ridiculously heavy handicapping. It stands to reason that, to put two players upon level terms, the chances of making the biggest break of the whole series at any point of the game ought not to be always in favour of the player who receives odds; but even the Champion has never yet made, and nobody probably ever will make, as big a break "all round" as a North, or a Peall, or a Mitchell, or another can make, time after time, "spot in." Averages are all very well, and the Champion has before now won by averages a game such as that lately played (12,000 up) between him and Mr. North: still the chances were always in favour of Mr. North's making the bigger break at any point of the game. It seems as if, in a game of "spot barred" against "spot in," the player who is allowed "spot in" ought to be debarred from playing "all round" more than a certain number of strokes (to get "position"), just as the "all round" player is debarred from making more than two "spot strokes" at the most. When Mr. North can make 132 off the red alone at the "all round" game, and more than 600 at the "spot," whilst Mr. Roberts has never made more than about 350 "all round," some idea of the enormous advantage Mr. North has, when he is allowed both "spot in" and "all round" to any extent, may be readily formed. However, Mr. Roberts is so wonderful with the cue, that he may some day make a cool thousand "all round," and astonish both "the natives" and the foreigners.

The "reason why" is often difficult to find, and not always satisfactory when discovered. Naval men are wondering what reason can possibly be found for arming the steel despatch-vessel, Mercury, with ten of the old-fashioned muzzle-loading 64-pound guns, and dispatching her in this condition to the China station. Everybody who ought to know says that there are plenty of guns for the Navy, and everybody acquainted with the superiority of breech over muzzle-loaders fondly imagined that the latter had all been improved out of existence.

It is said that to some of the Portsmouth Dockyard officials is due the credit of inventing what will be the most powerful vessel in the world, though by no means the most expensive. She is to be a combination of fast cruiser and torpedo-boat with a 120-ton gun forward, six heavy breech-loaders astern, six machine-guns, and six torpedo-tubes to enable her torpedoes to be fired in every direction at once. If the Admiralty is only graciously pleased to smile on the designs, she will be built by contract and put in hand forthwith. The sponsors of such a vessel might not inaptly name her "Mischief."

Perhaps the most splendid memorial ever raised to departed worth is the Cathedral, School, and Bishop's Palace erected on Long Island, in remembrance of the late Alexander T. Stewart, sometimes called the "dry-goods' Prince," by his widow. The buildings were begun in 1876, and Mrs. Stewart met Bishop Littlejohn and the clergy of his diocese on the 8th inst. for the purpose of opening them. The Cathedral is pure Gothic, with a spire 207 ft. in height, a magnificent organ worked by steam and electricity, with 158 stops, and there is a peal of thirteen bells in the tower, all of which can be played on by the organist at his ordinary post. The floors are of variegated marble, the woodwork of the richest dark mahogany, and the columns and capitals of bronze. The great features, however, are the hundred and fifty beautiful stained windows which tell the Bible story from beginning to end—those of the nave, transepts, and choir being specially devoted to the Incarnation. The mausoleum, in which there is space for two coffins, those of Mr. Stewart and his wife, is lit by thirteen lancet windows, on which are depicted the scenes of the Resurrection and succeeding days. The cathedral school will accommodate 250 resident and the same number of non-resident pupils, and the palace contains thirty-five rooms, and is furnished throughout in modern taste. The whole group of buildings is surrounded by a park and pleasure-grounds of seventy acres.

Goethe's grandson, Walter, who lived in what was formerly the poet's house at Weimar, died on the 16th inst., at the age of sixty-eight. He was the last male descendant of a family in which, throughout four generations, there was never more than one son, and was a distinguished musician, one of Mendelssohn's favourite pupils. He owned a great many hitherto unpublished works and fragments by his illustrious progenitor, and guarded them as though they had been Crown jewels. It is said that these MSS. will now be given to the world.

There is in Cleveland, Ohio, a School of Applied Science, founded by the late Mr. Leonard Case and bearing his name, to which he also bequeathed 2,500,000 dols. His executor, Mr. Levi Kerr, was drowned when on a pleasure trip a few weeks ago, and it was found that his will left something like 1,200,000 dols. to an only sister, with reversion to the Case School of Applied Science; but the news only came to the poor lady when she was at the point of death, and the educational institution was able to realise its wealth at once.

Speculum is dead—died suddenly, it is said, in his box the other day. And who or what was Speculum? A great race-horse, and a greater sire of race-horses; for, though he did not win any of the "classic" races, he at three years of age won the City and Suburban, ran third for Blue Gown's Derby, and won the Goodwood Cup and Brighton Cup, and he was the sire of Sefton (winner of the City and Suburban and the Derby in 1878), of Rosebery (the first horse that ever won both Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire, which races he won in the same year, 1876), of Kaleidoscope, Lucy Glitters (second to Thebais for the Oaks), Narcissa (who defeated Geheimniss for the Fern Hill Stakes), and a whole host of winners. Speculum was just twenty years old. His life is said to have been insured for ten thousand pounds; but this is quite incredible, as the premium required for an insurance of that amount would have been prodigious.

In a "Note" about Temple Bar last week, a totally wrong quotation was given by some strange accident on the writer's part (as "J. S. M." kindly pointed out): it should have been, of course, "Forsitan et nostrum nomen miscebitur illis."

The Queen has always been remarkably fond of Honiton lace, and has from time to time purchased a great deal for the trousseaux of her daughters. Some very beautiful patterns have been ordered for Princess Beatrice; but it would be difficult for any manufacturer of this delicate fabric to produce a richer grouping of roses than in the Honiton point Princess Louis of Battenberg wore at her wedding.

Southern California is regarded in the United States as the wine country of the future; and so magnificently does the vine flourish in its fertile soil that vast districts have been planted, especially in the San Gabriel valley. The rapid development of vine culture is shown by the fact that in 1848 there were only 200,000 stocks in all California; in 1862 they had increased to 9,500,000, and, according to the latest computation, there are 64,000,000.

The proverbial selfishness of mankind has sometimes been held up for reprobation, just as if women had never been known to exhibit any tendency of the same sort. Over and over again has a man practically bound his widow down not to marry a second time under penalty of losing every penny of her income, and the enjoyment of whatever property he might choose to leave her; but a woman's will, recently proved, is probably unique in this respect, as the departed spouse has exactly turned the tables, and left her husband a handsome fortune on precisely these conditions. It is to be hoped that her example may not be widely followed, for the situation thus created is even more undignified for a man than for a woman. Surely some of our playwrights will take advantage of the incident, and present us with something thrilling in the way of drama.

When Mr. Brewster Darley, of Aldby Park, or Buttercramb, near York, had a present made to him of an Arabian horse which his brother had bought abroad for "a very moderate sum," in the reign of Queen Anne, he little thought, probably, that the animal would some day bid fair to be regarded as the ancestor, in the direct male line, of all the best race-horses not only in England but in the whole civilised world, whose best race-horses are all of English origin. It seems, however, as if the family of Darley's Arabian, which are already in the proportion of about three to one, if not more, compared with the two other great "strains," in the direct male line, would at some future time absorb those of the Byerley's Turk and Godolphin's Arabian altogether; so that the unique marvel will be seen of one horse becoming, as it were, an ex-post-facto equine Adam, the father of all living thoroughbreds (bar pure Arabs) of any account, in the direct male line, whether on the sire's or the dam's side. At present, however, there are descendants enough of Melbourne to keep the memory of Godolphin's Arabian (more correctly Barb) green, and of Gladiator, to say nothing of Bay Middleton and others, to do the like service for Captain Byerley's charger.

Nearly two years ago a meeting was held at the Mansion House with the object of forming Residential Clubs for young men in London. This object was strongly commended by many persons interested in the welfare of young men, and also by a committee of the London Diocesan Conference. A building has now been opened which will be self-supporting, and will provide, to use the words of the prospectus, "the advantages of a comfortable home, combined with those of a club, for young men engaged as students or in professional and commercial pursuits. The terms are moderate, the advantages numerous, and the exchange of a stuffy London lodging for a residence that unites the special enjoyments of a club with the comforts of a home will be great indeed. The Hampden Residential Club is the first building of the kind erected in the Metropolis, but it needs no prophetic power to say that it will not be the last.

Many of the most notable London landmarks have recently disappeared or found fresh localities. Metropolitan improvements, widening of streets, and extending thoroughfares are no respecters of old architecture or interesting relics. The Lion of Trafalgar-square is in the country, the Duke of Wellington's statue is at Aldershott, and Temple Bar is to be relegated to a new home in the Temple. Everyone recollects these, but until last week nobody knew, and apparently nobody cared, what had become of what Sir William Chambers described as "one of the finest pieces of architecture in Europe," the famous colonnade of Burlington House. In the House of Commons, Sir H. Maxwell elicited an admission that the stones had been carted away as rubbish, and were lying piecemeal and neglected in the river mud at Battersea. Here, indeed, is a "sermon in stones." While new public buildings are springing up around, built on Old Gothic and Early Italian patterns, the genuine article itself is disregarded and forgotten. Let us hope that some suitable place may soon be found for what Horace Walpole wrote of as seeming to be one of those edifices that are raised by genii in the night-time.

It is gratifying to note that the statements made to the effect that children employed in circuses were constantly ill-treated has been authoritatively denied. However much a performance may interest us, all the pleasure would go if we thought that the youngsters who took part in it had been trained by the whip. Acrobats have to learn their business, and to begin early in life, so the custom is to apprentice them to a circus proprietor, who teaches them their trade. Certainly it was beyond belief that men stood round a ring with long whips to chastise a nervous youth or one who could not or would not do what was required of him. Of course, if such had been the case, boys would have complained to their parents, who would have taken steps against the offenders. Performing animals, like children, have to be taught by kindness, and it is not likely that people who have passed their lives training unwieldy elephants to ride tricycles, or coaxing horses into walking on tight-ropes, would have recourse to cruel measures with their own species.

It is pleasant to find real though unostentatious worth appreciated by general society, as it has been in the case of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught in India. Military men recognise his Royal Highness as a true soldier; and all sorts and conditions of women recognise his little German wife as a genuine, warm-hearted, loyal lady, whom to know is to love and admire for her sterling qualities.

Culture for the sake of making our lives brighter was the theme of Mr. Goschen's address at Manchester last Saturday. The mere acquisition of knowledge does not necessarily make a man happier; but in the pursuit of it he may gain an infinite amount of pleasure. Englishmen are proverbially prone to melancholy and ennui, and one of the best remedies for these complaints is a variety of pursuits. Of the culture that puts money into the pocket there is no lack in England. Its advantages, to use a copy-book phrase, are obvious to the meanest capacity. On the other hand, the culture that bears no immediate fruit is apt to be despised in a commercial country. Will it pay? what is the good of it?—are, however, questions which no man will ask who is blessed with a generous nature. If the shortness of life and the length of art prevent his exploring vast regions of knowledge, he will dig his little plot with delight, and discover that every foot of progress yields a new joy. Truly did Mr. Goschen say that in this realm the supply is limitless, and that it is a field where there is no need of talking of Malthusian doctrines.

The Russian General Komaroff, of whom we have lately heard so much on the borders of Afghanistan, is the youngest of three brothers, all of whom have distinguished themselves in their country's service. The eldest suffered defeat with his troops, during the Russo-Turkish war, at Zévin, near Kars, and was killed; and the second was brilliantly successful with his detachment at the siege of Atarhan, in Asiatic Turkey, during the same struggle. General Komaroff is a corpulent little man, about fifty years of age, and much beloved by his troops, whom he keeps, nevertheless, in a high state of discipline. In 1881 he was made chief of the Caucasian mountaineers, and stationed at Tiflis for a year and a half. One of his daughters was his constant companion in the military excursions he made from time to time among the mountains. Thence he was transferred to the Trans-Caspian regions in place of General Kerberg, and he has governed those important territories for the last twenty months, regarding the occupation and preservation of the great northern route to India as his special mission.

"Accidents to "strong men," "tight-rope dancers" and jugglers are happily not of frequent occurrence; but a very serious mishap is reported from Newcastle. At the circus there, the Cannon King, who performed the extraordinary feat of catching a heavy cannon-ball fired from a small howitzer, missed the projectile, and it struck him on the head, wounding him severely. The performance was at once stopped, which reflects great credit on the taste of the manager and the audience. Things were different when, some years ago, at Aston Park, Birmingham, the Female Blondin fell from her rope and was killed. Then the spectators continued their holiday-making as though nothing had occurred. It will be recollected that her Majesty was so shocked at the brutality of such behaviour that she wrote a letter on the subject.

Considering the extraordinary increase in School Board accommodation that has been provided within the last few years, it is passing strange to hear that all the six schools in the Hackney district are so full that they cannot admit even one single additional boy. Yet that it is so was asserted by a man who came before the sitting magistrate at Worship-street on the 21st, saying that it was not his fault that his child was not at school, and yet the School Board might come down upon him at any moment as a defaulter. The Hackney district is immensely populous; but either the application is a test case, or people who have hitherto paid fair terms at private schools for the education of their boys are taking advantage of the very superior one given at the Board Schools, and thereby saving their money and benefiting their offspring.

The annual report of the Canadian Minister of Agriculture states that the large number of pure-bred cattle imported to the Dominion during the last five years has already created a perceptible improvement in Canadian herds, and cattle shippers generally are beginning to realise its consequent value. Reference is made to the successful establishment of a number of cattle ranches in the North-West, upon which there are now some 60,000 head, all doing well. Very superior breeds of stock have been taken in—shorthorns, Hereford, and polled Angus—and as the ranches are in a favourable position for the transport of stock by the Canadian Pacific Railway, there seems to be no reasonable doubt of assured success. There has also been a favourable beginning of sheep-ranching in the Canadian North-West.

The effects of the existing depression of trade are clearly shown in the thirty-fourth annual report of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, recently issued. The monthly returns of members out of work increased from 1893 in January, 1884, to 4090 in December last. This was chiefly attributable to the collapse in the ship-building trade, which made a difference to the labour market of £7,500,000. Other countries, however, are in a worse condition than our own, the depression having been universal. The report states that the total number of branches is now 430, as compared with 424 in 1883. The total membership at the close of 1884 was 50,681, being an increase of only 263 on the previous year. The income for last year was the largest in the history of the society, and reached the large total of £157,484, showing an increase over the previous year of £22,835. This was due to a special levy during the year; and it is pointed out that, even with its increased income, the society has been unable to keep up with its expenditure, which amounted to £172,841, or £48,117 more than was spent in the previous year. A considerable proportion of this outlay had been expended in out-of-work support, which had absorbed £59,056. Sick benefit absorbed £27,977, and superannuation £30,519; while special strike expenditure had been very heavy. The total expenditure during the year amounted to £15,537 more than was obtained, but, deducting this from the previous balance of £178,125, the society has still left an accumulated fund of £162,768.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

The disappointment caused by the failure of Westland Marston's play at the Vaudeville—a theatre that should never stray very far away from farce has been amply satisfied by the success of "Open House," the last complete play written by that favourite author Henry James Byron. It was not actually the last comedy on which Byron was engaged, for a half-finished work was secured by Mr. Toole, which will be completed and arranged for stage representation by Mr. J. Ashby Sterry. I only hope it will turn out as amusing a work as "Open House," which, in many respects, is the best comedy Byron has ever written. It has not, perhaps, the sustained story or the mingled comic and pathetic interest to be found in "Our Boys," but if Byron had followed to its legitimate conclusion the train of thought to be found as the basis of "Open House," he would have left behind him an English comedy worthy of the name. The character of Jack Alabaster, to begin with, is infinitely superior as a creation to anything the same author has given us. Byron's characters are, as a rule, clever sketches. This is a well-drawn and well-painted portrait. A more amiable humbug and unassuming liar never stepped upon the stage. He is a consummate scoundrel, but a guileless one. His ignorance of veracity is positively amusing and instructive. He is one of those amiable, selfish rascals who consider they confer a benefit on society by imposing on the innocent and the hospitable. He has a ready excuse for every trick of which he is guilty; and if after all he has not saved his friend's life from drowning, or justified his unwarrantable intrusion, he flatters himself that he has been a very amusing companion during his sojourn at the "Open House"; and here he is not very far from the mark. In fact, Jack Alabaster is a capital touch of genuine comedy, reminding one of an "Old Master" in the comic gallery of painting, and quite distinct from the modern familiar and insolent school of art. The spirit of the character is excellently understood by Mr. Thomas Thorne, and it is interpreted by him with rare skill. He understands the man, and relishes his eccentricities. There is no effort in the actor's art, and he speaks Byron's clever lines with far more point and pungency than the majority of the company, who have had no such opportunity of studying the manner and method of the author's style of wit. It is no small compliment to Mr. Thorne when we seem to hear Byron speaking behind the actor's mask. I alluded just now to an idea of old comedy suggesting itself to the mind during a study of this particular play; and by that I mean that here and there we get the raciness, the pungency, and the full flavour of true comedy spirit. It is just the difference between rare old port and wishy-washy cheap claret. This may be fancy, but I detected it again and again not only in Jack Alabaster, who I am sure will live as a comedy creation, but in the characters also so excellently rendered by Mr. William Farren and Miss Kate Phillips, two of the very best sound comedians on the English stage. It is a treat to get these two together, to watch their expression—in fact, to do what we can so seldom do in comedy, study their art. I am told that art is a hateful word, and that people do not understand it. It vexes them to be reminded of their deficiency in this respect, but if the younger generation want to see how two artists can raise comedy to the level of an art, let them watch carefully the scenes in which Mr. Farren and Miss Phillips are engaged. A sympathy exists between them. They understand their audience, and can do what they like with it. Mr. Farren estimates the value of each separate chuckle; Miss Phillips feels the effect of that marvellously comic solidity of countenance. She is longing to laugh, but she keeps as grave as a judge. What a treat it would be if, with the aid of such comedians, some of the old plays could be revived. We ought to see Congreve's "Love for Love" at the Vaudeville when the first opportunity offers; and possibly Mr. Thorne may feel inclined to give a series of matinées devoted to old plays, not necessarily good because they are old, but impossible to inspire any interest unless they are well acted, which is a very different thing. The company is a capital one, it must be remembered. Mrs. Canninge is now the acknowledged duenna of comedy, Miss Cissy Grahame is attractive enough for the sentimental interest, and Miss Cavalier returns to London even a better actress than she was when playing a long engagement at Mr. Toole's theatre some time back. She is earnest, clever, and forcible. Mr. Crauford, Mr. Yorke Stephens, and Mr. Wheatman, fill important places in the well-balanced cast of a clever play. Dozens of Mr. Byron's jokes have already been quoted; but it is only fair to say that dozens more remain unrecorded. "Open House" is a healthy, honest, and amusing play.

The drama called "Heartless," at the Olympic, is unworthy of serious consideration. In that she has been wholly misrepresented on the stage, Ouida is very much to be pitied. In fact, the play gives a very unfair and prejudiced view of a novel that has many admirers. If it be true that the adapter, availing himself of a flaw in the law of copyright, has laid violent hands on the novel "Puck" and appropriated the outlines of the existing story, then Ouida has very serious grounds for complaint against him. Technically speaking, it may be permissible to dramatise another man's work, but it is an ungenerous act to make such a hash of the drama that it eventually reacts against the reputation of the novel. There are, no doubt, very strong dramatic points in both novel and play; but they are frittered away by an inexperienced workman in stage craft. The story is not worth entering into; but though Miss Florence Wade worked desperately hard to secure success, and Mr. Kyrle Bellew played a mad-scene with vigour, it is to be feared that the fortunes of the Olympic will not be improved by this particular work.

The return of Mr. Henry Irving and the whole of the Lyceum company is one of the most welcome announcements of the summer theatrical season. And the popular manager returns with his head full of schemes for the ultimate advantage and comfort of the playgoing public. Scarcely had Mr. Irving arrived in London before he announced that he had made arrangements by which every seat in the house could be booked beforehand, whether in the topmost gallery or the most distant recesses of the pit. The occupants of pit and gallery are the most loyal of playgoers, but they have justly complained of the weary hours they have had to wait in the wet and cold to see a popular play or player. That difficulty has been at once removed; and the simple trouble of taking a journey to Wellington-street, Strand, will secure for the whole evening whatever seat is decided on as the most convenient. Women can now go comfortably into the pit without fear of accident or danger; and if it be true that there is a "rowdy element" ever anxious to fight to the front, this disagreeable feature of a first night will be wholly removed. The next important revival at the Lyceum will be "Olivia," the charming version of Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield," written by Mr. W. G. Wills, who has, I believe, altered his play to suit the Lyceum stage; but before that, we shall see a series of Lyceum revivals. Best of all, and first of all, will be "Hamlet," in which play Mr. Irving will be welcomed back home again on Saturday week.

Miss Ethel Herbert, a young actress of graceful presence, and who has played in the provinces in the companies of Barry Sullivan and Madame Modjeska, was ill-advised in her selection of the part of Camille in the old American version of "La Dame aux Camélias," in which to appear at a matinée at the Prince's Theatre. She does not understand the psychology of the work, or the temperament of the heroine of Dumas, and she has yet to learn how to manage her voice and to give emphasis to her sentences. But, strange to say, elocution is the very last thing that young actors and actresses think about. It is not enough to look well and to dress well in order to act. The disappointment of awakening from a dream of ambition is, no doubt, very sad; but it is inevitable.

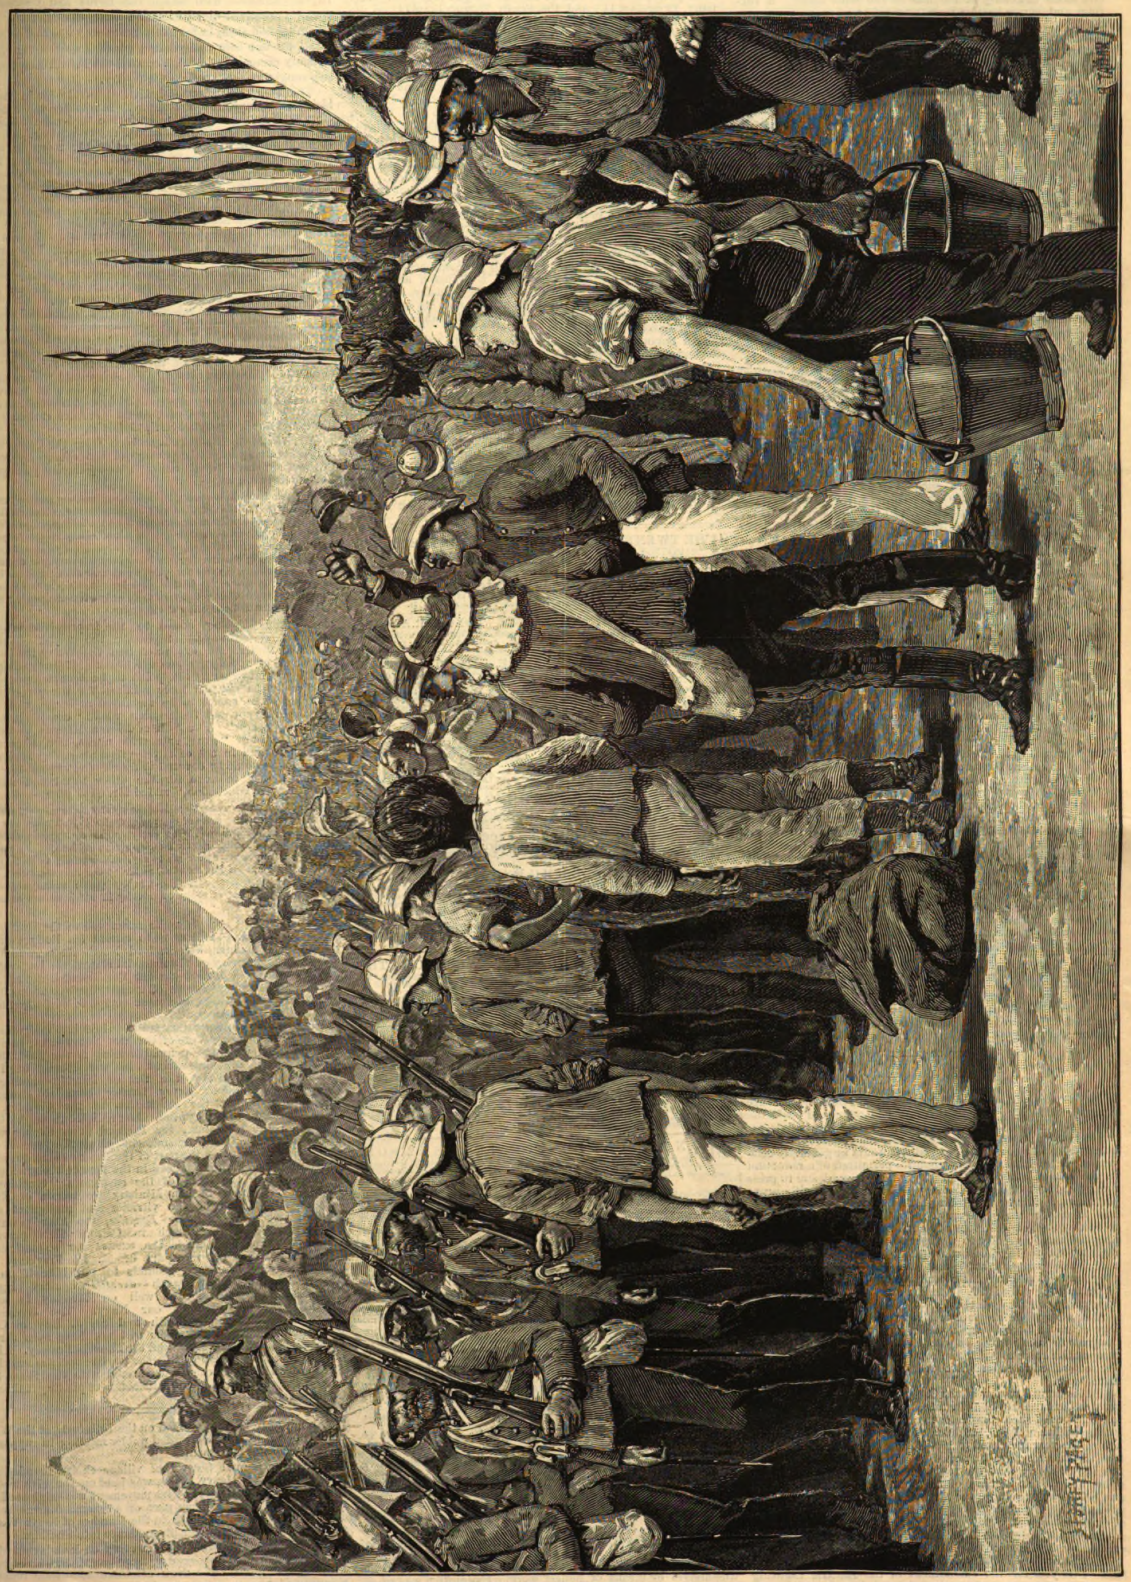
"THE MAGISTRATE" AT THE COURT THEATRE.

It would be uncharitable to suppose that Mr. Pinero, in pursuit of dramatic subjects from life in town, had ever been "run in," and heavily fined in the morning with judicial severity by an inflexible magistrate at Marlborough-street. But if such a thing had happened, Mr. Pinero secured his revenge by producing his irresistibly funny farcical comedy of "The Magistrate" at the Court Theatre. Therein the adroit author involves Mr. Posket, the highly proper magistrate of the Mulberry-street Police Court, in such a network of suspicion and apparent disgrace that he finds himself after closing hours supping in a Soho restaurant, is ignominously driven, in company with his scapegrace stepson, Cis, to seek a hiding-place when the police invade the hotel, dives hastily under a table, only to find his wife, innocently driven by an unfortunate combination of circumstances to find refuge in the same place, evades arrest by a hasty flight and a panic-stricken run half over the West-End, and finally lands in a most dilapidated condition at Mulberry-street to pass judgment on other erring mortals, among them being Mrs. Posket and her sister, and a peppery Indian Colonel. All these diverting entanglements are brought about through the fast habits of Mrs. Posket's precocious son Cis, a lad whom she has been led to underage some four or five years in order that she herself might appear younger in the eyes of her fond husband. Avowedly but fourteen, Cis is in reality nineteen or twenty, and a few years older in experience. Thus, he falls in love with his music-teacher, induces Mr. Posket to bet and to accompany him to the said hotel, whereto Mrs. Posket has also to fly to prevail upon Colonel Lukyn not to betray the secret of her age. In the character-group from "The Magistrate" Mr. Arthur Cecil will be recognised as the luckless Mr. Posket, and Mr. John Clayton in the similarly good part of the inflammatory Indian Colonel. Equally well portrayed are lively young Mr. Eversfield as Cis; Mrs. John Wood as Mrs. Posket, and Miss Marion Terry as her sister with an insatiable appetite: Miss Norreys as Beatie Tomlinson, the sweetheart of Cis; Mr. Kerr in the naturally played rôle of a blasé military swell; and Mr. Gilbert Trent as Mr. Warmington, who ably helps the droll scene in the shamefaced magistrate's room at Mulberry-street.

On the West side of Canmore, in the Canadian Rocky Mountains, two sulphur springs have been discovered a short distance from Banff station, on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The temperature of the water in one of the springs is 73 deg. and in the other 200 deg. The latter one, on the mountain side, is 200 ft. above the level of the valley. Its medicinal properties are very great, and all the people in that district of the country seem to be going to the spring to bathe in it. It is thought that these springs will equal the hot springs of Arkansas.

Mr. George Augustus Sala, who has gone on a lecturing tour to Australia, arrived at Sydney from San Francisco on March 12. On his way thither he called at Honolulu, and made King Kalakaua a present of pictures, which had been intrusted to his charge for his Majesty by Baroness Burdett-Coutts. Mr. Sala's first lecture was to be delivered at Melbourne. The subject he had chosen was "Russia." We hope soon to have—indeed had hoped to receive ere this—from Mr. Sala some "Echoes," the absence of which from our pages must have been observed and regretted. His journeyings will afford abundant topics for his racy and picturesque pen.



The war preparations in the dockyards and military centres continue with increased activity, and an order has been issued from the War Office directing the mobilisation of the Army Reserve.—The Times understands that the price to be paid by the Government for the armour-clad to be built by the Thames Ironworks is £601,000, and that ordered from Sir William Armstrong and Co. £604,000. The engines for both are to be supplied by Messrs. Humphrys and Co., who constructed the engines for the Polyphemus. A lower tender for these armour-clads was made by a firm of acknowledged repute and capacity, and it would be interesting to learn the reason for departing from the usual custom by accepting the higher tenders. The price to be paid for the belted cruisers was £215,000 each for the one to be built by Earl's Shipbuilding Company and the two by Messrs. Napier, of Govan, and £224,000 each for the two by Palmer's Company, of Jarrow.

Indian affairs formed the chief topic of three speeches on Tuesday. Lord Salisbury was present at a great Conservative gathering at Wrexham, which was attended by the leading members of the party in North Wales. Having opened a Conservative Club in the High-street, the noble Lord received an address, in reply to which he contrasted the condition of the country now with what it was when Mr. Gladstone took office. His foreign policy had been a failure, and what was to be a European concert had simply meant that every nation was more or less against us. To stay the advance of Russia was the point which everyone who had the interests of the Empire at heart should aim at. Our hold of India had been rudely shaken during the past five years, and if we did not emphatically reassert our position against Russia, that splendid empire which our fathers had established would crumble away.—Speaking at the house dinner of the City Liberal Club, the Marquis of Ripon hoped that when quiet times returned to India the question of the defence of that country would be considered by the Government. He also thought a united military command and administration advisable there.—Mr. Arthur Arnold, M.P., addressing a meeting in the West Islington division, in support of the candidature of Mr. R. Chamberlain, said that as he had witnessed Russian rule in Asia, he would state his opinions on the present situation. He condemned the views of the "forward" school, saying that if travelling professors and ex-ministers to Persia had been our accepted guides, India would long ago have been made bankrupt by an occupation of a frontier far into Central Asia, which it could not defend. The advocates of the last Afghan war had done much to embitter the minds of the Afghans against us; but the Ameer, who seemed to be worthy of confidence, had grasped the facts of the case. He was perfectly aware that the security of his dominions depended on his holding Herat, and any attempt by the Russians to advance thither would bring upon them implacable war from the whole of the Ameer's subjects in alliance with this country.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN: AUSTRALIAN (NEW SOUTH WALES) INFANTRY MARCHING INTO CAMP AT SUAKIM.
FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. WALTER PAGET.

THE COURT.

The Queen has been much benefited by her visit to Aix-les-Bains. On Thursday week her Majesty, Princess Beatrice, the Ladies Ely and Churchill, General Ponsonby, and Major Edwards left by special train at half-past two for Annecy, twenty miles off, beautifully situated at the foot of the hills and at the extremity of the lake of the same name. A carriage and horses having been sent on in advance, the Queen on arrival drove direct through the town and visited the château and the quaint waterways of the old place, and embarked on a steamer round the lake. Her Majesty and the Princess sketched several pretty villages on the shore. The weather was fine and the excursion pleasant. They were back at Aix at seven. In the evening Dr. Petit, the Mayor of Aix, had the honour of being presented to the Queen. Yesterday week in the morning the Queen and Princess Beatrice, attended by Lady Churchill, drove out. The Princess afterwards walked with Mdlle. De Norèle. Lady Whalley lunched with the Queen. In the afternoon her Majesty received the Colonel of the Guard and Dr. Wakefield. The Queen and Princess Beatrice, attended by the Marchioness of Ely, subsequently went for a drive. Dr. Wakefield and Mr. Louis Darchy and Miss Darchy, of New South Wales, had the honour of being presented to the Queen in the afternoon. Sir John Walsham and Mr. Frederick S. Clarke, dined at Villa Mottet last night, and had the honour of being subsequently received by her Majesty. Last Saturday morning the Queen and Princess Beatrice drove out, and later on the Princess took a walk, attended by Mdlle. De Norèle. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Princess, attended by the Dowager Marchioness of Ely, made an excursion to Chambotte, the drive there and back occupying three hours and a half. M. Pavy, Curé of Aix-les-Bains, had the honour of being presented to the Queen. On Sunday morning the Queen and Princess Beatrice were present at Divine service at the English church at Aix-les-Bains. The Rev. D. Lancaster M'Anally officiated, assisted by the Rev. T. A. Sneath. The Comtesse D'Esclaibes, Dr. Bertier, father of the Dr. Bertier who attended Princess Beatrice at Aix two years ago, had the honour of being presented to the Queen. On Monday morning the Queen and Princess Beatrice, attended by Lady Churchill, walked, and afterwards drove out. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Princess, attended by the Marchioness of Ely, went for a drive. On Tuesday morning the Queen and Princess Beatrice, attended by Lady Churchill, drove out. The Princess, attended by Mdlle. Norèle, afterwards walked. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Princess, attended by the Marchioness of Ely, went for a drive. The Queen and Princess Beatrice have presented Dr. Wakefield with their photographs. The Queen was to leave Aix-les-Bains on Wednesday at three o'clock, passing through Geneva at five. At Fribourg there would be one hour for dinner at eight. Bâle would be reached at midnight, and Darmstadt on Thursday morning.

We are authorised to state that a Drawingroom will be held at Buckingham Palace during the week beginning May 10. The precise date will be announced later.

The visit to Ireland of the Prince and Princess of Wales, with Prince Albert Victor, is chronicled at page 436. Ten thousand Sunday-school children, with banners inscribed with the names of their respective parishes, and all wearing rosettes of the Danish colours, assembled at half-past ten on Tuesday morning outside the Viceregal Lodge for the purpose of presenting the Princess of Wales with an album address, splendidly illuminated. Her Royal Highness replied in a few words, and the Prince also spoke. The children cheered lustily, and sang the National Anthem.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh dined with Lord and Lady Wimborne at Hamilton House, Arlington-street, last Saturday, the party including the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador and Countess Karolyi, the Earl and Countess of Lathom and Lady Florence Wilbraham, the Earl of Euston; Theresa, Countess of Shrewsbury; Viscount and Viscountess Hood and the Hon. Miss Hood, Lord Nevill, Lady Sarah S. Churchill, Lady Randolph S. Churchill, Lady Borthwick; the Right Hon. James Lowther, M.P.; the Hon. Fitzroy Stewart, the Hon. William and Mrs. Gerard, General Bateman, Mr. Stanley, Mr. Du Cane, Lady Emma Osborne and Captain the Hon. D. Monson, in waiting on their Royal Highnesses. Later, Lady Wimborne had an evening party to meet the Royal guests. On Tuesday evening the Duke was present in the House of Lords, and the Duchess visited the Vaudeville Theatre.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught left Meerut last Saturday for Simla, where they remain for a week before returning to Meerut. His Royal Highness will then take four months' leave and proceed to England with the Duchess, but will return to India at any moment on his services being required with the Army. The projected visit of their Royal Highnesses to Egypt and Constantinople has been abandoned.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, April 22.

Money is still accumulating with us, and to in some measure meet the difficulty of securing a sufficient margin of profit the Discount Houses have reduced the interest they allow for deposits by ½ per cent. The Bank rate remains at 3½; but as barely 2¼ can be got on the best bills, it would be generally convenient if the state of foreign politics permitted of a reduction in the official standard to 3. But there is no desire to press upon the Bank of England a step which might speedily prove premature. Money and trade just now wait upon diplomacy, and, it may be added, is very nearly tired of so waiting. Up to Friday last, expectations of an arrangement with Russia had preponderated, greatly to the advantage of prices, but more recently the feeling has been the other way. Consols began on Saturday morning at 97, and business was done at 97¼, but they have since been falling continuously, and at the moment of writing the price is 95. Russian and many other securities have correspondingly declined.

According to a telegram received at the Grand Trunk Railway office in London from the manager in Montreal, some progress is being made in the effort to bring to a close the competitive rates in American railways. Pending negotiations, the recognised rates on Eastbound traffic are to be maintained until June.

In its annual review of the Canadian loan companies which issue debentures in Great Britain, the Canadian Gazette shows the number of such companies to remain at twenty-one; that, by the addition of 435,148 dols., the aggregate paid-up capital has in the year increased to 15,501,478 dols.; that the deposits and debentures have increased 2,310,000 dols., and are now 29,113,000 dols.; that the reserve funds amount to 4,672,018 dols., which is an increase of 285,842 dols.; that the dividends are, with one exception, the same as for the previous year, the range being from 6 to 13 per cent; and that, in consequence of these favourable conditions, the market value of the shares of these companies has been comparatively unaffected by the prevailing depreciation of Stock Exchange securities.

The Board of Trade have decided not to promote any legislation this year for the amendment of the Electric Lighting Act. The time was when an announcement of this nature would have had an instant and marked effect upon the prices of gas stocks, but any fears of the electric light competing injuriously with gas, at any rate for the present, have quite died out. The depression in trade does not, by-the-way, appear to affect the profits of gas undertakings, the Commercial Company's dividend for the second half of last year being 13½ per cent per annum, compared with 12¾ for the same period of 1883; that of the Gas Light and Coke Company, 12 against 11; and the South Metropolitan 14½ on the A stock, against 14½. The last distribution by the Imperial Continental Gas Association was, however, 10, compared with 12; but the capital in the interim was increased from £2,800,000 to £3,500,000.

Owing to the continued interruption to the cable service with South Africa, a meeting of merchants and others interested in the trade with that country has been held, at which resolutions were passed suggesting to the Eastern Telegraph Company that a repairing-ship ought to be provided, so that communication might be kept up by steamer pending repairs; expressing the opinion that a second line, viâ the West Coast of Africa, was imperatively required; and that a memorial should be sent to Lord Derby on the subject.

Brazilian railways are on a similar footing with our Indian lines, inasmuch as both receive a guarantee from the respective Governments, and both are liable to be purchased at the expiration of certain periods. The policy of the Indian Government in this respect has been already treated of, and it appears that the Brazilian Government is following much the same course, the Recife and Saõ Francisco (Pernambuco) Railway Company, Limited, having received a despatch about the purchase of the line. The result of the transfer, if it take place, will be that the stockholders receive such an amount of Brazilian Government stock as will yield the same as is now obtained under the guarantee.

An important advance has taken place in Virginia Bonds in connection with the decision of the United States Supreme Court that the coupons must be accepted in payment of State taxes.

Another breakfast was given on Tuesday morning to unemployed dock labourers at the East-End. Mr. G. Russell, M.P., who defrayed the cost on this occasion, addressed the men, stating that the object of those engaged in the movement was to assist those who were endeavouring to help themselves by means of honest work. Emigration was what they should chiefly look to as the remedy for the surplus labour which existed.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

Without being an alarmist, one may safely conclude that, when the Government take the extreme step of asking Parliament for a War vote of Eleven Millions, we are possibly "within a measurable distance" of the outbreak of hostilities. In the calmness with which the Lords and Commons on Tuesday received the intimation that the Ministry felt it incumbent on them to take this grave step was to be detected that quiet but firm self-reliance which has won for England so many campaigns, and has created the British Empire, never so strongly consolidated as it is to-day.

The Prime Minister and Earl Granville made virtually identical statements on Tuesday. It is under these circumstances only necessary to refer to the important Ministerial declarations in the Commons. In the first place, Mr. Gladstone corrected a report circulated in the morning, and to which Sir Henry Drummond-Wolff gave currency in the House. Interrogated as to whether there was any foundation for the rumour that Germany, France, and Austria had counselled Turkey to close the Dardanelles in case of hostilities between this country and Russia, the Premier replied that "no information has been received at the Foreign Office either from Turkey or from any of the Governments named in the question to any such effect." On this point, I may remark that the adoption of a very different course is not unlikely to ensue from the friendly relations at present existing between the Foreign Office and Musurus Pasha and Hussan Fehmi Pasha, the special plenipotentiary of the Porte.

Mr. Gladstone then referred to the circumstantial despatch from Major-General Sir Peter Lumsden, contradicting on many points the report of the Russian General Komaroff as to the engagement of March 30. The Premier designated it "the painful incident of the attack near Penjdeh"; and emphatically asserted that the despatch would "serve to show how seriously Sir Peter Lumsden has been at issue with General Komaroff on important points connected with that attack." The telegram of General Lumsden certainly bears out the Prime Minister's description of it.

Mr. Gladstone elicited cheers both from the Conservatives and Liberals by an early passage of the speech he read in introducing the Vote of Credit. This significant passage may be quoted verbatim:—

> We have found it necessary to review our military position, not with reference to the Soudan only, but with reference to the general condition of public affairs and to all possible demands upon the military resources of the Empire. We feel that it is necessary at the present moment, in our judgment, to hold all these resources as far as possible, and including the forces in the Soudan, available for service wherever they may be required (Conservative cheers). In these circumstances, the vote for which we are now asking does not include any provision of money for further offensive operations in the Soudan or for military preparations with a view to an early advance upon Khartoum. (Cheers from the Radicals below the gangway.)

The Prime Minister added to the impressiveness of the foregoing statement by repeating the weighty sentence printed in italics. He explained that the Wady Halfa Railway would be completed, and the Sonakim Railway completed for the present as far as the point to be occupied during the summer by the military force retained for the protection of Sonakim. The troops to be mobilised at home, with those released in Egypt and the Soudan, would "constitute a complete army corps." The Vote of Eleven Millions would also defray the cost of "guns, submarine mines, and defences, in addition to and in aid of naval preparations." Four and a half millions would be devoted to the Soudan expenditure, and six and a half millions for the other naval and military charges. "In conclusion," added Mr. Gladstone—

> I can only say that we are sensible of the gravity of the proposal which we now make under a deep sense of our responsibility to the Crown and to the Empire (Conservative Cheers). While we count with confidence on the liberality and patriotism of Parliament for meeting every just demand, our course, it is perhaps hardly necessary for me to say, will continue to be in all our relations with foreign Powers what, as far as our intentions went, it has been already—that is to say, to obtain by pacific means a just and honourable settlement of every controversy in which we are or may be involved (Cheers).

The Vote of Credit is to be submitted to the House next Monday, and Mr. Childers is to unfold his Budget on the following Thursday. Sir Stafford Northcote regretted this delay in the delivery of the financial statement, but confined his objections to a protest against Parliament being asked to spend money and give votes of credit "for operations in the Soudan without a fuller and more complete statement of the policy of the Government."

Every other Parliamentary subject sinks into insignificance beside the momentous Vote of Credit. Noteworthy, however, in connection with the general arming is the Australasian Confederation Bill introduced in the House of Lords by the Earl of Derby, the ties of kinship binding the Colonies to England never having been so strong as they are now. At the solicitation of the Premier, the House passed the Egyptian Loan Bill through Committee on the 16th inst., Sir Richard Cross having withdrawn his Suez Canal amendment. But the likelihood of harmonious working on the part of the International Financial Board of Control is faint indeed in the face of the attitude of Russia, and in the teeth of the suspicious "touchiness" shown by the new French Ministry by reason of Nubar Pasha's suppression of the vitriolic and malignant anti-English paper, Le Bosphore Egyptien, too long permitted to be published in French in Cairo. This provoked suppression has been made the excuse for so unfriendly a communication on the part of M. De Freycinet that Lord Granville has good grounds to put himself on his guard against any French designs against Egypt. Altogether, the House did well on Monday to weigh carefully the condition of our Navy. The serviceable criticism of Mr. W. H. Smith and Sir J. Hay in Committee on the Naval Estimates will not have been thrown away upon Lord Northbrook and Sir Thomas Brassey. I have only to add that, undaunted by the warlike notes around him, Sir Charles Dilke has calmly persevered with the Seats Bill, and on Tuesday night had the satisfaction of piloting it through Committee.

Archdeacon Farrar presided on the 16th inst., at the Whitfield Tabernacle, over a crowded public meeting in support of the early closing movement.

The fifth annual festival of village choirs, founded and conducted by Mr. Henry Leslie, was held on the 17th inst. in the Powis Hall, Oswestry. This movement was originated five years ago by Mr. Leslie as part of a scheme for the better cultivation of the art of music in the Marches of North Wales, and as been extended under his guidance into Cheshire.

The Victoria Institute held a meeting on Monday evening, when the Rev. R. Collins read a paper on "Characteristics of Primitive Religions," and drew attention to several remarkable coincidences in religions which at first sight seemed to have nothing in common. It was announced that Dr. J. L. Porter would read the next paper, on Egypt.

MUSIC.

CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY, DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

"Nadeshda," the new opera composed by Mr. A. Goring Thomas, was produced—according to promise—by the Carl Rosa Company at Drury-Lane Theatre on the Thursday evening last week, and therefore too late for notice by us until now. The book is by Mr. Julian Sturgis, who has laid the scene in Russia, near Moscow, in the year 1760. The plot is of serious character, the chief incidents turning on the love of two brothers, Voldemar and Ivan, for the same serf-girl, Nadeshda—the first-named character having become the master of the girl by the cession to him of the estate of his mother, the Princess Natalia. Voldemar, in his elation at taking possession of the estate, promises to grant his brother whatever gift he may ask on the morrow of their arrival. Ivan avows his love for Nadeshda, and his brother at once emancipates her, so as to put the bestowal of her out of his power. The fury of Ivan leads to his expulsion from the castle. He seeks the Princess, and informs her that Voldemar loves a serf and the honour of the house is in danger. The Princess endeavours to have the girl removed by force, and subjected to the punishment of the knout. Nadeshda flies in search of Voldemar, by whom she is saved; having been previously solicited by Ivan to fly with him. He follows her, and is encountered by Ostap, a serf (in love with Nadeshda), whose jealousy, and resentment for a blow received from Ivan, cause him to stab his rival in revenge and himself in despair. The Princess has obtained a Royal decree for the exile and impoverishment of anyone whose name shall be inserted by her in the document. This she has threatened, ineffectually, to make use of against Voldemar, unless he resigns Nadeshda: but the sight of the dying Ivan softens the Princess's wrath, and she tears up the deed, the curtain falling on her prayers for forgiveness. The book of "Nadeshda" is of a melodramatic kind, and is perhaps of too uniformly sombre a tone; but it offers some dramatic situations and opportunities for musical effects which the composer has turned to good account. Mr. Thomas's music possesses a flowing vein of melody, alternately bright and tender; his orchestration is rich and varied; and he has a strong feeling for dramatic effect, as evidenced in several of the most striking stage situations. In the first act, the most notable pieces are the opening chorus of rejoicing, with intersperséd solo passages—a well-sustained movement—and Nadeshda's air "O river." The second act is the most important division of the work. The love-duet for Nadeshda and Voldemar is full of genuine sentiment, as is the following air for him, "Now is the hour." The choral writing in welcome of the new lord of the estate is animated and characteristic. Some very spirited and tuneful ballet-music comes with good contrast to the prevailing sombre tone of the dramatic interest. The piquant and varied rhythms here employed are happily associated with some excellent dance action, in which Mdlle. Luna is a prominent feature, the introduction of quaint old Russian dances being skilfully employed. Nadeshda's air, "As when the snowdrift," is a charming piece of graceful sentiment, which was admirably sung and enthusiastically encored. An effective quartet with chorus, a declamatory song for Ivan, and some very dramatic concerted music close the second act. Act three is preceded by a very spirited orchestral prelude (which was encored), and opens with a chorus of serfs (returning from labour) in which there is much plaintive charm. Another love-duet occurs in this act, "Dear love of mine," for Nadeshda and Voldemar, a very melodious and expressive piece. The Princess has a solo which well reflects her imperious character; and some effective concerted music, accompanying the escape of Nadeshda and the assassination of Ivan, complete the third act. A well-written chorus, for two choirs, opens the last act, which comprises an impassioned scene between the Princess, Nadeshda, and Voldemar, an effective duet for the two former, and some dramatic music constituting the finale. The performance was excellent throughout. Madame Valleria obtained a great success by her fine singing as Nadeshda, alike in the brilliant and in the sentimental portions of the music. Mr. B. McGuckin, as Voldemar, sustained the second most important character with great effect, both dramatically and vocally. Miss Josephine Yorke imparted full importance to the character of the Princess, whose music she declaimed well. Mr. L. Crotty gave an excellent representation of the vengeful Ivan, and sang artistically; and Mr. Burgon contributed to the general efficiency of the cast by his performance as the savage Ostap. The orchestra and chorus were thoroughly satisfactory, the scenery and costumes excellent; and the stage management, under the skilful direction of Mr. Augustus Harris, was such as Drury-Lane Theatre has become justly renowned for. The performance, ably conducted by Mr. Randegger, was received with genuine applause throughout; and there can be no doubt that "Nadeshda" is a genuine success. It was announced for repetition on Tuesday and Saturday this week.

Several familiar works were repeated last week, Saturday afternoon having been appropriated to Fidelio, with Madame Marie Roze as Leonora, Mr. B. McGuckin as Florestan, and other characters well filled, also as before. Mr. Randegger conducted. In the evening Sir J. Benedict's most successful opera, "The Lily of Killarney," was given with the same cast as heretofore, including Madame Georgina Burns as Eily O'Connor, and Mr. B. Davies as Hardress Cregan. Mr. Goossens was the conductor. This week has been entirely devoted to repetitions of operas recently given.

The closing Crystal Palace Saturday afternoon concert last week brought forward the grand "Te Deum" of Berlioz, produced under his direction at Paris in 1855, not revived in its entirety until 1883, at Bordeaux, and unheard in England until Saturday last. The work is written for three choirs, a grand orchestra, and organ; requiring exceptionally large numbers for its execution according to the published score. Some diminution of these numbers is, however, justified by Berlioz's note to the work. As given on Saturday, it quite realised its impressiveness and grandeur. Of the six movements, the opening and closing portions are the finest, particularly the latter, "Judex Crederis," which is a magnificent piece of music, justifying its composer's expressed estimate of it as being, "without doubt, my greatest creation." An orchestral march was appended to the service music, written by Berlioz "pour la Présentation des Drapeaux." Saturday's performance of the "Te Deum" (conducted by Mr. Manns) was generally excellent. An augmented orchestra, the Crystal Palace choir, and a chorus of boys' voices, co-operated efficiently; the tenor solo, "Te ergo," was well sung by Mr. H. Kearton, and Mr. A. J. Eyre played the prominent and important organ part with great skill. The other items of the programme call for no comment. The supplemental concert, for the benefit of Mr. Manns, takes place this (Saturday) afternoon.

Señor Sarasate, the eminent Spanish violinist, gave the first of four concerts at St. James's Hall last Saturday afternoon, when he played Max Bruch's second concerto, and smaller pieces of his own composition and by Reinecke and St.-Saëns, with his well-known rare executive skill. The concert comprised orchestral performances, conducted by Mr. Cusins. The second concert takes place next Saturday.

The South London Choral Association—conducted by Mr. L. C. Venables—gave a concert at St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening, when a dramatic cantata was produced, entitled "The Last Sigh of the Moor," composed by Mr. C. Thane. The book is founded on the incident of the surrender of Granada by Boabdil el Chiko to the Spaniards, as related by Washington Irving in his "Tales of the Alhambra." The characters in the cantata are:—The Moorish King, his mother, his wife, and a Moorish Elder. The music comprises several solo pieces and choruses, these last being generally the most effective, especially the prayer of the Spaniards. Of the pieces for solo voices that for Zoraida (Boabdil's wife), beginning "Not alone," was perhaps the best. It, as well as the other music of the character, was finely declaimed by Miss Griswold, as was the music of the second female character, by Miss Hilda Wilson. Mr. Iver McKay sang well as Boabdil, and Mr. B. Pierpoint gave the passages of the Elder with good effect. There was an excellent orchestra, led by Mr. Carrodus; and the choruses were generally well sung by the members of the association. The second part of the concert was miscellaneous.

The fourth Philharmonic concert of the present season included the first performance of a new symphony, composed for the society by Herr Anton Dvorák. Of this we must speak next week.

The sixth of Mr. W. Carter's Grand National Concerts at the Royal Albert Hall, last Thursday evening, offered many attractions, including the co-operation of Madame Christine Nilsson and Mr. Sims Reeves.

The Royal Academy of Music gave a students' orchestral concert at St. James's Hall yesterday (Friday) afternoon.

The concert announced by the late Madame Sainton-Dolby was, according to her express wish, not put off. It was to take place at Prince's Hall yesterday (Friday) evening.

A series of twelve lectures on the history of music was announced to be begun by Dr. Helbig at Langham Hall last Thursday evening.

The excellent Richter Concerts will begin a new season (the eleventh) at St. James's Hall next Monday evening with an interesting and varied programme.

The competition for the Lady Goldsmid Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music took place on Monday. There were fourteen candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Ethel M. Boyce.

Mr. Arthur Howell, double-bass player and vocalist, died last week. He was the eldest son of the late Mr. James Howell, principal contra-bass at the Opera for many years. Mr. Howell was married to Madame Rose Hersee. He was for some time stage manager to the Carl Rosa Opera Company, but resigned that post to accompany his wife on an Australian tour. On his return Mr. Arthur Howell resumed his orchestral duties, which were interrupted only by his last illness.

The death is announced of Wilhelm Normann, husband of the eminent violinist, Madame Normann-Néruda. He was born at Stockholm, Aug. 28, 1831, and studied under Lindblad, and also at the Leipsic Conservatory under Schumann. He became Professor of Composition at the Stockholm Conservatory, and conductor to the Court. Herr Normann's compositions consist chiefly of piano and chamber works; but he wrote also a symphony, and an oratorio, "The Kings of Israel."

The Chester Triennial Festival will be held on July 22, 23, and 24. The performances in the Cathedral will consist of Gounod's "Redemption" on the first day; a motet by Bach, an organ concerto by Handel, Dr. J. C. Bridge's new oratorio, "Daniel," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" on the second day; Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" on the third day, and Handel's "Messiah" in the evening. There will be miscellaneous concerts, in the Music-Hall, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings. The solo vocalists engaged are—Misses Anna Williams, M. Davies, and H. Wilson, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Brereton. Dr. J. C. Bridge will be the conductor. The band and chorus will number about three hundred performers, Herr Straus being the leading violinist. There is every prospect of a successful festival.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, April 21.

Paris has had during the past week one of its favourite distractions, a fine crime, un beau crime. A young man cut the throat of an old lady, Madame Cornet, whose service he had just entered in the capacity of man-servant. The old lady lived in the Rue de Sèze; the windows of her rooms on the first floor are visible from the Boulevard de la Madeleine; the crime was consummated in the night, and the criminal escaped with what money he could steal. Naturally, the details of this assassination have thrown all other events into the shade. It is not the crime itself or the victim which seems to interest the Parisians, it is the manner in which the crime was executed, and the person of the criminal. In the present case, this unhealthy curiosity reaches its highest point because the author of the crime, Marchandon, who has been tracked and arrested, is no ordinary scoundrel. He reminds the novel-reader of Vautrin or Rocambole. He lived in a pretty villa at Compiègne, with a woman, who passed as his wife. This lady went regularly to church, and slept in black satin sheets. M. Marchandon was looked upon as an elegant young man, interested in sporting matters as becomes a gentleman, professing Royalist opinions in politics, receiving good society, on intimate terms with a Legitimist gentleman who edits the Conservative paper at Compiègne, and he was even spoken of as a candidate for the Municipal Council of Compiègne. The man, it appears, is a professional thief, who has already been in the hands of the police. He admits having taken part in the robbery of the Rue de Sèze, but lays the crime of the murder at the door of one Anatole, whose address he regrets to be unable to communicate to the police. The coolness and self-possession of Marchandon are delighting the journalists, who fill columns with traits of character of this interesting scamp.

How is it, people are asking, that crimes of violence go on increasing in Paris? Is it because M. Grévy is an enemy of capital punishment? Is it because materialism is triumphing? Is it because science has not yet given a reasonable explanation of the inequality of men, and because the old religious sanction of inequality, with its promise of future compensation, has lost its hold now that criticism tends to affirm earthly happiness as the ideal of existence? Is it simply because preventive legislation is needed? This latter suggestion leads to the remark that a law on récidivistes, or habitual criminals, has been prepared, but the Chamber has not found time to vote, and will not vote it this Session. Why? Because it might interfere with the elections. The habitual criminals, it appears, form an important body; their custom supports a large number of wine-shops and cafés; and if Paris were sadlenly skimmed of its criminal scum there would be much discontent amongst the marchands de vin, whose friendship, it will be remembered, Gambetta thought it worth his while to court. The reason is strange, it is true, and calculated to disgust one with politics. But what can one say about politics after all? Imagine that the Ministerial newspapers, and even a grave organ like Le Temps, find no epithets laudatory enough for two acts of the new Cabinet, which are mere acts of police. At last, we have a firm and strong Government, they say, a Government which has a noble consciousness of its mission, &c. The two acts in question are the tearing down of some posters. This glorious Ministry, by-the-way, is by no means solid, and nobody would be astonished if it fell before the elections. The Union Républicaine group regrets the fall of Ferry, and his rehabilitation is not impossible.

A new ironclad, the Formidable, was launched at Lorient last week. It is the biggest ship in the French Navy, and the dearest, having cost 20,000,000f. It is 340 feet long and 68 feet broad; its armour-plates vary in thickness from 4 to 21 inches; it carries twelve 5-inch bore cannons, and three 14-inch in barbette turrets, each cannon weighing seventy-four tons; it is armed also with eight Hotchkiss revolver-guns; its engines and twin screw will, it is feared, not give more than fifteen knots; its water-draught is 26 feet. The Formidable has been nine years on the stocks, it will take another year to fit her, and the first time she comes into action she might be blown up by a little torpedo-boat that would cost, say, £2000! The French have two other ironclads, the Hoche and the Brennus, on the stocks, still bigger than the Formidable, and destined to cost each 25,000,000f.; but these are probably the last big ironclads which will be built, the modifications of naval warfare requiring now some new type of bombarding-vessel.

New picture exhibitions are still being opened. At the Ecole des Beaux-Arts we have a second exhibition of "Portraits of the Century," which promises to be as successful as the first exhibition of portraits held in 1882. The artists represented begin with David, Gros, Gérard, Prudhon, and Vigée-Lebrun, and come down to Henner, Bonnat, and Caroline Duran. It is a most interesting exhibition. At the Galérie Sedelmayer, M. James Tissot exhibits a selection of his works and a new series of fifteen pictures of Parisiennes in various manifestations. These fifteen pictures, etched by the artist and commented upon by Daudet, Ohnet, Claretie, Coppée, and other eminent writers, are to form a £50 volume under the title of "La Femme à Paris." The title is too ambitious and the publication has scarcely an artistic raison d'être; however, individually, each picture and each etching has considerable interest.

The usual ball given by Count De Launay, the Italian Ambassador and doyen of the Diplomatic Corps at the Court of Berlin, to the Emperor and Empress of Germany, was fully attended on the 16th inst. Over five hundred invitations were issued. Besides the august presence of their Majesties, who have regularly attended this ceremonial reception of his Excellency for many years, there were present the Crown Princess, Prince and Princess Wilhelm, Prince Frederick Karl, Princess Victoria, Prince and Princess Von Hohenzollern, Prince Hohenlohe, the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen, and all the foreign Ambassadors. A family interest was given to the occasion by the rentrée into Berlin society of the daughter of the House, Madame Arthur Van de Velde, who has been for many years absent in London with her husband, a Belgian diplomatist. Madame Van de Velde was attended by her daughter, Miss Yolande Van de Velde.—Prince Bismarck has resolved to apply the residue of the sum subscribed as a national testimonial to him on the occasion of his seventieth birthday, the greater part of which was absorbed in the repurchase of his family estate of Schönhausen, to the founding of a University scholarship for teachers.—The King of Sweden arrived at Berlin on Tuesday, from Vienna, and was most warmly welcomed at the station by the Emperor, the Crown Prince, and Prince William, and conducted by them to the Schloss, where his Majesty stayed for a day or two. In the Palace in the evening there was a banquet in honour of his Swedish Majesty.

The Austrian House of Lords passed the Northern Railway Bill on Monday, and the business of the session being thus ended the President, Count Trauttmansdorf, called upon the assembly to give three cheers for the Emperor. This was done at once most heartily.—Colonel Kaulbars, the Russian Military Attaché in Vienna, has been promoted to the rank of General.—The Crown Prince has gone to Pesth to confer with M. Moritz Jokay and the other Hungarian members of the Literary Commission engaged in preparing the great encyclopædic work on Austria and Hungary.—King Oscar of Sweden arrived at Vienna last Saturday. The Emperor went to receive his august visitor at the station, where a guard of honour with a band had been drawn up. The Swedish Minister, M. Von Ackerman, the Turkish Ambassador, Sadoullah Pasha, and several other personages were present at the reception. When the King, wearing the ribbon of the Order of St. Stephen, arrived, the Emperor hastened to meet him, and both Monarchs shook hands most heartily. The Emperor inquired after the health of the sick Prince Charles. The two then drove together to the house of the Swedish Minister, where the King has taken up his abode. The Emperor remained for some minutes in the apartments of the King, whose return visit he shortly after received. On Sunday a grand dinner was given at Schönbrunn, in honour of the King, who had previously exchanged visits with the members of the Imperial family, and with the Ministers Counts Kalnoky and Taaffe. King Oscar spent Monday morning in visiting the Houses of Parliament and several of the artistic and scientific institutions of Vienna. In the afternoon his Majesty paid his farewell visits, and at five o'clock dined with the Archduke Albert. In the evening the King started for Berlin. His Majesty has presented the insignia of the Order of the Seraphim to Archduke Louis Victor.—Last Saturday, at Buda-Pesth, was celebrated, with great solemnity, the marriage of the daughter of the Minister-President, Von Tisza, Mdlle. Paula Von Tisza, with Baron Bela Radvanszky, in the Reformed Church. The Hungarian aristocracy and bureaucracy and the Parliamentary world were very numerously represented at the ceremony, which was performed by Bishop Szasz.—The Austrian Reichsrath was prorogued by a speech from the Throne on Wednesday.—The town of Wischnitz, which has 6000 inhabitants, has been burning for several days. One hundred and fifty houses have been destroyed, 600 families are homeless, and two persons have been killed.

A musical entertainment, under the direction of Miss Amy Foster, given last week at the Brompton Hospital for Consumption, was warmly appreciated by the inmates.

At the Glasgow Town Council on Monday the Lord Provost handed gold medals to Chief Constable M'Call and Superintendents Boyd and Donald for their clever apprehension of ten dynamitards, convicted of exploding the Glasgow gasometer. The Corporation offered £500 reward; £300 was given to an informer, £100 to a constable, and the remainder to other persons. The money for the gold medals was voted by the Glasgow Corporation.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN: FACSIMILES OF SKETCHES AT SOUAKIM, BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. WALTER PAGET.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN: DESTRUCTION OF TRANSPORT NEAR SUAKIM.
SKETCH BY MR. WALTER PAGET, OUR SPECIAL ARTIST WITH SIR GERALD GRAHAM'S ARMY.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

Our Special Artist, Mr. Walter Paget, with the army of General Sir Gerald Graham at Souakim, furnishes several Illustrations of the military movements in that neighbourhood. The loss of hundreds of camels, mules, and other beasts of burden, killed in the attack on Sir John McNeill's zereba on Sunday, the 22nd ult., occasioned great inconvenience for want of means of transport. The scene of destruction of those useful animals is shown in one of our Artist's Sketches. Other Illustrations are those of the arrival of the New South Wales contingent, which landed on the 29th ult. from the steamer Iberia at Quarantine Island. They were met by General Ewart, commanding the line of communications, with his aide-de-camp. The Iberia was hailed by the sailors of the transports and other vessels in the harbour with cheers, to which the Australians heartily responded. The Colonial troops consisted of twenty-eight officers, 500 privates, thirty-three men of the Ambulance Corps, and thirty of the Artillery, Colonel Richardson commanding the whole. All the infantry wore scarlet tunics and white helmets, with black valises, and carried converted rifles of Henry's patent. The artillery had repeating carbines. The contingent drew up in line two deep on the shore of the island, and was eagerly scanned by the crowd, which occupied all the points of vantage on the piles of commissariat stores. Headed by the fife and drum bands of the East Surrey Regiment and the King's (Shropshire Light Infantry), the Australians marched over the causeway to the camp. The whole route was lined with a mixed gathering, Indians of the Native Contingent, privates of English regiments, Arabs of the town, camel-drivers, sailors, camp-followers, and Greeks, assembled to witness the arrival of the new-comers. It was with hearty enthusiasm that the English soldiers in camp greeted the Australian volunteers. The officers rode out to see the column, the passing camel convoys were halted, and the pickets and guards turned out. Sir Gerald Graham met the Australians, and introduced himself. Colonel Richardson accompanied the column, which, on arriving at the outskirts of the camp, formed line and gave a general salute. Sir Gerald Graham then rode down the line, front and rear, of the contingent, which afterwards formed three sides of a square, while the General made the following speech:—"Colonel Richardson, Officers, and Soldiers of New South Wales,—In the name of the force which I have the honour to command, I give you a hearty welcome. You are our comrades in arms, who will share the perils, toils, and, I hope, glories of this expedition. I am proud to command such a force. You belong to an Empire on which the sun never sets, and every English heart beats with the glorious spirit which knits it into one Empire. We honour the feeling which led you to leave your pleasant homes and war against the Desert and its savage inhabitants. You are soldiers as well as Englishmen, and will cheerfully submit to the privations and severe discipline necessary for the safety of an army in the field. The eyes of our common country, of the whole English world, are on you. I am sure you will do credit to the splendid colony which sent out, and the race to which you belong." Three hearty cheers were given for the Queen, and three for the General. The line was then reformed, and the troops marched off to the quarters prepared for them. The remainder of the New South Wales Contingent, with the battery of field-guns and horses, arrived by the steam-ship Australasian on the next day. We give an Illustration of the departure of these colonial troops from Sydney, New South Wales, in the presence of the Governor, Lord Augustus Loftus, the Hon. W. B. Dalley, acting Prime Minister, and an enthusiastic assembly of the townspeople of Sydney.

General Graham's force has passed from the occupation of making long marches, engaging in sanguinary skirmishes, and escorting convoys through the bush, to that of protecting the construction of the railway. Locomotives now run from the port to zereba No. 1, six miles from Souakim, and the line is thence being slowly but steadily pushed forward to Handoub, four miles further. At Handoub are the Coldstreams, the Scots Guards, the Australians, some Mounted Infantry, two guns, and the 5th Lancers. The heights near the zereba at Handoub are fortified; and there is abundance of water to be found eighteen inches below the surface of the ground. The quality is, however, said to be brackish. A portion of the Berkshire Regiment occupy post No. 1, and the Shropshire and East Surrey guard the head of the line, which is completed to one mile and a half beyond No. 1 blockhouse. A battalion with cavalry en vedette protects the constructing party: the battalion first detached for that duty was the Grenadiers. The main camp, containing the Berkshires and Marines, is at the western redoubt, two miles from the town, and there are troops also in Souakim itself, and the outlying works. The health of the troops is wonderfully good, considering the heat of the climate and all the toil they have gone through. According to Sir Gerald Graham's last despatch the sick were only four per cent. The ladies of the Medical Nursing Staff, indeed, are ready for any work that may be imposed upon them in the tending of sick or wounded. The attitude of the enemy is singularly peaceful. None can be now seen hanging about; the road through the bush from Handoub to Souakim is safe, and the officers are amusing themselves by shooting sand-grouse. Even the advanced troops are now free from the harassing long-range fire in which till quite lately the Arabs used to indulge, especially at night. A later incident in the campaign was an expedition last week by the mounted infantry from Handoub through the hills beyond Hasheen to Deberet. The result was the capture without resistance of forty men, women, and children, evidently on their way to join Osman Digna, together with twelve camels and five hundred sheep. A further advance has been made westward, extending to Tambuk, which was reached on Sunday last by General Graham's forces, and is now held by the Scots Guards and a company of the Royal Engineers, with two guns. Tambuk will be fortified as an advanced post, while Otao, in the "wady" or valley to the north-east of that place, is held by the Coldstream Guards and Mounted Infantry. Sir Gerald Graham, in his despatch of last Sunday evening, says, "The position at both places is strong, and there are no signs of the enemy. The health of the troops is excellent. The water supply at Otao is abundant, and of fair quality; it does not taste brackish, but I will get an analysis. At Tambuk only six hundred gallons a day can at present be got from wells, but engineers think the supply may be improved. It is, however, five feet lower than was found last year. Boring is stopped by rock at ten feet. The country presents no obstacles for a railway beyond dry water-courses. Near Tambuk is a deep water-course, with bank over twenty feet high; the bed of valley is flat, covered with loose rock and bush, bounded by basalt and granite hills; occasional high rocks appear in the bed of the valley, which the railway can wind round. Beyond Tambuk the line enters the hills, and for twenty miles there is no water."

The Arabs in the country north of Souakim, hearing of the reverses suffered by Osman Digna, and fearing to be cut off by the British advance, have moved southwards. A party of four hundred of them, on Monday, passed to the west of the position at Tambuk, to rejoin the force at Tamanieb, and the whole district to the north of Souakim is now quite clear of them.

From Dongola it is reported that the thermometer registered 112 degrees in the shade on Monday. A correspondent whom we have before mentioned, W. S. Perry, a private in the 1st Life Guards, who volunteered for the Camel Corps in Lord Wolseley's army, sends us two Sketches of his comrades building huts, at a place called Hafir, on the Nile. These huts are constructed of matting, stretched over a light framework of bamboo poles; he calls them rather humorously "charming semi-detached villas" and "eligible summer residences." It is probable that they will soon be "to let," for the army on the Upper Nile is likely to be recalled, since the idea of an advance to Khartoum seems now to be quite abandoned.

One of our Artist's Sketches represents a gang of Indian "coolies" at work on the line of railway now under construction from Souakim to the hill country inland, a line which will now probably not be extended to Berber. A brief description of the country through which Messrs. Lucas and Aird, the contractors, are making this railway will be of interest at the present time. The line starts from Souakim at the wells, three kilomètres inland, which supply the town with water. Behind are the town and the sea; before and around stretches a smooth and level plain covered with gravel and small blocks of stone. In front extends a range of hills, closing in the whole western horizon. For fifteen kilomètres the path lies over the gravel plain, with small acacia-bushes scattered here and there; then it passes a high spur, the first of the "foothills," and reaches Bir Handoub—the wells of Handoub—a watering-place in a rocky waste littered with the débris of many caravans. Eight kilomètres further, over a gravelly level, more and more encircled by hills, bring the line to Wady Otao; and here the mountains are entered. On either side appear steep crags; in front are ridges rising about 400 mètres, with sharp slopes and rugged lines. The wady is a mere boulder bed, with sandy loam in the wider parts, which maintains a few small thorn-trees. Ten kilomètres onward, Wady Sinkat opens, walled in by high and broken hills, but not quite destitute of vegetation, though there is sometimes no rain here for two years. Eight kilomètres further on, this wady narrows to a defile, and twelve more carry the track to a point where the valley has its greatest elevation, of about 1000 ft. Here is the highland fortress of Sinkat, of painful memory, where Tewfik Bey lost his life and the lives of his men. The road now descends a little into Wady Mareg—the Crooked Vale—where the hills widen out for about ten kilomètres, to close in again, and then to wind among hill-spurs, confused peaks and ridges and bare mountain sides, to the mouth of Wady Ahmed. This is seventy-six kilomètres from Souakim, or nearly fifty miles. It is a broad gravelly "strath," with blocks of trap and porphyry lying about, and a few trees dotting the hollows, where sometimes even a little doura is grown. The road continues plain and easy here for twenty kilomètres, till a sudden steep pass, piercing a high ridge, leads from Wady Ahmed to Wady Haratree. There is at this point a long avenue of sont-trees or acacias, and passing through them five kilomètres brings us to a broad and barren upland, with some burned herbage and dragon-trees. Beyond that plain lies Bir Salalant, 119 kilomètres from Souakim, with two large wells. Again, the "foothills" shut in the path, which passes by Wady Habal, a treeless glen, strewn with vast blocks of trap, and leading into the Wady Kokreb. It is fourteen kilomètres through this valley; but the road then emerges from the hills, and goes over level hard ground, past detached rocks and granite knolls, through the Wady Yumga to the oasis of Ariab. The distance from Ariab to Berber is a hundred and ten miles, through a level country, but a stony desert with hardly any water for most of that distance. It appears, however, from the statements of Mr. Gladstone and Lord Granville in Parliament on Tuesday, that the railway will be made only up to those positions, on the hills near Souakim, which are to be occupied by the garrison troops in the hot season, for the sake of their health.

We have engraved the Portraits of three gallant officers whose deaths are to be lamented—namely, Viscount Avonmore (the Right Hon. Barry Nugent Yelverton), who was a Lieutenant of the 1st battalion of the Hampshire Regiment, and had passed the Royal Military College at Sandhurst; Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel A. E. Arengo Cross, of the Gordon Highlanders; and Lieutenant Alexander T. F. Edwards, of the 2nd battalion 18th Royal Irish, the same regiment in which his father, the late General C. A. Edwards, C.B., had served twenty-six years. Lieutenant Edwards, who was in the twenty-fourth year of his age, was in India as a probationer for the Staff Corps, when he volunteered to join the 28th Bombay Native Infantry for the Soudan Expedition. He received his mortal wound on the 22nd ult., in the conflict at the zereba, and died next day.

In London last week 2617 births and 1703 deaths were registered. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 101, and the deaths were 111, below the average numbers in the corresponding weeks of the last ten years. The deaths included 41 from smallpox, 92 from measles, 21 from diphtheria, 46 from whooping-cough, 7 from dysentery, and from diseases of the respiratory organs 449.

The Mayor of Cambridge presided on Tuesday at the annual election of inmates of the Eastern Counties Asylum for Idiots, and there was afterwards a public meeting in the Guildhall, at which the Vice-Chancellor presided. The speakers included the High Sheriff, the Mayor, the Master of Christ's, the Master of Peterhouse, Admiral Luard, Colonel Rowley, Rev. Dr. Campion, Dr. Fawcett, Mr. Charles Balls, and Mr. Swann Hurrell. It was decided to raise a fund of a thousand guineas in the University, town, and county, for the purpose of establishing a "Cambridgeshire Ward" in the new building of the institution at Colchester. The High Sheriff (Mr. Carberry Evans) gave fifty guineas towards this object, and several other promises were announced.

In the Upper House of the Convocation of York on Tuesday, the Bishop of Manchester moved a resolution for considering and defining what should be the relations between the Bishops and any branch of the Church Army which might be established. The Bishop of Manchester contended that some such movement was necessary, inasmuch as the existing agencies of the Church did not effectually reach the great mass of the people. The proposal met with general approval, and, on the suggestion of the Archbishop, a committee of the whole House was formed to consider the question. The Bishop of Ripon moved a resolution with the object of establishing clerical pension funds, which, after discussion, was adopted. The Archbishop next moved a resolution affirming the desirability of securing uniformity of practice with reference to the consecration of burial-grounds, and detailed a scheme of his own whereby the cost of consecration might be reduced from £15 to £3. In the Lower House, the Rev. Canon Ware presented a petition from the clergy of the diocese of Carlisle, expressing regret at the legal proceedings instituted against the Incumbent of St. Margaret's, Liverpool. The members then discussed the question of lay agency in the Church.

OBITUARY.

MAJOR-GENERAL RIGBY.

Major-General Christopher Palmer Rigby, F.R.G.S., H.M. Consul at Zanzibar, died on the 14th inst., at his residence in Portland-place. He entered the Bombay Army in 1836; in 1843 was appointed Assistant in the Deccan Revenue Survey; in 1847, Bheel Agent in Khandish; in 1854, President of the Military and Civil Examination Committee of the Presidency; and in 1856, Superintendent of Bazaars and police magistrate at Poona. He was subsequently employed on the Staff in Persia; finally, in 1858, he became Agent for the East India Company at Zanzibar, and shortly afterwards H.M. Consul in that place.

GENERAL WELLS.

General Samuel Wells, C.B., died at Oak Villa, St. Mary Church, Torquay, on the 8th inst., aged seventy-seven. He entered the Army in 1825, served at the recapture of Port Natal in 1842 (being mentioned in despatches), and commanded the 1st Battalion, 23rd Regiment, during the Indian Mutiny, for which he was thanked by the Governor-General in Council and given medal with two clasps. In 1858 he was created a C.B., and in 1882 became full General. He married Ellen, daughter of Captain Williams, R.N.

MR. JUSTICE PRING.

Mr. Justice Ratcliffe Pring, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Queensland, whose death is just announced, was born in 1825, the second son of Mr. Thomas Pring, of Crediton, Devon. In 1849 he was called to the Bar, and shortly after, migrating to Sydney, practised in New South Wales. Subsequently, he became Crown Prosecutor of the Moreton Bay district, and fixed his residence in Brisbane, being eventually, in 1880, constituted Puisne Judge of Queensland. He had been made a member of the Legislative Council there in 1862, and was returned to the Queensland Parliament six times. He held on several occasions the Office of Attorney-General.

THE DEAN OF LINCOLN.

The Very Rev. J. W. Blakesley, Dean of Lincoln, died at his residence, Lincoln, in his seventy-seventh year. He was educated at St. Paul's School, and Trinity College, Cambridge; was Fellow of his College, and also Select Preacher in 1840 and 1843, and in 1845 took the College living of Ware, Hertfordshire. Lord Palmerston, in 1863, made him Canon Residentiary of Canterbury; and, on the death of Dean Jeremie, in 1872, Mr. Gladstone nominated him to the Deanery of Lincoln. He was the author of "A Life of Aristotle" and "Herodotus," and was a contributor to the Quarterly and Edinburgh Reviews.

MR. ANSDELL.

Mr. Richard Ansdell, the well-known animal painter, died on the 20th inst., at his residence, Farnborough, Hants, from bronchitis, after three days' illness. He was seventy years of age. He was a native of Liverpool, and was educated at the Bluecoat School there. He was elected a Royal Academician in 1870. The deceased first distinguished himself by the painting of animals and sports of the field, with occasionally an outdoor historical subject. The earliest pictures he exhibited at the Royal Academy (1840) were "Grouse-Shooting" and "A Galloway Farm." In 1846 Mr. Ansdell sent to the Academy the celebrated picture, "The Stag at Bay," and the following year appeared its companion, "The Combat." In 1856 and 1857 Mr. Ansdell visited Spain, and in the province of Seville sketched a number of subjects that afterwards became well known.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Lady Edith Wyndham Quin, third daughter of the late Earl of Dunraven and Mount Earl, K.P., on the 10th inst., at Drayton House, Thrapstone, aged thirty-nine.

Mr. Edward William Selby Lowndes, J.P., fifth son of the late Mr. Selby Lowndes, of Whaddon Hall, M.P. for Bucks, on the 13th inst., at The Lodge, Winslow, Bucks, aged seventy-one.

The Dowager Lady Slade, widow of Sir Frederick Slade, Bart., and sister of the fifth Lord Vaux of Harrowden, at Brighton, on the 15th inst., at the advanced age of eighty-three.

Margaret Williams, Dowager Lady Marling, widow of Sir Samuel Stevens Marling, Bart., and daughter of Mr. William Bentley Cartwright, of Devizes, on the 13th inst., at Stanley Park, Stroud.

General Freeman Murray, formerly Governor of Bermuda, on the 14th inst., at Florence, aged eighty. He married, 1832, Catherine Elizabeth, youngest daughter of the Hon. Charles Lawrence Dundas, which lady died in 1876.

Mr. Arthur Giles Giles-Puller, M.A., F.R.G.S., of Youngsbury, Herts, J.P., barrister-at-law, on the 31st ult., at Dunham, Quebec, aged fifty-seven. He was grandson of Sir Christopher Puller, Chief Justice at Calcutta.

Lieut.-General Reginald Edward Knatchbull, R.A., late Bengal Artillery, youngest son of Sir Edward Knatchbull, eighth Baronet, of Mersham Hatch, Kent, on the 12th inst., at his residence, Claremount Court, St. Heliers, Jersey, in his seventy-third year.

The Metropolitan Board of Works have agreed to lend the London School Board a further sum of £200,000 for providing or enlarging schoolhouses.

The Lord Mayor presided on Tuesday evening, at the Albion Tavern, over the seventy-eighth annual festival dinner given in connection with the City of London Truss Society, when subscriptions were announced to the amount of £520.

On the opening day of the Craven Meeting the Duke of St. Albans won the Trial Stakes with Bellona, Mr. Adrian the Twenty-Seventh Biennial with Gracchus, Mr. C. Blanton the Double Trial Plate with Assignation, Colonel Heywood the Crawfurd Plate with Ordovix, Mr. J. Brodie the Light-Weight Selling Plate with Grey Parrot, Lord Hartington the Bushes Handicap with Sir Kenneth, and Mr. G. Arden the Visitors' Plate with Glen Albyn.

The Dutch Shipwrecked Mariners' Society have awarded a medal and diploma to Arthur Naylor and Thomas Smith, members of the crew of the smack Lord Wolseley, of Grimsby, for their gallantry in rescuing the survivors of the crew of the Dutch lugger Maartjie, for Vlaardingen, under most perilous and distressing circumstances. The Dutch Society supplemented the awards by a money grant to each member of the crew of the Lord Wolseley. The rewards have been distributed by the Mayor of Grimsby.

The arrangements for the Military Concert at the Hôtel Métropole on Monday, May 18, are completed. The directors of the hotel have placed the whole of their resources at the disposal of Lady Jane Taylor and her committee, and the concert promises to be one of the most brilliant entertainments of the season. The list of lady patronesses, which comprises a large number of the most influential members of society, will be published in a few days, together with all other particulars. The concert will be for the joint benefit of the Egyptian War Fund (patron H.M. the Queen) and the Princess of Wales Branch of the National Aid Society.

THE AFGHAN FRONTIER DISPUTE.

The controversy which is still going on between our own Government and that of Russia concerning the outrageous act of violence perpetrated by the Russian military authorities on the 30th ult., in their "unprovoked attack" on the Afghan garrison on the Kushk river, continues to excite public feeling in both nations, and has become the theme of comment all over Europe. We gave last week the contradictory official accounts of this deplorable affair, which had been received by telegraph, in London and at St. Petersburg, respectively from General Sir Peter Lumsden, the British Commissioner for surveying and defining the Afghan boundary, who was not present upon the occasion, but who relied upon the information of Captain Yate, and from General Komaroff, the Russian military Commander and Governor of the Trans-Caspian Provinces, who was personally in command of the force which made the attack. Our Government lost no time in transmitting to its own Commissioner, by telegraph, the account given by the Russian General; and, in reply to it, the following telegram from Sir Peter Lumsden was presented to Parliament on Tuesday:—

SIR P. LUMSDEN TO EARL GRANVILLE.

Tirpul, April 17, 1885.

Your Lordship's telegram of 13th.

General Komaroff's account of the attack on Penjdeh is considered incorrect:—

1. General Komaroff says:—"On March 25 one detachment approached Tash Kepri, on our bank of the Kushk." Reply: Tash Kepri is Turki for Pul-i-Khisti. General Komaroff's claim to either bank of the Kushk is untenable. The left bank of the Kushk had always been held by Afghans, and was never in Russian occupation. On Feb. 20 the Russians located an outpost of twenty-five Yulatan Turkomans at Kizil-Tapa, a mound one mile north of Pul-i-Khisti, and about same distance from nearest point of the Kushk River, and from its junction with the Murghab. This had always remained extreme limit of Russian advance within their line of vedettes. The Russian cavalry detachment alluded to did advance against Pul-i-Khisti on 25th, but retired before reaching that place when warned by Afghan Commander, as on Feb. 20.

2. General Komaroff states:—"Near the bridge I found an intrenchment occupied by Afghans." Reply: This position was occupied by Afghans previous to General Komaroff's advance, and to the agreement mentioned in your Lordship's telegram of March 17.

3. General Komaroff says:—"In order to avoid a conflict, I placed my troops five versts from Afghan position." Reply: This can only refer to main body, as Russian troops were in Kizil-Tapa, which is one mile from Afghan position, and the Russian vedettes were considerably in advance of that.

4. General Komaroff says that:—"When the Afghans had convinced themselves that we had no intention of attacking them, they began each day to come nearer to our camp." Reply: So far from the Afghans being convinced of General Komaroff's innocent intentions, the continued and irritating daily attempts to excite hostility convinced the Afghans of the Russian determination to provoke a conflict, and induced what appeared to them the military necessity of extending their defensive position.

5. General Komaroff states:—"On March 27 Afghans sent against one company, which was charged with covering a reconnaissance, three companies, with a cannon and some cavalry." Reply: A reconnaissance in force itself meant a hostile intention. A Russian company meant 250 men—more than equivalent to three Afghan companies, aggregating 295 men. On 27th two bodies of Russian troops simultaneously advanced; Colonel Alikhanoff, with cavalry, pushed past Pul-i-Khisti, and Russian infantry penetrated the right flank of Afghan position on right bank of Murghab. Colonel Alikhanoff only retired when intercepted by Afghan cavalry, some four miles in rear of Afghan position; and the Russian infantry only when the Afghan Commander drew up three companies and warned the Russian officer that if he advanced further he would be fired upon.

General Komaroff's Chief of the Staff, at the interview of 29th, called Colonel Alikhanoff's advance merely a pleasure trip, but was informed that the Afghan Commander viewed it in the most serious light.

6. General Komaroff states:—"Afghan audacity and arrogance increased by degrees." Reply: It may have been so, but, if so, it was entirely caused by Russian action, as the Afghans did all they could to avoid collision, and it was solely owing to their patience and forbearance during two months of incessant irritation that peace has been preserved so long. The Afghan Commander's courteous reply of 29th to General Komaroff's ultimatum proves his wish, to the last, to avoid conflict.

7. General Komaroff says:—"On 28th Afghans occupied a height which commanded left flank of our camp; began to throw up intrenchments there, to establish a post of cavalry behind our line, and placed a picket at gun-shot distance from our ford." Reply: It was the case that the Afghan Commander did on 28th, after the occurrence of the hostile reconnaissance on 27th, place a post of observation on the hills on the right bank of the Murghab, to give notice of any like fresh Russian advance on that flank, but this post was withdrawn the next day.

8. General Komaroff says:—"On 29th I sent to Afghan Commander an energetic summons, &c., and I received an answer that by the advice of the English he refused to retire across the Kushk." Reply: The fact itself is reported to me to be totally incorrect, and nowhere in the Afghan Commander's reply is any such statement. On the contrary, the wording is distinct. "I have duly received your letter regarding the withdrawal of certain pickets. As I had received orders from the Governor of Herat to consult Captain Yate, who has been deputed to Penjdeh by Sir Peter Lumsden, in such matters, I showed him your letter. Captain Yate afterwards had an interview with Colonel Zakrchewski, and informed me of the conversation which had taken place between them. Be it known to you that I must loyally obey the orders I have received from his Highness the Ameer. I can in no way do anything contrary to the orders of my Sovereign. Of course, in matter of detail, such as alterations in position of advanced pickets and vedettes posted in front of the troops, I am prepared to come to an arrangement with you with a view to the avoidance of any risk of conflict."

9. General Komaroff says:—"I again addressed a private letter couched in friendly terms." Reply: The letter in question was never seen by any officers of the Commission, but Captain De Lassoe was told that a letter had been received a few hours before the Russian attack on 30th. I have now called on the Sipeh Salar (the Afghan commander) for copy of second letter.

10. General Komaroff states:—"On 30th, to support my demands, I marched with my detachment against the Afghan position, counting still on a pacific result, but artillery fire and cavalry attack compelled me to accept combat." Reply: Russians advanced to attack of Afghan position, and of course the Afghans were obliged to defend themselves. Certainly the engagement was not commenced by artillery fire, as stated by General Komaroff, as infantry firing was heard continually several minutes before the first gun.

We leave the reply of Sir Peter Lumsden to the statements of General Komaroff without further comment than to express our confidence in the exactness of the accounts furnished by British officers upon such an occasion, and in the judgment of Sir Peter Lumsden upon the value of the evidence brought before him upon these questions of fact. Our Special Artist, Mr. Simpson, had left the British Commissioner's party several weeks before, on his return to England, travelling home through Persia, by way of Asterabad to the Caspian, which he crossed to Baku, and there first learnt the news of this conflict between the Russians and the Afghans. It is to be hoped that the Russian Government, upon further inquiry and better information of the facts, will not refuse to make a due apology, and some compensation to the Ameer of Afghanistan, for the injury which has been done by rash and unscrupulous action on the part of its military officials in that distant region of Central Asia. The immediate superior of General Komaroff is a more exalted personage, Prince Dondoukoff-Korsakoff, "Governor of the Caucasus and Supreme Chief of the Trans-Caspian Region," who was the political organiser of Bulgaria, at Rutschuk, after the death of Prince Tcherkatski, during the Russian war against Turkey in 1878. He has now set out from Tiflis for Askabad, where General Komaroff is usually located, and will probably report to the Government at St. Petersburg upon the actual situation of affairs.

It is stated that, after the occupation of Penjdeh, where the Russian military authorities established "a provisional government," no further advance was made by them up the river Murghab. The Sarik Turkomans, who live in huts in the neighbourhood of Penjdeh and Merouchak, pursued the retreating Afghans for some distance towards Herat, and burnt the abandoned camp of the British Commissioners at Bala Murghab. General Komaroff has returned to Surakhs, and Colonel Alikhanoff, the Governor of Merv, to Yulatan, outside the disputed territory; but the Russian troops, or some portion of them, remain in the positions which they have seized. Sir Peter Lumsden and the other members of the British Commission have withdrawn to Tirpul, on the Heri-Rud just above Kuhsan, near the Persian frontier, and sixty miles from the city of Herat.

THE LATE SIR GEORGE SARTORIUS.

An obituary notice has mentioned the death of the veteran Admiral of the Fleet, in his ninety-fifth year, having been born in 1790. He was the eldest son of Colonel John Conrad Sartorius, Engineers, of the East India Company's Service. He entered the Royal Navy in June, 1801, serving as midshipman of the Tonnant at the battle of Trafalgar. After the battle he was placed with Lieutenant James Stewart on board one of the Spanish seventy-fours taken on that occasion. He served in the boats at the taking of Ischia and Procida with the destruction of two gun-boats, at the capture of a French privateer of ten guns and 100 men, and a ship of four guns and seventeen men, and was employed at the defence of Cadiz in 1810 and 1811. For his services on that occasion he was promoted to the rank of Commander. He attained post rank in 1814, when he commanded the Slaney, twenty-one guns, and was present at the surrender of Napoleon Bonaparte to Captain Maitland of the Bellerophon, and brought despatches home with the news for the British Government. His name was honourably mentioned in the Gazette three times for his gallant services during the French war. Afterwards he was employed in the Mediterranean and on the home station. In 1842 he received the public thanks of the President and Congress of the United States, when, as captain of H.M.S. Malabar, he rendered assistance to the United States steam-frigate Missouri, which was destroyed by fire in the Bay of Gibraltar. Sir George was a naval aide-de-camp to the Queen from 1846 to 1849, and acted for some time as commander-in-chief on the Irish station. He received the honour of Knighthood in 1841, was made a Knight Commander of the Order of the Bath in 1865, and a Grand Cross of the Order in 1880, and had received the naval war medal for Trafalgar. His commission as Rear-Admiral bore date May 9, 1849; Vice-Admiral, Jan. 31, 1856; Admiral, Feb. 11, 1861; and Admiral of the Fleet, July 3, 1869. Sir George married, in 1839, a daughter of the late Mr. John Lamb.

Mr. Henry Irving and Miss Ellen Terry arrived at Euston Station on the 16th inst., on their return from their recent tour in the United States.

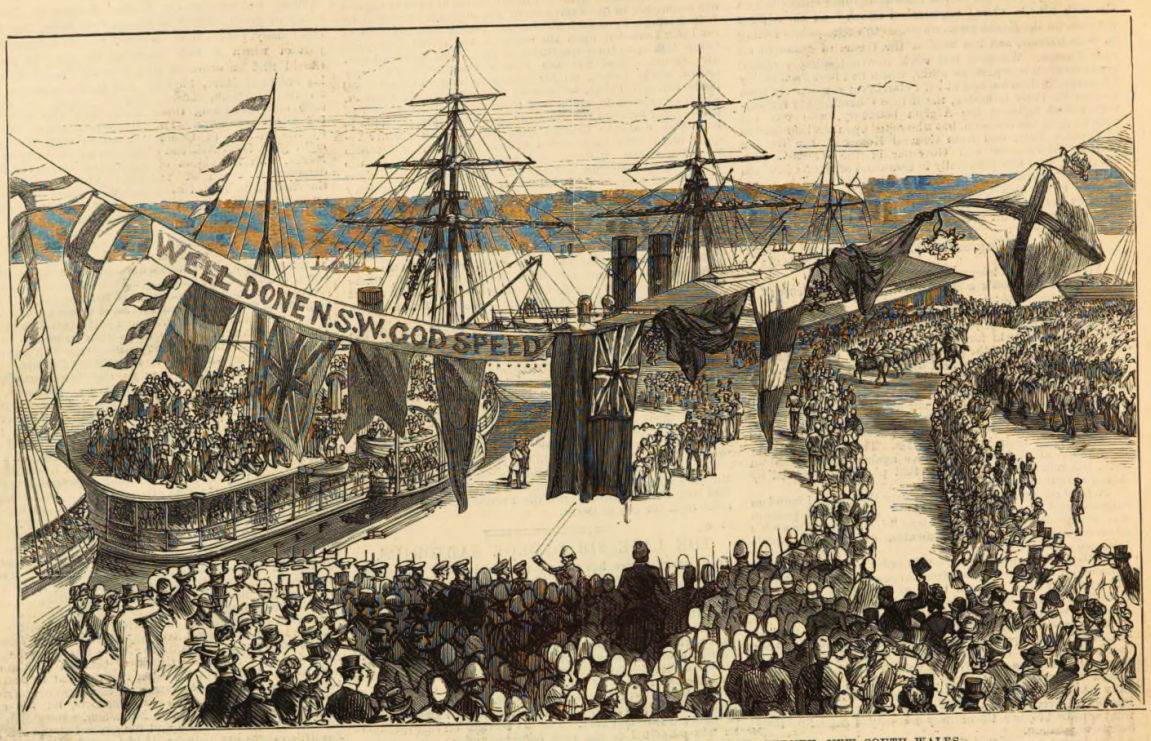
The séances of prestidigitation and mesmerism given by M. Verbeck, with the assistance of Mdlle. De Marguerite, at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, are marked by the production of several novelties, all well received by the spectators.

We are asked to state that a sum of money having been privately provided to found a medical scholarship at King's College in memory of the late Dr. Rabbeth, the whole of the fund subscribed will be devoted to the founding of two cots, one in each of the hospitals with which he was connected.

A new type-writer exceedingly simple to work and handy to carry, the ingenious invention of a clever London journalist, Mr. E. Peacock, was exhibited on Wednesday at the Canadian Agency, 446, Strand. It is named the "Dial Type-Writer," and resembles a mariner's compass. Worked by a handle, the "Dial" is adapted both for Commercial and Press work, and it has the advantage of printing a number of copies at once.

Princess Christian, who was accompanied by Prince Christian, distributed on Tuesday the prizes and certificates to the successful candidates of the St. John Ambulance Class for Ladies at the Polytechnic Institute, Regent-street. Her Royal Highness also presented the medal awarded by the Order of St. John of Jerusalem to Inspector Double for, saving the life of a poor woman at King's-cross station at the risk of his own.

The annual meeting in connection with the Birmingham Agricultural Exhibition Society was held at the Queen's Hotel, Birmingham, on the 16th inst., under the presidency of the Mayor. From the annual report it was shown that the society was in a flourishing condition, and that the Prince of Wales had accepted the presidency of the society for the ensuing year. The committee of the society will make exceptional preparations for the reception of his Royal Highness in Birmingham on the occasion of his visit, which will be in the first week of December.



The Rev. Canon Fremantle presided on the 16th inst., at the Westminster Palace Hotel, over a conference called by the International Arbitration and Peace Association to consider the possibilities of a peaceful settlement of the difficulties that had arisen on the Afghan frontier question, when it was unanimously resolved that any difference which might arise between the Russian and British Governments during the negotiations ought to be referred to the good offices of a friendly Power for arbitration, before appealing to arms; and that it was desirable that the Russian and Afghan forces should at once be withdrawn from the disputed territory.

RUSSIAN FORCES ON THE AFGHAN FRONTIER.

Military statistics of the Russian Empire in Central Asia being of great interest at the present crisis, the Times and other daily papers have obtained precise information, some part of which is here extracted for our own readers. It should first be observed that General Komaroff has under his orders at Merv, Sarakhs, and in the advanced positions on the Murghab, Kushk, and Heri-Rud, not more than 6000 men, including those Turkomans who have assumed the Russian uniform. The force was raised to this number by the advance of General Komaroff with 2000 men and eight guns from Askabad at the end of February or early in March, with the object of reinforcing Colonel Alikhanoff's detachment south of Yulatan. The Russian forces on the Kushk include two mounted Cossack batteries with sixteen steel Krupp guns, two light field Krupp batteries, and two three-pounder mountain batteries with eight bronze muzzle-loading guns. This makes a total of forty guns, or about eight per 1000 men. The main corps musters 6000 men, of which 4700 are combatants. The reserve of General Komaroff's army in Turcomania and the neighbouring provinces consists of the following: Four battalions of Chasseurs, seventeen battalions of infantry of the Line, three battalions of garrison troops, forty-six sotnias of Cossacks, five field batteries; two mountain batteries, and half a battalion of sappers. The total strength of the corps thus amounts to 15,400 infantry, 5470 horsemen, 1280 artillerymen with seventy-four guns, and 318 sappers; together 22,468 combatants. There is no question that, so far as men go, that force could be raised to 50,000 in two months, provided the garrisons of the Caucasus were reinforced and sent across the Caspian. If Russia undertakes this adventure she will have no scruple in violating Persian soil, and the more direct route through Meshed and Kushan will be used for the purpose of rapidly placing troops at Herat. Assuming, therefore, that Russia does her utmost, we may expect that General Komaroff would, on receiving permission and learning that fresh troops were reaching Askabad, make an attempt with his 5000 men to seize Herat by a coup de main, and, as the fortifications are dilapidated, he might possibly succeed, provided he got over the Ardewan or the Baba Pass without any serious loss or obstruction. But Russia is not dependent on the army of the Caucasus alone in the event of her deciding to attempt a serious invasion of Afghanistan. There is the army in the Turkestan province — that of Central Asia, which has recently been increased, until it has been raised to nearly 70,000 men, including the Cossack colonies in Zarafshan and on the Naryn. The position of the Russian troops in Central Asia may be described as follows: — On the Oxus itself there is, in the Amou Darya district, which formed part of Khiva, a garrison of between 4000 and 5000 men, and one battalion has been recently sent to Merv from this quarter. The main forces of the Russian garrison in Turkestan are collected in two districts, on the east in Ferghana, and on the west in Zarafshan. Marghilan is the head-quarters on one side and Samarcand on the other. In Zarafshan there are between 12,000 and 15,000 men, and in Ferghana there are about 12,000 more. It is from these two corps, which would in time be reinforced from Tashkend and the line of the Sir Darya, and ultimately from Orenburg and West Siberia, that the force would be drawn for any aggressive measures in the region of the upper Oxus. In May, 1878, General Kaufmann formed at three places what were called "advanced expeditionary detachments," and with these troops, had war ensued with England, as then seemed not impossible, it was proposed to assist the Afghans, and organize the means of resisting the English invasion of Cabul. The Treaty of Berlin and other circumstances prevented General Kaufmann's plans having any practical results.

In 1878 the Zarafshan garrison placed 10,000 men, with thirty-two guns, at Jam, on the extreme southern Russian frontier, under the command of General Trotzki. The Ferghana garrison, under General Abramoff, supplied 1500 men and ten guns and rockets for the purpose of an exploring expedition to the Pamir plateau. A third force of 1500 men and four guns was to be dispatched from Petro-Alexandrovsk to Charjui, but this will in future be included in the Russian operations on the Murghab. General Kouropatkin has proved the complete feasibility of moving small bodies of troops up the Oxus and across the desert to Merv. But for any large expedition the Turkestan army would not be employed in the direction of either Charjui or Merv. As in 1878, so now in 1885, the principal Russian force in Turkestan would be collected at Jam, whence it would march south to the Oxus, crossing that river at the Kilif or the Chuchka ferries, immediately north of Balkh. From Jam to the Oxus there is a choice of two routes, but the longer of these is preferable, on account of there being water for the greater portion of the way. This road passes through Gusar and Shirabad, where a certain amount of supplies may be expected, and the distance is about 160 miles. Balkh itself is between thirty and forty miles south of the Oxus, so that when the Russians have concentrated at Jam, which will not be until next month, they will have a march of 200 miles, or a fortnight at a very rapid rate of marching, including the crossing of a river, before they reach the Ameer's chief position north of the Hindoo Koosh. It is probable that a portion of the Russian force would cross the stream at the Kilif ferry, a few miles lower down than Chuchka, for at Kilif there is a convenient passage over the Oxus. The river at this point narrows to the extent of 167 fathoms, which circumstance would place the Afghan bank within the range of Russian guns. Moreover, steamers can easily reach Kilif. The passage over the river can be performed in Bokhara boats. Although Kilif in itself is not a point of great importance, it is surrounded by cultivated fields and vegetable gardens. If Russia decides to march her troops across Bokhara, it must be remembered that she requires no fresh authority to do so, nor will she be violating any of the Ameer's rights. The treaty of 1869 with Mozuffir Eddin gave Russia authority to occupy Charjui, Karshi, or Kermina, whenever she deemed such a step to be necessary.

The Turkestan army in its present state could, therefore, place 15,000 troops on the Oxus about the same time that the army of the Caucasus could put 20,000 men on the Heri-Rud. But it must be remembered that one of the Ameer's strongest and most efficient garrisons is stationed north of the Hindoo Koosh, and that there are at least 20,000 Afghan troops between Shiborghan and Badakshan. This army could be strongly reinforced, in good time, by a portion of the Cabul garrison, and, should the Ameer desire it, an efficient defence of the passages of the Oxus could be organised. There is every reason to believe that, with very little assistance from us, the approaches to Cabul from the Oxus and Balkh through Bamian could be made practically impassable by the Russian army. The distances are still very considerable, Balkh being 200 miles from Bamian, and Bamian itself 100 more from Cabul, and the difficulties of the Bamian or any of the other passes leading from Afghan Turkestan into Kohistan far exceed those of the Khyber or the other passes between India and Afghanistan.

THE LATE EARL CAIRNS.

In the House of Lords last week, the political leaders of both parties, Earl Granville and the Marquis of Salisbury, followed by Lord Coleridge, the Lord Chief Justice, united their expression of regret at the death of this eminent member of their House and of the legal profession. The Right Hon. Hugh M'Calmont Cairns, Earl Cairns was born in 1819, of an Ulster family, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, was called to the Bar in 1844, entered Parliament in 1852, became Solicitor-General in 1858, Attorney-General in 1866, and in the same year attained a seat on the judicial Bench; in 1868 became Lord Chancellor, having been previously raised to the Peerage, and in 1878, under the last Conservative Ministry, was further elevated to the rank of an Earl. His future renown, when the political contentions of the day shall be forgotten, will chiefly rest upon the good work he has accomplished in the improvement of the judicial system and procedure, and in the amendment of the law affecting real property. While still a Lord Justice of Appeal, in 1867, he was placed at the head of the Judicature Commission, which produced the first instalment of its report. In 1869 a Supplementary Commission, including most of the old Commissioners, with Lord Hatherley, then Lord Chancellor, at their head, was issued to complete the labours of the first, and chiefly to consider what reforms could be introduced in the judicial system with regard to County Courts and other inferior tribunals. From the report of a majority of the Commissioners, Lord Cairns, with several of his colleagues, dissented, on the ground that the scheme did not make sufficient provision for frequent sittings of the Superior Courts in the most populous districts of the country, such as Lancashire and Yorkshire. The recommendations of the majority of the Commissioners were not successful; and the first of the Judicature Acts, which was passed in 1873, dealt mainly with the recommendations of the first Commission, over which Lord Cairns had presided in 1868 and 1869. Another subject to which he applied himself was the law of real estate. In 1859 a bill was introduced by Lord Cairns, then Solicitor-General, for the registration of titles and for facilitating the transfer of land. In 1862 Lord Westbury, who then occupied the woolsack, succeeded in carrying a bill on the same subject through Parliament; but his measure was based upon principles very different from those advocated by Lord Cairns. On taking the seals for the first time in 1868, Lord Cairns procured the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the practical working of this Act, and the report proved unfavourable. Further legislation on the subject was deferred by another Ministerial change. Lord Selborne was prevented by a similar event in 1873 from carrying through Parliament a bill which embodied the report of the Commissioners, and was based on the same lines as the first bill introduced by Sir Hugh Cairns, when Solicitor-General, in 1859. It thus fell, after all, to the lot of the Conservative Lord Chancellor, in 1875, to pass the measure which his predecessor had prepared upon the model constructed by himself seventeen years before. The Land Titles and Transfer Act of 1875 was a step in the right direction. The Real Property Vendors and Purchasers' Act, which Lord Cairns successfully introduced in 1874, may prove the more beneficial, taken in conjunction with the Real Property Limitation Act. The last-mentioned statute effected an important alteration in real property law; and by shortening in certain cases the time of legal prescription, might do much towards diminishing the temptations to expensive litigation. The principle that the interests of the suitor are absolutely paramount to those of any professional class, was at the bottom of every legal reform of which Lord Cairns was the author. The Settled Estates Act, brought in and passed by Lord Cairns since he has been out of office, is a most beneficial measure. Lord Cairns was one of the originators of the new systematised machinery of law reporting; and he bestowed much thought and labour on plans for improving the institutions for the professional education of barristers. He was a man of great intellectual powers, well applied to the public service.

"SLEEPING INNOCENCE."

The recumbent figure of a fine canine youngster, one of that noble breed which takes its name from the monastic Hospice on the Alpine Pass of St. Bernard, where these dogs have often done good service to humanity in aiding the search for poor travellers lost in the snow, makes a picture of "sleeping innocence" that every true lover of animals will thoroughly approve. It is expressive of unconscious abandonment to the luxury of complete repose, which is perhaps only to be seen in the stage of infancy, either in human life or in that of those we call inferior creatures, and which is always very touching to behold, but which one would rather not disturb with a touch. "Let sleeping dogs lie" is a wise old proverb, the usual application of which, indeed, refers to some possible danger in rousing them to hostile action; but this harmless puppy, whose "innocence" is expressly warranted, should be left, from pure sympathy, to enjoy his slumber to the full. The Artist has been careful to study and delineate correctly the points of form characteristic of the St. Bernard race, which connoisseurs are sure to appreciate, and which, in the mature growth of the animal, seldom fail to be admired.

The twenty-eighth annual assault-at-arms of the Honourable Artillery Company took place on Wednesday, at the drill-hall in the City-road.

The Sportsman's Exhibition, including a large variety of appliances used in every branch of sport and pastime, has been held at the Agricultural Hall.

The Board of Trade have awarded a piece of plate to Captain Paul François Lescalles, of the French barque Leopold and Marie, of Bordeaux, in acknowledgment of his humanity and kindness to the shipwrecked crew of the British ship Cowden Law, which was abandoned on fire at sea on Jan. 19 last. The crew of the Cowden Law were ten days on board the Leopold and Marie. They were treated with the greatest kindness, but the master declined to receive anything for their subsistence.

PUBLIC DEBT OF NEW ZEALAND. CONVERSION of £5,772,700 NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT FIVE PER CENT CONSOLS.—The Governor and Company of the Bank of England Give Notice that, on behalf of the agents appointed by the Governor of New Zealand in Council, under the New Zealand Consolidated Stock Act, 1877, the Amendment Act, 1881, and the Consolidated Stock Act, 1884 (Sir Francis Dillon Bell, K.C.M.G., and Sir Penrose Goodchild Julyan, K.C.M.G., C.B.), they are authorised to invite holders of the debentures of the above Colony in their debentures for conversion on the following terms, viz.:

For every one hundred pounds of such debentures a new debenture will be issued for the same amount, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum for seven years, from April 15, 1885, to April 15, 1892, when it will be converted into £107 New Zealand Four per Cent Consolidated Stock, inscribed at the Bank of England, which will rank pari passu with the Four per Cent Consolidated Stock already created and issued, and redeemable at par on Nov. 1, 1929.

Applications for conversion will be received up to April 30 next, inclusive.

The interest upon the new debentures will be payable by coupons in the same manner as upon the Consol Debentures, viz., Jan. 15, April 15, July 15, and Oct. 15, at the Bank of England, the first coupon being for the dividend due July 15 next.

Consol Debentures, from which the coupon due April 15 next must be detached, may be deposited at the Chief Cashier's Office, Bank of England, for exchange on or after Wednesday, the 15th inst. They must bear all coupons subsequent to that due April 15 next, and must be left three clear days for examination. Receipts will be given for the debentures deposited, and the new debentures will be issued in exchange as soon after as possible.

The usual annual drawing for redemption of the Consols will take place on Tuesday, March 31; debentures deposited before that date will not be affected by the drawing. Holders of Consol Debentures drawn for redemption, in respect of which no application for conversion has been made, will be allowed to receive, in exchange for each Consol debenture, a new debenture as above, upon payment of the sum of £4 per cent, provided application be made before April 15 next.

By the Act 40 and 41 Vict., ch. 29, the revenues of the colony of New Zealand alone will be liable in respect of the stock and the dividends thereon; and the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, and the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, will not be directly or indirectly liable or responsible for the payment of the stock or of the dividends thereon, or for any matter relating thereto.

Bank of England, March 6, 1885.

ELLIMAN'S ROYAL EMBROCATION.
From Major J. M. Browne, Master of South Staffordshire Hounds
"Fosseway, Lichfield, Oct. 17, 1879.
"Sirs,—I find Elliman's Embrocation exceedingly good for sprains and cuts in horses, and also for cuts in hounds' feet. I shall strongly recommend it to all my friends.—Yours faithfully, J. M. BROWNE."

ELLIMAN'S ROYAL EMBROCATION.
"Castle Weir, Kington, Herefordshire, December, 1878.
"Gentlemen,—I use the Royal Embrocation in the stables and kennels, and have found it very serviceable. I have also used the Universal Embrocation for lumbago and rheumatism for the last two years, and have suffered very little since using it.
"R. H. PRICE, Lieut.-Col., Master of Radnorshire Hunt."

From Captain S. G. Butson, J.P., St. Brendon's, Comfert, Eyrecourt, County Galway.
"Dec. 16, 1884.
"Sirs,—Elliman's Royal Embrocation is in use in my stables, and I find the results most satisfactory.
"S. G. BUTSON, J.P.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots, where the glands are not decayed. "The Mexican Hair Renewer" is sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath.
Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living animalculæ, leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. The fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke: being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants, it is perfectly delicious to the taste, and as harmless as sherry. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

CURE OF DEAFNESS.—NOISES IN THE EARS.—A Lady Cured at the age of ninety, another after forty years' deafness. Hearing has been given where none previously existed, and speech followed as a result. If deafness continues, speech is likely to fail. Treatise, price 6d., with letter of advice to patients sending statement of case.—Address, Rev. E. J. SILVERTON, Imperial-buildings, Ludgate-circus, London.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL and STEEL PILLS for FEMALES. Sold in Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., of all Chemists. Sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps by the maker, E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, Nottingham.

PEPPER'S QUININE AND IRON HEALTH, STRENGTH, ENERGY, TONIC.
GREAT BODILY STRENGTH, GREAT NERVE STRENGTH, GREAT MENTAL STRENGTH, GREAT DIGESTIVE STRENGTH.
PEPPER'S TONIC. Insist on having it. Bottles, 16 doses, 2s. 6d.; next size, 32 doses, 4s. 6d. Sold everywhere.

Beetham's Glycerine and Cucumber is the most delightful Emollient Milk for the Skin ever produced! A few applications suffice to render it SOFT, SMOOTH, and WHITE, and to remove all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, SUNBURN, &c. For preserving the complexion from the effects of the SUN, WIND, and HARD WATER, and imparting that soft, velvety feeling to the skin, this preparation has no equal! For Hot and Cold Weather it is equally INVALUABLE. Bottles, 1s., 1s. 9d., 2s. 6d., of all Chemists and Perfumers.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey or white, or falling off, use THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER; for it will positively restore, in every case, grey or white hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorer." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots, where the glands are not decayed.
This preparation has never been known to fail in restoring the hair to its natural colour and gloss in from eight to twelve days.
It promotes growth, and prevents the hair falling out, eradicating dandruff, and leaving the scalp in a clean, healthy condition.
It imparts peculiar vitality to the roots of the hair, restoring it to its youthful freshness and vigour. Daily applications of this preparation for a week or two will surely restore faded, grey, or white hair to its natural colour and richness.
It is not a dye, nor does it contain any colouring matter or offensive substance whatever. Hence it does not soil the hands, the scalp, or even white linen, but produces the colour within the substance of the hair.
It may be had of any respectable Chemist, Perfumer, or Dealer in Toilet Articles in the Kingdom, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle. In case the dealer has not "The Mexican Hair Renewer" in stock and will not procure it for you, it will be sent direct by rail, carriage paid, on receipt of 4s. in stamps, to any part of England.
Sold Wholesale by the ANGLO-AMERICAN DRUG COMPANY, Limited, 33, Farringdon-road, London.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

WHAT BEAUTIFIES THE HAIR?

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And pleases each one's fancies?
What adds a charm of perfect grace,
And Nature's gift enhances?
What gives a bright and beauteous gloss,
And what says each reviewer?
"That quite successful is the use Of 'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And makes it bright and glowing?
What keeps it free from dandruff, too,
And healthy in its growing?
What does such wonders? Ask the press,
And what says each reviewer?
"That none can equal or approach
'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
Like some bright halo beaming?
What makes the hair a perfect mass
Of splendid ringlets teeming?
What gives profusion in excess?
Why, what says each reviewer?
"The choicest preparation is
'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And makes it so delightful?
Because to speak the honest truth
Is only just and rightful.
What say the people and the press,
And what says each reviewer?
"That most superb for ladies' use
Is 'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER has gained for itself the highest reputation, and a decided preference over all other "hair dressings," as evinced from certificates and testimonials from the most respectable sources. Being compounded with the greatest care—combining, as it does, all the most desirable qualities of the best hair preparations of the day, without the objectionable ones—it may be relied on as the very best known to chemistry for restoring the natural colour to the hair, and causing new hair to grow on bald spots, unless the hair glands are decayed; for, if the glands are decayed and gone, no stimulant can restore the hair. If, as is often the case, the glands are only torpid, THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER will renew their vitality, and a new growth of hair will follow. Read the following Testimonial:—
Messrs. Wm. Hayes and Co., Chemists, 12, Grafton-street, Dublin, write:—"We are recommending THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER to all our customers as the best of the kind, as we have been told by several of our friends who tried it that it has a wonderful effect in restoring and strengthening their Hair."

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION FOR LADIES.

Would you have luxuriant hair,
Beautiful, and rich, and rare;
Would you have it soft and bright,
And attractive to the sight?
This you really can produce
If you put in constant use
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

The hair it strengthens and preserves,
And thus a double purpose serves;
It beautifies—improves it, too,
And gives it a most charming hue,
And thus in each essential way;
It public favour gains each day—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

If a single thread of hair
Of a grey ish tint is there,
This "Renewer" will restore
All its colour as before,
And thus it is that vast renown
Does daily now its virtues crown—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

No matter whether faded grey,
Or falling like the leaves away,
It will renew the human hair,
And make it like itself appear.
It will revive it, beautify,
And every ardent wish supply—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

The constitution of the person and the condition of the scalp have much to do with the length of time it requires for new hair to grow; also thin or thick hair will depend much upon the vital force remaining in the hair glands. New hairs are first seen to start around the margin of the bald spots near the permanent hair, and extending upwards until the spots are covered more or less thickly with fine short hair. Excessive brushing should be guarded against as soon as the small hairs make their appearance; but the scalp may be sponged with rain water to advantage occasionally. The scalp may be pressed and moved on the bone by the finger ends, which quickens the circulation and softens the spots which have remained long bald. On applying this hair-dressing it enlivens the scalp, and in cases where the hair begins to fall a few applications will arrest it, and the new growth presents the luxuriance and colour of youth. It may be relied on as the best hair-dressing known for restoring grey or faded hair to its original colour without dyeing it, producing the colour within the substance of the hair, imparting a peculiar vitality to the roots, preventing the hair from falling, keeping the head cool, clean, and free from dandruff, causing new hairs to grow, unless the hair-glands are entirely decayed. THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER makes the hair soft, glossy, and luxuriant.

THE WORDS "THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER" are a Trade-Mark; and the public will please see the words are on every case surrounding the Bottle, and the name is blown in the Bottle.
The Mexican Hair Renewer. Price 3s. 6d. Directions in German, French, and Spanish.
May be had of most respectable Dealers in all parts of the World.

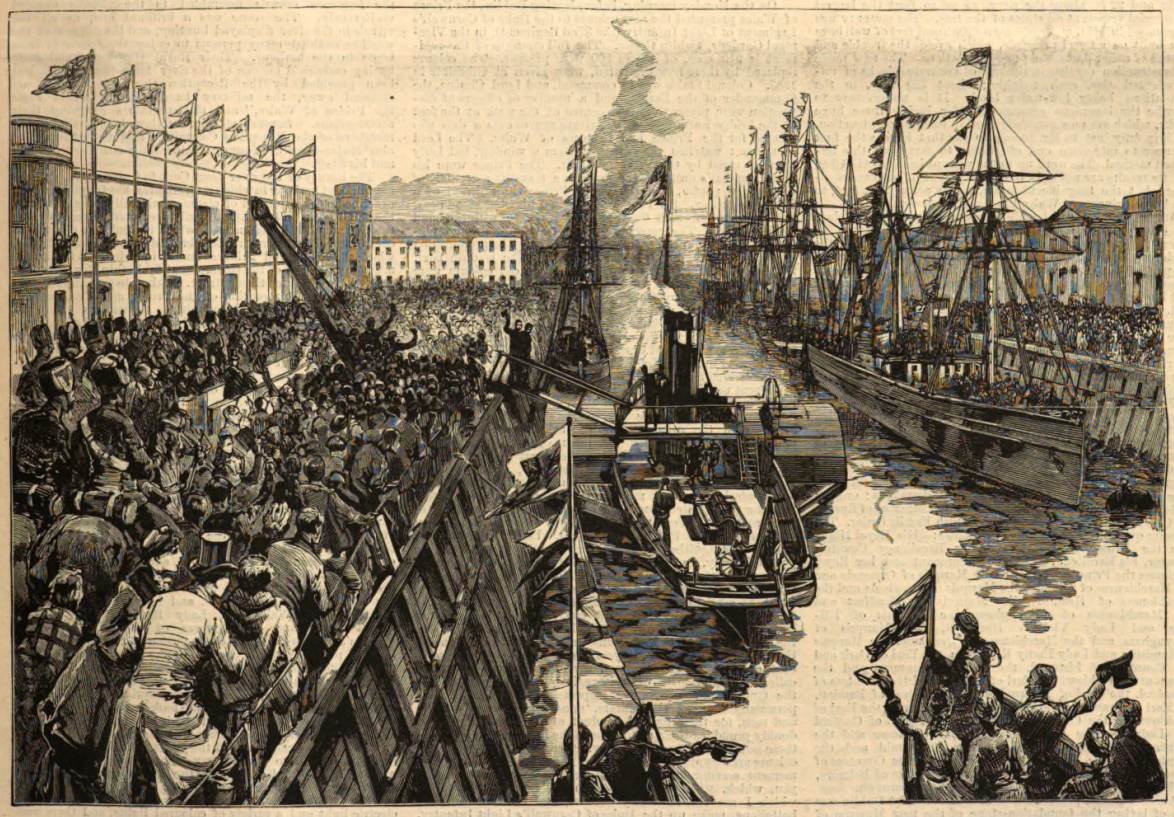
Royal Visit to Ireland



CEAD MILE FAILTHE

THE PRINCE OF WALES LAYING FOUNDATION-STONE OF MUSEUM, DUBLIN.

THE PRINCESS OF WALES NAMING THE "ALEXANDRA" BASIN, DUBLIN.

THE ROYAL PARTY AT CORK GOING ON BOARD THE STEAMER FOR QUEENSTOWN.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, and their son, Prince Albert Victor Edward of Wales, have returned to Dublin after spending a week in the south of Ireland, where they were the guests of the Earl and Countess of Listowel, at Convamore, near Mallow; and of Earl and Countess Spencer, occupying Lord Kenmare's house near Killarney. Their Royal Highnesses, on Wednesday week, visited the city of Cork, and went down the river to Queenstown. It was on Monday week that they left Dublin for this southern tour, and our series of Illustrations must be resumed with those of two or three incidents of the preceding week at Dublin, following the events that were described and illustrated in the last Number of this Journal.

One of these was the inspection by their Royal Highnesses, on the Saturday, of the large dock at Dublin which has hitherto been known as the North Wall Extension, but which, having been christened by the Princess of Wales with her own name, will henceforth bear the more distinguished title of the Alexandra Basin. A spacious dais was constructed, over which a pavilion was erected, and two handsome antique chairs were provided for the Royal visitors. The pavilion was crowded by ladies and gentlemen long before the arrival of the Prince and Princess, who were received by Mr. Michael Murphy (chairman of the Port and Docks Board), Mr. Proud (secretary), Mr. Richard Martin, Mr. W. Watson, Mr. J. T. Pim, Mr. John Bagot, Captain Hardy, and other members of the Board. The Royal visitors were enthusiastically cheered. Mr. Murphy, addressing the Prince, thanked them for coming, after which Mr. Proud read the address, in which the Board described the great progress recently made in the port of Dublin in providing accommodation for shipping of the largest class. They also pointed out that since the last visit of their Royal Highnesses, the two most important bridges which span the Liffey had been reconstructed and an additional bridge built, by which the means of communication between the north and south sides of the city had been greatly increased. The Prince read a suitable reply; their Royal Highnesses then advanced to the front of the dais, and inspected one of the huge concrete blocks, which was suspended from floating shears ready to be lowered into the water. Mr. B. B. Stoney, engineer of the Board, gave the Prince and Princess a brief explanation of the construction of the quay wall, which, as an engineering work, presents many features of interest. He pointed out that the enormous progress in the trade of Dublin during the last twenty-five years having necessitated the provision of deep-water quays, that important work was commenced in 1864 by rebuilding nearly 700 ft. in length of the east end of the North Wall quay, so as to allow vessels drawing 17 ft. to lie afloat alongside at low water. But the most important improvements of this kind were not commenced till 1870, since which date 6500 ft. of the quay have either been rebuilt or constructed where no quays existed before, so as to give depths of from 15 ft. to 24 ft. at low water and enable the Irish Channel steamers to sail at fixed hours independently of the tide, as well as allow the larger class of oversea vessels which now frequent the port to lie always afloat. It was found necessary, however, to provide additional deep-water accommodation to suit the oversea trade, which had increased more than fourfold in the space of twenty years; and accordingly it was determined to extend the North Wall and construct a large tidal basin with 24 ft. at low water inside and 22 ft. along the river, so as to float the largest commercial vessels at all states of the tide. The masonry was commenced in 1871, and since then 4500 lineal feet of wall have been built on a novel principle, which avoids the trouble and expense of coffer dams, and pumping stations. The new mode of construction consists in the use of concrete blocks of unprecedented size, each weighing about 350 tons, in the foundations below low-water level. It is unnecessary to describe the ingenious arrangement for laying these huge blocks, which are now generally used in harbour construction, but it is only just to Mr. Stoney to say that he was the first engineer to introduce and effectively to carry out this improved method. The work up to the present has cost £180,000, and its results are not only the great extent of quayage mentioned, but the magnificent basin, ninety acres in extent, to which the Princess of Wales has given her name.

When Mr. Stoney had made these explanations to the Prince and Princess, the great block of concrete was lowered into the water, in order to give an opportunity of observing the machinery at work, and then the Princess of Wales performed her part of the ceremony by naming the basin. A bottle of champagne was suspended over the basin in such a manner that by the pulling of a cord it would be smashed against the wall. Her Royal Highness having broken the bottle, said, "I name this the Alexandra Basin." Hereupon loud cheers were raised by the assembly, and a Royal salute of twenty-one guns, fired from the Pigeon House Fort at the opposite side of the river, marked the completion of this interesting ceremony. The Royal party then left, the military band in attendance playing "God Bless the Prince of Wales."

The State ball at Dublin Castle, on the Friday evening, brought a thousand ladies and gentlemen together in St. Patrick's Hall and the suite of State apartments connected with it. The Princess of Wales wore a dress of cream satin duchesse trimmed with gold and silver embroidery, veiled in lisse embroidered with gold and silver shamrocks, corsage to correspond; head-dress, a tiara of diamonds; ornaments, pearls and diamonds; orders: Victoria and Albert, the Crown of India, St. Catherine of Russia, the Order of the Red Cross and the Danish Family Order. The opening quadrille was arranged as follows:—His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and her Excellency Countess Spencer, his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant and her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, the Marquis of Ormonde and the Marchioness of Kildare, the Marquis of Drogheda and the Marchioness of Headfort, the Marquis of Headfort and the Marchioness of Conyngham, the Marquis of Kildare and Lady Victoria Hamilton, the Marquis of Conyngham and the Marchioness of Ormonde, the Marquis of Hamilton and Lady Emily Kingscote, the Earl of Cork and the Countess of Listowel, the Earl of Kenmare and the Countess of Wicklow, the Earl of Bandon and the Countess of Longford, the Earl of Listowel and the Countess of Bandon, the Earl of Granard and the Countess of Kenmare, the Earl of Wicklow and the Countess of Carysfort, the Earl of Gosford and Lady Maurice Fitzgerald, the Earl of Rosse and the Countess of Gosford, Lord Maurice Fitzgerald and the Countess of Rosse, the Earl of Carysfort and the Countess of Kilmorey, the Earl of Kilmorey and the Countess of Belmore, the Earl of Belmore and the Countess of Lanesborough.

Another public proceeding of much interest at Dublin was that of laying the foundation-stone of the new Museum of Science and Art in connection with South Kensington. Elaborate preparations had been made for it, and the grounds at each side of Leinster House, which is to be the central building, were adorned with gay flags and fitted up with stands, from which the entry of the Royal party and the ceremonial itself could be seen. A guard of honour, contributed by the Cornwall Regiment, with their band, was stationed on Leinster-lawn, opening upon Merrion-square, through which the Royal party entered. On alighting from the carriage they were received by the Visitors of the Museum, the Trustees of the National Library, and the Commissioners of Public Works. The Director of the Science and Art Museum, Professor V. Ball, F.R.S., was presented to the Prince, and their Royal Highnesses were conducted through Leinster House, while the National Anthem was played by the band of the Cornwall Regiment. As the Princess passed through the hall, a bouquet was presented to her by the students of the Metropolitan School of Art. On reaching the dais their Royal Highnesses and their Excellencies were conducted to chairs of State which had been prepared for them. When the procession was observed coming from Leinster House, the whole assemblage filling the amphitheatre rose simultaneously and received the Royal party with the enthusiasm with which they had been greeted before. The Lord Lieutenant and Countess Spencer were also greeted with the same cordiality. The Director of the Science and Art Museum then read a statement of its objects and aims. Lieutenant-General Sankey, C.B., Chairman of the Board of Public Works, handed to his Royal Highness the coins and inscriptions to be deposited under the foundation-stone. After which the architects, Messrs. Deane, were presented to the Prince by Viscount Powerscourt, K.P. Mr. Deane then handed the trowel to his Royal Highness, who, with due ceremony, laid the first stone of the Museum of Science and Art and of the National Library of Ireland. In a reply read by the Prince to the address which Professor Ball presented to him, his Royal Highness said: "It gratifies me to learn of the action which the Science and Art Department had taken in reference to this museum, and to observe the support which that action received both from the Royal Dublin Society and from the Royal Irish Academy. It is by a united movement such as this that difficulties are overcome and success made possible of attainment. I am glad to think that the two great societies I have named have combined to smooth the way for an institute which will, I trust, be useful to a large number of the people of Ireland. I hope some day to see in full working order the institution of which the first stone has been laid this afternoon. When this is so, the magnificent collections, which have obtained a wide reputation, will be open to a public thoroughly capable of appreciating their merit and deriving advantages from their amalgamation under one roof. The museum will worthily face the great library, where the efforts of a State Department have been successfully combined with a movement originated by the citizens, and supported out of the rates, the object of which is to give free facilities for reading and study to the people of this metropolis." The speech of his Royal Highness was received with much applause. The ceremony concluded with a flourish of trumpets, and the bands played "St. Patrick's Day." The Councils of the Royal Dublin Society and the Royal Irish Academy were then presented to his Royal Highness; and the procession returned through Leinster House to the east entrance of Merrion-square, while the band played "God bless the Prince of Wales" and the band of the Hibernian School the Danish National Anthem. The bouquet was presented to the Princess by Miss Douglass, a pupil of the School of Art, who obtained the Art Scholarship at South Kensington. It was supported by a handsome holder, subscribed for and made in Dublin from an old Irish design in bog oak, with gold and silver mounting.

On the Monday morning, before leaving Dublin, the Prince of Wales presented the new colours to the Duke of Cornwall's Regiment of Light Infantry (the 32nd Regiment), in the Viceregal Gardens, Dublin Castle. The full strength of the regiment is 940 men, of whom 800 were present. The colours replaced by those now presented, were given at Gibraltar in 1865. Colonel Stabb was in command, and Lord Clarina, the Commander of the Forces, and a number of officers of distinction were present. In the centre of the walk at the foot of the bridge leading from the private apartments a dais was erected for the Prince and Princess of Wales. The Lord Lieutenant watched the ceremony from a window, but Lady Spencer stood by the Princess's side. The Prince wore his Field Marshal's uniform, the Princess a travelling costume of olive-green poplin, and the young Prince the uniform of a Naval Volunteer. Sir Thomas Steele and his Staff stood near, and the troops formed three sides of a square, with the band in the centre. The ceremony was a private affair and picturesque, as such presentations always are. The presentation of colours to a regiment, whoever may take the leading part, is suggestive and highly interesting. The old colours were borne past the ranks of the regiment, the band playing "Should auld acquaintance be forgot," and the new colours were then advanced, the consecration prayers being read by the Rev. Mr. Sadleir, Head Chaplain of her Majesty's Forces in Ireland. At the close, the Prince handed the colours to the officers appointed to receive them. The regiment having been formed up, the officers standing in front, his Royal Highness addressed them as follows:—"I consider it a high honour to present new colours to a regiment which, ever since it was raised in 1704, has had as brilliant a record of services in the field as any regiment in her Majesty's service. You first served with the great Duke of Marlborough in Flanders and then in America. Dettingen is the first name inscribed on your colours. In the great Peninsular War you especially distinguished yourselves, and suffered heavy losses at Corunna and Salamanca. At Quatre Bras and Waterloo you lost more than any other corps engaged, and the gallant Sir Thomas Picton was killed at the head of your regiment. Your next service was in India, where you took part in the Punjaub campaign. Later, in 1857, you greatly distinguished yourselves in the suppression of the Indian Mutiny, and gallantly held the presidency of Lucknow during its defence from June till November. You were on that occasion commanded by Brigadier-General Inglis, who for those services was created Major-General and a Knight Commander of the Bath, whilst you received the honour of being made light infantry. You, Colonel Stabb, are, I believe, the only officer of the regiment present who served during the mutiny. When, some years ago, I visited the remains of the Residency of Lucknow, my attention was especially called to the service of this regiment. On your return the Queen and my father inspected the regiment, and personally thanked the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men, for their gallant conduct at Lucknow; and I feel doubly proud, as their son, to have the honour of presenting these new colours to you to-day. The latest records on your colours are Egypt and Tel-el-Kebir. A second battalion, at this moment serving in the Soudan, has recently been added to you, which, with the Royal Cornwall Rangers Militia, of which I am the Honorary Colonel, and the two volunteer battalions, make up the Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry. From the title I bear, I am specially proud to be thus connected with this fine regiment." A brief reply from Colonel Stabb closed the proceedings, and the regiment was marched to barracks.

At Cork, on Wednesday, their Royal Highnesses were received by the Earl of Bandon and the members of the City and County Reception Committee, and Lord Bandon presented loyal addresses from that body and from the city and county magistrates. The Royal visitors were conducted to the School of Art, which has recently been enlarged. The streets were crowded, and the windows of the houses were full of spectators. The decorations were abundant; in King-street, a wide thoroughfare close to the railway station, and in Patrick-street the way was spanned by lines of flags, emblems, and mottoes, which had a striking effect. As their Royal Highnesses passed, hearty and repeated cheers were given. At the School of Art the Prince and Princess were received by the managers of the school, and went through various rooms in the new building. In reply to the address presented on behalf of the Cork Municipal Schools of Science, Art, and Music, the Prince of Wales said:—"Your School of Art is well calculated to carry out those principles for the furtherance of which my lamented father succeeded in the inauguration of a system of scientific and artistic education, and for the promotion of which I have myself done all that has lain within my power. I congratulate you from my heart on the patriotic munificence which has prompted the founder of this school to bestow his generous aid on a series of institutions so useful to the youth and manhood of your city. It will be a fitting recognition of his liberality that this building shall hereafter be called by the name which you have very properly selected for it, the Crawford Municipal School of Art." His Royal Highness then formally declared the school open, and the Royal party, leaving the school, proceeded to the Good Shepherds' Convent by Nelson's-place, Patrick-street, the Grand Parade, St. George's-street, Wellington Bridge, and the Female Prison, amidst repeated expressions of popular regard. Their Royal Highnesses were received at the convent by the Most Rev. Dr. Delany, Roman Catholic Bishop of Cork, and many of the clergy of the city, and were conducted through the dormitories, the laundry, and other rooms of the institution by the Bishop, the Lady Superior, and the Assistant Mother. The Good Shepherds is a Magdalene Asylum and a Reformatory for Young Girls, and contains at present 170 adults and 130 young persons. The visit lasted about half an hour, and on leaving, their Royal Highnesses expressed their gratification at the neatness and cleanliness which prevailed in every part of the establishment, and the admirable manner in which it appears to be conducted.

The Royal party afterwards proceeded to the Cathedral, the interior of which was filled by the clergy of the united diocese of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross, and by a number of ladies and gentlemen who had tickets of admission. The Prince and Princess were received at the cathedral by Dr. Gregg (the Bishop), Dean Madden, Archdeacon Archdale, and Chancellor Webster, who presented an illuminated address from the clergy of the diocese, bidding their Royal Highnesses a hearty welcome. The Royal visitors were conducted over the cathedral, the beauty of which they greatly admired. On leaving, the Royal cortége proceeded by Great George's-street, the Grand Parade, the South Mall, and Lapp's Bridge to the Custom House, where they embarked for Queenstown. During the whole of the route, a considerable portion of which was lined by the 11th Hussars, the same enthusiasm which marked the progress of their Royal Highnesses through the other parts of the city was again displayed. The Grand Parade and South Mall were gay with banners and bunting of every description and alive with people, and in the South Mall there were some very effective decorations displayed. At the Custom House there was a guard of honour of the Suffolk Regiment, who presented arms on the arrival of the Prince and Princess, while the immense crowds assembled in the vicinity cheered vociferously. The scene was a brilliant one, as all the vessels in the river displayed bunting, and the fineness of the weather enabled many persons to enjoy the spectacle from boats in the harbour. Their Royal Highnesses and suite having embarked on one of the river steam-boats, which had been provided by the Reception Committee, the vessel steamed away, the military band playing "God Bless the Prince of Wales," and the spectators renewing their acclamations. Several steamers followed, containing the members of the Reception Committee and their friends, as also Major-General Young, commanding the Cork district, and his staff.

The beauty of the river from Cork to Queenstown, and the magnificent harbour in which it terminates, has frequently been described. The number of steamers all fully freighted, and the small boats and yachts all gaily decorated, formed a scene the charm and attractiveness of which it would be difficult to overpraise. The steamer made a brief delay at Passage Docks, where the Prince and Princess landed in order that the Prince might lay the keel of the Government tank-ship, for which the docks have obtained the contract. Elaborate preparations had been made for the reception of the Prince and Princess, and numerous spectators were admitted to witness the ceremony. The Princess was presented on landing by Lady Arnott with a bouquet of flowers, and the ceremony of laying the keel having been gone through, the Royal party re-embarked and continued their progress to Queenstown. Three men-of-war in the harbour, the Minotaur, the Revenge, and the Northumberland, were gaily decked, and as the steamer came in and took up its position at the quay of the Island of Haulbowline, a naval and military station, the bluejackets manned the yards and a Royal salute was fired. Loud cheers also burst from the people assembled in great crowds on the island, and these were repeated as the Prince and Princess landed and were conducted along a carpeted covered way to the room in which the banquet was given by the citizens of Cork. This apartment was adorned in a most artistic manner, the ceiling and the walls being draped with red and white calico, and an immense variety of flags and banners being displayed. Great bunches of flowers hung down from the ceiling over all the tables, and these bore vases of flowering and foliage plants. The number of guests present was close on 500, and when the Prince and Princess entered the room the entire assemblage rose and cheered enthusiastically. The Earl of Bandon sat at the centre of the head table, and had on his right hand the Prince of Wales and Lady Bandon, while Prince Albert Victor and the Princess of Wales sat on Lord Bandon's left hand. At the conclusion of the banquet, Lord Bandon proposed "The health of the Queen," and afterwards "The health of the Prince and Princess of Wales." Both toasts were received with the utmost enthusiasm, a naval band placed in a gallery playing the appropriate airs. The Prince of Wales responded to the toast, and took leave of the company; the Royal party were conducted to their boat amidst loud cheers, and, as the vessel steamed from the quay, a salute was fired and the sailors again manned the yards. Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to Queenstown, where they were presented with an illuminated address by the Reception Committee of Queenstown. At night the ships of the Channel Squadron and the guard-ship at Queenstown were illuminated with the electric light and a variety of coloured lights, and there was a grand display of fireworks; the merchant-ships and the yachts in port also made effective displays.

The Prince and Princess of Wales must have thoroughly appreciated the quiet and repose which they enjoyed on Thursday at Convamore, after the bustle and excitement of their reception at Cork and Queenstown. It is satisfactory to be able to state that their Royal Highnesses were heartily welcomed by all the respectable inhabitants of Cork, and that the attempt at a counter demonstration, on their crossing "Parnell Bridge," proved an utter failure. The voices of the malcontents were drowned by the cheers of the loyal spectators, and those who took part in these discreditable scenes were, speaking generally, of the lowest class. The Cork Reception Committee are delighted at the response made to their appeal, and we are informed that the Prince has expressed himself highly pleased with his visit to Cork, and satisfied with the cordial reception given to him and to the Princess.

At Killarney their Royal Highnesses were greeted with the heartiest welcome by all classes of the people, and enjoyed two days of fine bright weather in exploring the romantic lake and mountain scenery of that neighbourhood. They returned to Dublin on Monday last, taking leave of their host and hostess, Earl and Countess Spencer. The people of Killarney bade them a respectful farewell. Addresses were presented at Tralee, but a number of people outside the station manifested a hostile spirit by hooting at the Royal party. Bands of Nationalists assembled at Abbeyfeale and Newcastle West, playing Irish national airs and waving pieces of black calico from poles and sticks, accompanying the demonstration with shouts and groans. Isolated parties of peasantry at other places also waved black flags and other emblems of displeasure. The reception accorded to the Prince and Princess at Limerick, however, overshadowed these unfavourable displays. Four thousand persons gathered in the station to welcome the Royal party, and the scene was one of great enthusiasm. Five addresses were presented, and in a general reply the Prince of Wales expressed regret that he could not visit other portions of Ireland, but promised to seize an opportunity of extending his acquaintance with the country and with Limerick. The Royal party then proceeded to Dublin. On Tuesday they visited Punchestown races, and they were to proceed to Belfast on board the Royal yacht Osborne. They were also to visit Derry, and to be the guests of the Duke of Abercorn at Baronscourt, at the end of this week. Further Illustrations will appear in our next.

THE NATIONAL AID SOCIETY.

Sir Robert Loyd-Lindsay, chairman of the National Society for Aid to the Sick and Wounded in War, has received a report from Mr. Kennett Barrington, the society's commissioner for the Red Sea district. This report is dated April 1, and tells in detail what has been done by the society in aid of the sick and wounded at Quarantine Island, which lies in the harbour off the town of Souakim, and in the neighbourhood.

The officers of the society were having a busy time, and the work was progressing most favourably. With regard to the medical staff, Professor Ogston arrived by the Ganges on March 15, and was attached to the first bearer company, under Surgeon-Major Wilson. He was actively employed in the field at Hasheen on March 20, and had since rendered valuable assistance in several serious operations. He was to start on April 2 on the Tamai expedition. Surgeons Piggott and Lake also arrived by the Ganges on the 15th, and were attached to the ship's staff, in which capacity they were actively engaged in attendance on the wounded. Afterwards, they were attached to the Base Hospital at H Redoubt, which is on the mainland, in a straight line between the town of Souakim and the Sandbag Redoubt. The energy and skill they displayed on board the Ganges were thoroughly appreciated by Principal Medical Officer Gibbon. Dr. Squire was also attached to the Base Hospital. Surgeon Newby had but just arrived.

It has already been stated that the Sisters sent out by the society have done good work in nursing the wounded, and the report states that both doctors and patients welcomed their arrival most cordially.

The loss of so many transport animals in the attack on the zereba on March 22 seriously affected the work of the society, and the report contains an account of what the officers of the society have done to conquer this difficulty. Much inconvenience was also found in transferring the sick and wounded from the piers to the hospital-ships, until Mr. Barrington purchased a steam-launch brought out in the steam-ship Iberia. The launch was to be called the Princess, in honour of the President of the Ladies' Branch of the National Aid Society.

The report deals with several other matters, such as the supply of necessaries for the sick, such as milk and ice, with the distribution and receipt of stores, and with financial matters.

Appended to the report is a list of the things required by the officers of the society, among which may be mentioned four cases of eau de Cologne, an aneroid thermometer, a hygrometer, with wet and dry bulb, three gazogenes of the largest size, 250 yards of antiseptic carbolized gauze, gauze bandages, 3 in. and 5 in., a hundred of each, and 20 yards of pink mackintosh.

A concert took place last week at St. Mark's School, Windsor, for the benefit of the National Aid Society (Princess Christian's Branch, for Windsor and neighbourhood). Princess Christian played several duets with Mr. Walter Parratt, of St. George's Chapel. Over £300 has already been collected in aid of the fund. Amongst the subscribers is the Queen, who has given £50 in stationery and other materials.

Lady Audrey Buller was among the speakers at a meeting held at Exeter yesterday week in support of the National Aid Society, and was warmly cheered on expressing the deep interest which she, as the daughter of a sailor and the wife of a soldier, felt in the work. She heartily thanked the ladies of Devon for the manner in which they had helped the work, £600 having been collected. The Earl of Devon and Sir Thomas Acland took part in the proceedings.

Under the patronage of the Duchess of Albany and Princess Frederica, two representations of Mr. John Farmer's opera, "Cinderella," will be given by an amateur company at the Albany Hall, Kingston-on-Thames, next Thursday, April 30, and Friday, May 1, in support of the funds of the National Aid Society. Miss José Sherrington will fill the title rôle, Mr. G. H. Betjemann is to be the stage manager, and Mr. Orton Bradley the conductor. Tickets can be obtained at Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.'s, 1, Berners-street, Oxford-street.

The National Aid Society are receiving newspapers for dispatch to the Soudan for the use of the troops, and any parcels may be sent to Mr. R. W. Coulcher, No. 50, Chancery-lane, W.C., who forwards them on the Monday and Thursday of each week.

In consequence of the unsettled state of foreign affairs, the Council of the National Rifle Association has decided not to send a team to Creedmoor this year.

A Civil List pension of £100 per annum has been awarded to Edward Scott Docker, Deputy Inspector-General of Hospitals, in recognition of his discovery of the uses of ipecacuanha in the treatment of dysentery, and of his services towards her Majesty's forces.

THE CHURCH.

The Bishop of London will hold the first confirmation in his new diocese at St. Alban's, Holborn, on May 17.

Within the last eight years, £40,000 has been spent upon Lichfield Cathedral.

The next anniversary festival of the Friends of the Clergy Corporation will be held at Willis's Rooms next Wednesday, the 29th inst., when the chair will be taken by the Duke of Northumberland, the president of the society.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has appointed Tuesday in Whitsun week (May 26) for the consecration of the Rev. W. Thornhill Webber as Bishop of Brisbane. The ceremony will take place at St. Paul's Cathedral.

The Bishop of London has intimated to Bishop Titcomb that he has confirmed him in the appointment of Bishop-Coadjutor for the Supervision of British Chaplaincies in Northern and Central Europe. Dr. Titcomb held the same office under the late Bishop Jackson.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has given his award in the Peterborough Cathedral controversy. He advises the appointment by the Dean and Chapter and Restoration Committee of an executive of seventeen to decide the question, failing which, his Grace recommends the first plan of rebuilding the tower as originally provided for be adhered to.

Dr. King, the Bishop-Elect of Lincoln, has expressed his intention of selling, if possible, the episcopal palace of Riseholme, and building a suitable residence for himself and his successors on the site of the old palace, under the shadow of the Cathedral. For the present, the new Bishop will reside in the city of Lincoln.

Earl Beauchamp on Saturday last laid the foundation-stone of the Church of St. Anselm, at Coventry Park, Streatham. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. R. Nicholl, Rector of Streatham, assisted by the Vicar-Designate, the Rev. F. A. S. Reid, and others. The new church is to cost £10,000; but for the present only the chancel is to be completed, at an estimated cost of £4000.

The Archbishop of York has presented the Rev. D. Speck, Rector of St. Crux, York, to the Vicarage of Langtoft-cum-Cottam, near Driffield, East Yorkshire. The living is of the annual value of £530, and is vacant through the death of the Rev. E. Trueman.—Sir Henry Ingilby, Bart., has appointed the Rev. W. T. Travis, graduate of Clare College, Cambridge, and Private Chaplain to the Earl of Scarborough, to the living of Ripley, Yorkshire.—The Rev. Andrew Johnston Hunter, chaplain, Luton, Herts, has been presented to the living of Mettishall, in Norfolk, by Gonville and Caius College.

The Temple Church, London, has lately been enriched by a fine stained-glass window of three lights, as a memorial to the last acting Master in Chancery, Mr. Charles Beavan. The window, though light, is rich in colour, and was executed by Ward and Hughes, of Frith-street, Soho-square.—Two Munich stained-glass windows have been placed in Newbattle church, Dalkeith, in memory of the late Mrs. Craig, the artists being Messrs. Mayer and Co.—Bishop Wilkinson and his family have presented to the church of Walsham-le-Willows a painted window, from the studio of Mr. Taylor, of Berners-street, in memory of their mother, forming a companion to one they recently erected to their father.

A meeting of the clergy and laity of the counties of Lincoln and Nottingham was held on Monday in the Consistory Court of Lincoln Cathedral, for the purpose of considering the subject of a memorial to the late Bishop Wordsworth. Lord Brownlow presided, and among the speakers were Lord Manvers, the Bishop of Nottingham, the Ven. Archdeacon Kaye, Mr. E. Heneage, M.P., the Ven. Archdeacon Maltby, Sir Hickman Bacon, the Rev. Canon Hole, Sir C. H. J. Anderson, Mr. C. C. Sibthorp, the Rev. Canon Perry, and the Rev. Sub-Dean Clements. It was unanimously resolved to provide a memorial to the late Bishop in the form of a recumbent effigy, to be placed in the cathedral.

The new Church of St. Clement, East Dulwich, was opened on Sunday, under license of the Bishop of Rochester, with a solemn service of dedication. Owing to the Bishop's illness, the consecration has had to be postponed, but the Bishop hopes to be able to consecrate the new building on Whit-Sunday. The church has been provided mainly by the liberality of Mr. Francis Peek, who contributed £8500 to the building fund, for the accommodation of a newly-populated district in the parish of St. John, Dulwich; and mission services have for some time been held in a temporary iron church in the poorest part of the district. About £700 was raised in the neighbourhood for the site, and several handsome gifts have been made by other friends. The church has been erected in the Early English style.

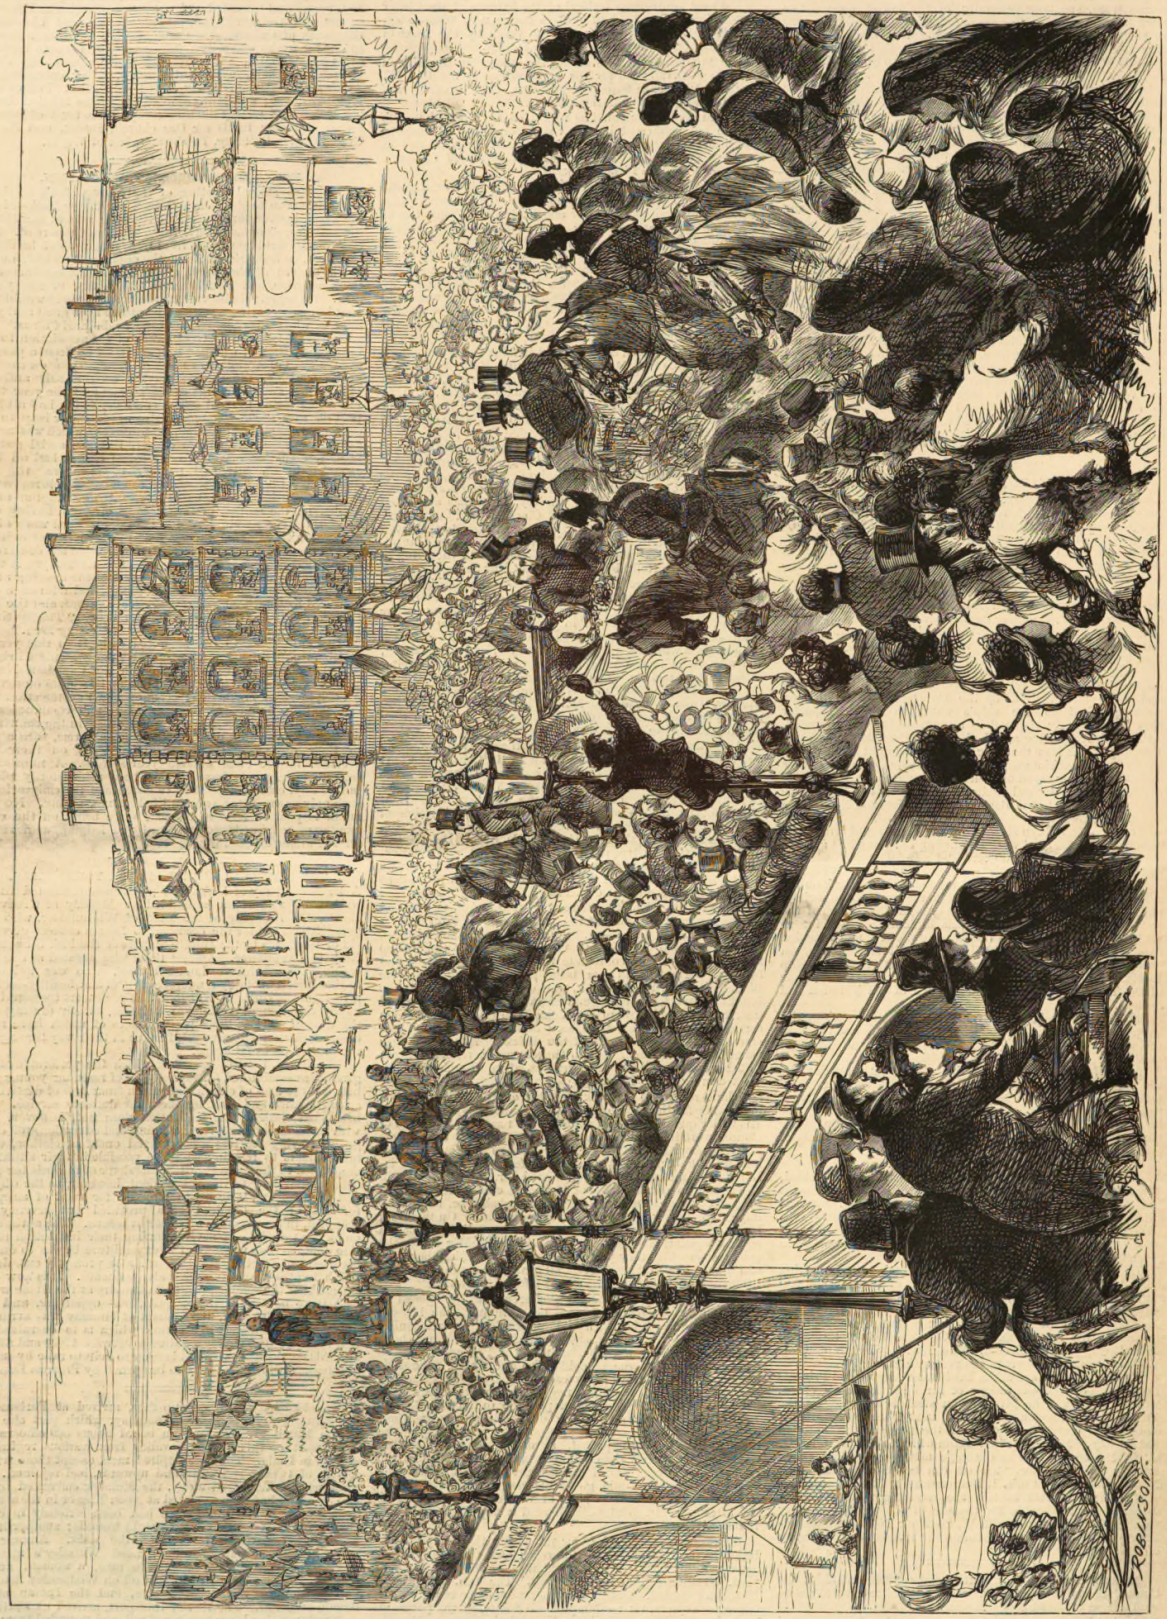
The Archbishop of York presided on the 16th inst. at a conference for the newly constituted Archdeaconry of Sheffield. His Grace quoted statistics showing the remarkable growth of Church work in the Archdeaconry during the last twenty-one years, and proceeded to consider various public questions affecting the Church, expressing his feeling that little legislation in its interests was to be hoped for. It would be vain to attempt to ask a House of Commons constituted like the present one, or as the next one would probably be, to take up any comprehensive work of Church legislation. On the other hand, they had much of what might be called protection against legislation; and he urged them to consider rather the good things which they possessed, the liberty which they had, and remember that the best of all protests against disestablishment proposals would be steady and useful work.

At the Winchester Diocesan Conference, which opened at the County Hall, Winchester, on the 16th inst., the Bishop, in his inaugural address, having referred to the removal of clerical and lay members, and to the efforts which had been made to provide for the spiritual needs of Portsmouth, spoke on the working of the Dilapidations Act, which, though it pressed heavily in very many cases, was really necessary, as before it came into operation neglect to repair the parsonage houses had caused a great loss of property to the Church. His Lordship also touched on the disestablishment question, saying that if the bill—which was promoted principally by the secularists—ever was passed, it would cause a greater revolution in society than had ever taken place. It was the poor man's Church; and if the measure ever became law, the poor man, who now could go to his church free, would have to pay to support whatever place of worship he attended. In the afternoon Mr. Sclater-Booth read a paper "On Church Defence."

The Incorporated Society for promoting the Enlargement, Building, and Repairing of Churches and Chapels held its usual monthly meeting, the first at its new offices, 2, Dean's-yard, Westminster, on the 16th inst. The Ven. Archdeacon Harrison presided. Grants of money were made in aid of the following objects, viz.:—Compton All Saints, in the parish of Leek, Staffs, £250; rebuilding St. John's Church, Morvil, near Fishguard, Pembroke, £50; enlarging or otherwise improving the accommodation in the churches at Little Bromley, near Manningtree, Essex, £50; Calthorpe St. Thomas, near Rugby, £35; South Darley, St. Mary, near Matlock, Derby, £25; Glarewm St. David, near Builth, £30; Heybridge, St. Andrew, near Maldon, Essex, £30; Llanrawel, St. Sawyl, near Llandilo, Carmarthen, £35; Puncknoll, St. Mary, near Bridport, £40; Sheerness, Holy Trinity, £60; and Llanybyther, St. Peter, Carmarthen, £40 in lieu of a former grant of £25. Grants were also made from the Special Mission Buildings Fund towards building mission churches at Tilcynon, in the parish of St. Fagan, Aberdare, £20; and Llanfair in the parish of Cwmamman, Carmarthen, £50. The following grants for works completed were also paid towards building St. Philip's, Hull, £300; rebuilding on a new site Christ Church, Northam, near Southampton, £250; enlarging St. Andrew's, Halstead, Essex, £30; St. Silas, Pentonville, Middlesex, £20; and Milton-street, Maidstone Mission Building, £25. The society likewise accepted the trust of sums of money as repair funds for Ore church, Sussex, and Norton Green Mission Building, Freshwater, Isle of Wight.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

The fortieth annual meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association was held on the 16th inst., at Exeter Hall—Mr. G. Williams, the treasurer, presiding. A letter from the Earl of Shaftesbury, who was to have taken the chair, was read. Lord Shaftesbury said he was far from well, a fact which he deeply regretted, as it deprived him of the opportunity which he had much desired of showing his respect for the conductors of the association, and his interest in the welfare of the young men. He regretted also that his enforced absence would prevent him from saying a few words concerning a great and good man, in whom they had lost a dear friend—Earl Cairns. The report mentioned the deep obligation of the association to Mr. Cameron Churchill, who had brought its affairs from a position of financial uncertainty to the state of a surplus on the past year's working, the receipts having been £8801, and the expenditure £8640. At the commencement of the year there was a loan owing to the bankers of £2000, which had all been paid off save £300. The committee appealed for help to pay off the mortgage debt of £8000, the interest of which was nearly £400 per annum. The Bible classes, lectures, social gatherings, foreign missions, and educational classes had all been attended by an increased number of members, the new departure made by the delivery of commercial lectures having excited a considerable degree of interest. The adoption of the report, on the motion of the Marquis of Ailsa, having been carried, the chairman referred to the international work of the association throughout the world, and to the letter of welcome sent to them by the Emperor of Germany when the conference of members of the association was held in Germany. A resolution was carried expressing the regret of the meeting at the indisposition of the Earl of Shaftesbury, and addresses were delivered by Canon Fleming, the Rev. J. Clifford, and the Rev. Professor Elmslie, the subject chosen being "The Spiritual, Intellectual, and Business Temptations of Young Men."



In connection with the projected emigration this year of members of British branches of the Young Men's Christian Association, steps have been taken in the Canadian North-West to ensure their proper reception and location on arrival. An employment bureau has been opened in connection with the Manitoba branch of the association, and communication established with leading farmers and others in the country to secure employment for the young men on farms, with a view to their ultimately taking up homesteads on their own account, at the close of one year's work. A number of intending emigrants have already been satisfactorily placed in this way, care being taken to encourage the emigration of such only as are fitted to farm life in a new colony. No premium is paid to farmers, a small wage being on the other hand expected, in addition to board and lodging, as a return for work done on the farm.

THE PRINCESS LOUISE HOME FOR YOUNG GIRLS.

A large company of ladies and gentlemen interested in the welfare of this Home assembled on Monday at Grosvenor House, the residence of the Duke of Westminster, who had permitted its use for the occasion, to hear a concert given in aid of the funds by the Jubilee Singers of the Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee. Among those who assisted at the proceedings was Princess Louise herself, who was welcomed to the concert-room by a number of trim and healthy-looking girls from the Home at Wanstead. The concert consisted of a happy selection of the negro melodies, mostly dealing with the days of slavery, their performances of which have made these dark-skinned minstrels famous in their way throughout the greater part of Europe.

The Home, for the benefit of which the performance was given, was established for the purpose of rescuing young girls between the ages of eleven and fifteen from lives of destitution or degradation and training them for domestic service. The beneficent work of the institution does not, however, stop with the completion of their training and education, for every girl on leaving receives a substantial outfit of clothes, while inducements to remain as long as possible in their situations are offered to them afterwards in the shape of rewards for good conduct and long service. Excellent, however, as the objects of the home are, it seems to languish for want of support, for out of the hundred beds provided but seventy are occupied, in consequence of deficient means. The authorities go on the principle of never allowing their institution to get into debt, so that whenever the expenditure begins to outrun the means of meeting it, the former is promptly cut down, which implies impairing its wider influence. It is now considered that the establishment of a laundry at the Home would help it to be almost, if not quite, self-supporting, and this being the jubilee year, the concert of Monday was arranged in order to give a start to the fund which is to be raised for that purpose. The money required is between £2000 and £3000, and this money it is proposed further to help to raise by means of a bazaar, which is shortly to be opened by Princess Louise.

The Malabar, Indian troop-ship, arrived at Portsmouth last Saturday afternoon from Bombay, which port she had left on March 21. She had on board about 500 officers and men, most of them being invalids from various regiments serving in India. The time-expired men, except those with a service of twenty-two years and upwards, had rejoined. At Suez, where she stayed a day, the Malabar embarked forty-two men who had been wounded at Abou Klea or in the attacks near Souakim. Some of these had been seriously injured. One of the men had as many as eight wounds; another had a wound of remarkable severity on the neck. Among the passengers was Major Swaine, Lord Wolseley's military secretary. During the passage two men, a woman, and a child died. The Malabar was paid off on Wednesday into the first division of the steam reserve, and the Indian stores remain on board. The Iberia, transport, arrived at Spithead on Sunday with a large number of sick and wounded from the Soudan. As, however, the jetties at the dockyard were occupied, and the invalids could not be forwarded to their destination, it was determined to detain the ship at Spithead till next morning.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND: THE ROYAL PARTY PASSING OVER "PARNELL BRIDGE," CORK.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND: STATE BALL AT ST. PATRICK'S HALL, DUBLIN CASTLE.

THE SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

The summer exhibition of this old-established society gives fresh and fuller evidence of its recent regeneration. Constituted as it avowedly is to offer a start to young artists, its exhibitions must always include a large proportion of rough and crude art; but there is now sufficient variety to make them attractive to the public as well as to the dealers. The President, Mr. John Burr, sets a good example with his "Peep into the Future" (296), a timid peasant girl who has come to learn her fortune of the village fortune-teller. The old woman, cards in hand, is leaning over the cottage-door, keenly eyeing the girl, who is sheepishly looking down, whilst she holds up the corner of her apron, as a shield against the old crone's pointed questionings. Mr. Gotch, the newly elected member, is hardly up to the level of some of his recent works in "A Fancy Portrait" (441), a model being arranged by the artist. The subject is not happily chosen, the painting somewhat coarse. On the other hand, such works as Mr. John White's "Fisherman's Daughter" (24), Mr. Rowland Holyoake's "Wandering Minstrel" (131), a scene in a village tap-room; Mr. Jacomb Hood's "Bunch of Blue Ribbons" (257), a full-length figure of a cavalier seated, display a rare combination of both strength and grace. Mr. W. Bromley's "Noughts and Crosses" (175) is a crowded village-school scene, conceived in the spirit of Wilkie and carried out with the dexterity of T. Webster. Among the landscapes also some are very far above the average, and many which smell more of the fields and the fresh air than of the studio and the lamp. Amongst such may be named Mr. H. Hollingdale's "Thames Back-water" (21), Mr. Aubrey Hunt's "Lagoons of Venice" (224) and the "Fishing Quarter of the Venetian Fishermen" (289), both giving a fresh grey rendering of Italian sky and water; Mr. C. W. Wyllie's "Essex Marshes" (394), loading a hay-boat; and Mr. Leslie Thomson's "Pool of Harbour" (385), a bit of dreamy evening landscape, very typical of the place and in strong contrast with the same artist's bright Kentish landscape "Near Rye" (443).

But among the principal attractions of this year's exhibition of the British artists must be reckoned the foreigners whom they have admitted with such ready fraternity. The teaching, too, of Mr. Whistler, who is not only very strongly represented, but has called into existence a number of promising pupils, must not be lost sight of. Mr. Whistler's principal work is a portrait of the violinist, Señor Sarasate, which the artist is pleased to call an Arrangement in Black (350). The musician is represented at full length, in evening dress, facing the spectator, and in the act of drawing his magic bow. The lines of his face as well as his pose have been seized with marvellous talent; and in such a work as this Mr. Whistler reveals to what heights he might attain if only he would always take pains. There are at least half a dozen other little Studies, Reveries, or what not from the same hand, all testifying to a refined imagination and an impatient hand. Of these, a Note in Grey (234) and Grey and Brown (244), studies of Dutch scenery, are those which attract us the most amongst his oil sketches, although they are scarcely so delicate in treatment as the Studies in Yellow and Silver (621), Red and Silver (635), and Grey and Silver (626), which Mr. Whistler has fantastically associated with Havre, Dordrecht, and London respectively. In Mr. Mortimer Mempes, who sends only one oil work, "Weary" (43), but half a dozen little Spanish water colours, Mr. Whistler has a pupil or imitator who does credit to his teacher. Gifted with much of his master's perception of atmospheric effect, he is at present more careful of defining the outline of his subjects; and for this his two courtyards (669 and 680) and his slight reminiscences of Seville (667) and Toledo (681) will gain him much attention. Mr. Harper Pennington is another of the school of Mr. Whistler, and his "White Girl" (40), and still more the companion-work (51), show him as one of the rising American artists who have studied with such good results in Paris. His portrait of "Mrs. Cornwallis West" (238) is something more than graceful, and displays powers of a very high order. Mr. W. T. Dannat is another Parisian American (not to be confounded with his namesake), who sends three very distinctive works—a "Spanish Peasant" (46) at work on some old brass pot, a study of an Old Man (474), and a Still Life subject (239). All are painted with remarkable strength and solid work, qualities which are also to be found in his countryman W. L. Picknell's "Stormy Day" (213), in which the gleam of sunlight from behind the storm-cloud is truthfully depicted.

There are many other works to which we should willingly refer if space permitted; but we must content ourselves with merely mentioning a few—such as Mr. Gow's "Summer Evening" (120), Mr. Boyle's "Old Ferry" (293), Mr. Gordon's "Gold Fish" (365), Miss Flora Reid's "Poor Little Victim" (397), Mr. A. B. Donaldson's "Delft" (460), in which the water is excellent, and Miss E. Armstrong's "Antoinette" (444). Mr. Alfred East's "Autumn Review" (451), Miss C. Wood's "Ptarmigan" (453), Miss Jane Dealy's "Care" (462), Mr. S. De Bréanski's "Blowing a Gale" (477), Mr. T. B. Hardy's "Dutch Herring Fleet" (552), Mr. Wyke Bayliss's interiors, especially those of "Lierre Cathedral" (586); and amongst flower-pieces, Miss Edith Lawrence's "Scarlet Poppy" (473) and Mr. Clifton Lin's "Narcissus" (288), which for faithful yet poetic rendering of Nature may compete with anything in the Gallery.

There is more boldness than originality in the intention announced by the managers of the Crystal Palace to provide accommodation for such pictures as, having escaped absolute condemnation from the jury of Academicians and Associates, are yet unable to find place on the walls of Burlington House. In France, a salon des réfusés was of common occurrence before the present building—which formed part of the first Exposition of 1855—offered space to all aspirants worthy of recognition. In this country, the need of some such key to the taste or fastidiousness of the Hanging Committee is far more necessary, for practically this small body, selected by hazard, has in its power to make or to mar many a young artist. In the present year, for instance, eleven thousand works are said to have been sent in for approval; and on the merits of these the whole body of Academicians and Associates had the right and power to express an opinion. Not one third succeeded in passing this ordeal, whilst of these a fair proportion were accepted only under reserve. But of the four thousand pictures, &c., thus accepted there is space for scarcely more than two thousand in the rooms of Burlington House, and it is in the selection of these that the delicate duties of the Hanging Committee chiefly consist. None but full-blown Academicians are permitted to form part of it—their process is secret, and their decision irrevocable. They have only one law which they are called upon to obey—to hang in the best places their own works and those of their brother Academicians, and to find room on the line for the works of the Associates. The remainder of the space is generously given up to outsiders; but how the selection is made from a number of works, all presumably of more than average merit, no one can tell. The Directors of the Crystal Palace propose to let some light in upon the methods of the Hanging Committee, and they now offer to accept and convey to Sydenham, free of cost and without further question, all works which have passed the open vote of the whole body, but have failed to find grace in the eyes of the irresponsible Committee of Five—who, with Venetian secrecy, finally decide as to what shall be shown to the public with the official sanction of the Royal Academy.

At the St. James's Gallery (King-street, St. James's), where Mr. Mendoza has brought together a bright little collection of works—mostly of the cabinet size—by British and foreign artists, the chief objects of attraction will be Mr. S. E. Waller's "'Twixt Love and Duty," designed as a companion work to "The Day of Reckoning," which has acquired very considerable popularity. Mr. Waller has, on this occasion, gone back some few steps in the life of his hero and heroine, and, in this picture, represents the elopement with which they open their married life. The horses are standing at the park gate, the groom is busily tightening the girth of the one on which the young and half-reluctant girl is about to mount. The figures of the chief actors are less satisfactory than the rendering of the horses; but the scene, with its view of the avenue to the old house, is well composed, and lends itself admirably to engraving and photography. Three of the sketches made by the late Hans Makart for the cavalcade which greeted the Emperor and Empress of Austria on the occasion of their silver wedding, have a certain interest; but they must not be judged by the severe rules applicable to more finished works. The portrait (self-executed) of the painter, habited as Rembrandt, riding beside the Fine-Arts Car, will recall to those who saw the procession one of its most interesting features—of which the most striking part were reproduced at the time in this Journal. Among other works in Mr. Mendoza's Gallery, Mr. James Webb's charming bits of English river and coast scenery, Mr. J. B. Burgess's and Mr. Yeend King's finished studies of female heads deserve notice. Mr. Alex. H. Burr's "Saying Grace," a child with a dog at table, shows to far greater advantage as a picture, on account of its delicate colouring, than when reproduced in our Christmas Number; and Mr. Sealey's "Peace or War," two fox-terriers, is an animated study of dog-life. Simonetti's "Gate of the Château," Gianetti's "Biondina," and Paoletti's "Afternoon Amusement," are among the best of the foreign works.

Messrs. Hogarth and Sons have on view, in their small gallery (96, Mount-street, Grosvenor-square), a collection of water-colour drawings and sketches by R. P. Bonington, which will furnish a rare treat for all lovers of true art. It has been truly said by an eminent French critic that England has abandoned to France too easily her claim to one of her most gifted sons, and allows without a protest Bonington's works to be classified in the Louvre catalogue among those of French artists. Richard Parkes Bonington was born near Nottingham in 1801, and at the age of fifteen went to Paris, where he first studied in the atelier of Gross and in the Louvre Gallery. He soon afterwards began to exhibit at the Salon, and, in 1824, gained the gold medal—a similar distinction being awarded in the same year to his countryman John Constable. Bonington was the intimate associate of the leading French artists of his day, and especially of Paul Huet, the landscape painter, whose delicacy of colour and grace of touch are plainly revealed in the collection now brought together. In 1828 he suddenly returned to London, and died obscurely in Pentonville before reaching his twenty-seventh birthday. The sketches in Messrs. Hogarth's Gallery afford abundant evidence of the versatility of Bonington's style. He can give the wonderful effects of a "Sea Mist and Ground Swell" (7) with as much truth as the rich shades of a "Mountain Sunset" (30). He is as much at home on the banks of the Thames in the "Old Red House at Battersea" (55) and in an almost Turner-like rendering of "Old London Bridge" (42) as on the "Kentish Coast" (17), or at "Amsterdam" (32) and "Dort" (41). It is in his sea pieces and coast scenes that he is most successful, never descending to tricks or devices to obtain his object, but relying upon the resources of an art which was essentially pure and simple, he achieved results which few have surpassed.

Messrs. Hollender and Cremetti do not allow the grass to grow under their feet; and, in quick succession to their winter exhibition, have again filled the Hanover Gallery with a variety of works of various foreign schools by masters either now living or recently deceased. Amongst the most important are—"A Rainy Day in Flanders" (28), by J. H. L. De Haas, two groups of girls and cattle, painted with very remarkable vigour and feeling; P. Van der Velden's "Poor Widow" (75), a cottage scene; L. Weldon Hawkin's "Geese" (77), a girl in an orchard, recalling at once Millet and Bastien Le Page; and "A Tempest" (113), by Courbet, one of the most characteristic and impressive works by this scarcely appreciated artist. When we mention that there are also two good specimens of Meissonier's work—a portrait of "A French Senator" (147) and the "Solitary Journey" (89), a horseman on a dreary heath—both painted in the artist's earlier vein; F. J. Millet's "Old Wall" (189), one of his typical works; a brilliant Alma Tadema, "In the Days of Constantine" (81); besides works by Corot, Daubigny, Diaz, and other celebrities, we have said enough to show that a visit to the Hanover Gallery will amply reward those who care for foreign art. We must not, however, omit to notice the very clever Soudanese collection by M. R. De Bellot—a series of heads and portraits, including one of the Mahdi himself, which, if not actually painted from life, was reproduced from studies made in the country. The face is by no means an unattractive one, and is certainly quite devoid of ferocity; but there is a decided look of astuteness, if not of cunning, in the cold, hard eyes of the "False Prophet." He is represented holding a large rosary of amber beads, and dressed in a somewhat gaudy costume, in no way conveying the idea of a man devoted only to wielding the sword of Islam.

The annual meeting of the Art Union of Ireland was held on the 17th inst., in the Royal Hibernian Academy, Dublin, when the distribution of prizes took place. The Lord Lieutenant won the first prize in the drawing, and there were thirty others, Mr. Gibson, M.P., being amongst the winners. The report stated that 433 new subscribers or more than half the entire number, had been registered, during the year. Lord Powerscourt gave the opening address, and congratulated the Academy on its prosperity. The sales of works of art appeared to be increasing both in number and importance, and the general standard of merit in the students had been decidedly higher of late years. The works exhibited kept up a very high standard, and a most praiseworthy course had been adopted of admitting a number of inmates of public institutions as free pupils. One of their pupils, Mr. Moonan, had for the first time gained the first place among art scholars in Antwerp. He referred to the industry of Irish students at Continental art schools, and felt certain it would enable Irish artists to raise the standard of excellence here in rivalry with the paintings of any other land. His Lordship then alluded to the progress made towards the erection of the Museum of Science and Art, and referred with great hope to the development of art in Ireland.

We regret to have to announce the death on 11th instant, at Falmouth, of Mr. J. G. Philp, who, for many years, has occupied a prominent place amongst English water-colour artists. Mr. Philp was heartily attached to his native county, Cornwall; and it may be said that he was instrumental in making its beauties—especially those of its rocky shores, known and appreciated by his spirited and sympathetic work. To the Exhibition of the New Society of Painters in Water Colours—now the Royal Institute—of which he was a member, he was a regular contributor up to the close of his life.

HISTORICAL PORTRAIT EXHIBITION IN PARIS.

There was a large attendance on Monday at the opening of the Historical Portrait Exhibition, at Paris, of which the Times' Correspondent gives the following account:—Nothing is more striking than the portrait, by an unknown painter, of Napoleon's mother, side by side with one of her sons, the resemblance being unmistakable. A shudder is caused by the sight of "Fieschi's Head," painted by Bracassa "the day after his execution," and signed with blood from his wounds. The "Death of Marat," by David, is equally striking. All the French dynasties since the Revolution are represented. The Orleans line is recalled by a picture of the Duchesse d'Orléans, with the Duc d'Orléans and the Duc d'Aumale; the Second Empire by a horseback portrait of Napoleon III.; the Republic, by Dufaure and Gambetta; the Left Centre, by M. Léon Say; the Royalists, by the Duc De Broglie; and the Opportunists, by M. Proust, who personifies their artistic capacities. The English School is admirably illustrated by Gainsborough (portrait of an unknown lady), Sir Thomas Lawrence's "Lady Ellenborough," and by Reynolds' "Lady Harcourt," "Lafayette," and "Mrs. Parker." There is also a portrait by George Romney. Madame Récamier, by Gros; Napoleon and the Princesse De Broglie, by Ingrès; Beaumarchais and Napoleon, by Greuze; Louis Philippe and his sons, by Horace Vernet; and the Princesse De Beauvan by Fragonard, will attract much notice. Among other deceased painters represented are Chardin, Courbet, Couture (portrait of Michelet), Cot, Delacroix, Paul Delaroche, Duplessis, Flandrin, Géricault, Guérin, Angélique Kauffmann, Madame Lebrun, E. Manet, Prudhon, Ary Scheffer and Henry Scheffer. Among living artists are MM. Cabanel, Paul Baudry, Béraud, Bonnat, Carolus Duran, Duez, Tantin Latour, Gervex, Hébert, Henner, Lefebvre, and Meissonier. The exhibition has been excellently organised and arranged by M. De Rothan, the well-known diplomatic author, the Vicomte d'Haussonville, and the Comte De Vogüé.

The Goldsmiths' Company have given a donation of £10 to the Bethnal-green Free Library.

Messrs. Allsopp and Co. have become guarantors to the Indian and Colonial Exhibition at South Kensington next year for the amount of £2000.

A large number of steamers arrived at Liverpool last week with live stock and fresh meat on board from America and Canadian ports. The arrivals amounted to 1771 cattle, 504 sheep, and 13,086 quarters of beef, and 2425 carcases of mutton.

The Royal Botanic Society have on view in their garden in Regent's Park their annual show of azaleas and rhododendrons. The plants shown are the more delicate kinds, requiring protection from the frost, and are therefore kept under glass.

A handsome new school and master's house was opened on April 16 in the parish of Upton, near Chester, built by Colonel Humberston and his sisters. The Duke and Duchess of Westminster and the gentry of the neighbourhood took part in the proceedings.

The Skinners' Company have voted one hundred guineas towards the funds of the Metropolitan Public Gardens Association, to assist them in carrying out their work of improving and throwing open to the public, for their use and enjoyment, disused burial-grounds and neglected gardens in London.

The monument erected in the village of Ormiston, East Lothian, as a memorial to the late Dr. Moffat, who laboured as a missionary in Africa more than half a century, was unveiled last Saturday by Sir William Muir, Principal of Edinburgh University.

The new premises of the Royal Colonial Institute in Northumberland-avenue will be ready for occupation in June next. A sum of nearly £4000 has been subscribed to the building fund by public bodies and persons interested in the colonies. This amount includes twenty-eight contributions of £100 each, many of which came from Australia. The Council desire to relieve the building from debt before it is opened.

The Easter scholarships at Uppingham School have been awarded as follows:—F. R. Earp, from the Rev. W. Vale-Bagshawe, the Lower School, Uppingham; J. R. Gaussen, from Mr. E. Gossing, Cornwall-road, London; and H. E. G. Wylie, from Mr. A. M. Curteis, Hillside, Godalming, were recommended for scholarships of £30 each. The scholarships of £50 were not awarded.

The remains of the late Lord Mayor Nottage were placed in St. Paul's Cathedral last Saturday after a very impressive service, at which a large congregation attended. The present Lord Mayor and Sheriffs went in their state coaches, accompanied by a procession of City officials, and all the way from the Mansion House the streets were densely thronged by spectators. The coffin, which was covered with flowers, was placed on a catafalque beneath the dome until the conclusion of the service, when it was removed to the crypt.

At Owens College, Manchester, on Saturday last, Mr. Goschen, M.P., addressed a meeting of delegates from Trades Unions, Working Men's Clubs, and other bodies in connection with a conference promoted by the Working Men's Clubs Association. The conference was called to consider a scheme for providing lectures for working men, and the right hon. gentleman urged the importance in this respect of the London Society for the Extension of University Teaching, and pointed out the value of intellectual culture to the working classes.

Primrose Day, in memory of the late Lord Beaconsfield, was celebrated last Saturday in London and throughout the country even more generally than on any former occasion. On Sunday, the anniversary of his Lordship's death, a wreath of primroses sent by the Queen was placed on his grave at Hughenden. Lord John Manners presided on Saturday evening over a Primrose League banquet, in St. James's Hall, at which upwards of 600 gentlemen were present. The toast of the evening, "The Primrose League," was proposed by Lord Randolph Churchill. Viscount Bury, Sir H. Hoare, M.P., Mr. Sclater-Booth, M.P., and other well-known Conservatives also spoke to toasts.

The council of the Social Science Association have unanimously passed a resolution to the effect that—in prospect of a general election in the month of November—it is undesirable to hold a congress during the present year. They have therefore been reluctantly compelled to decline the invitation received from the city of Bath to meet there in the forthcoming autumn, but they have expressed a hope that the invitation from that city may be renewed for the year 1886. It has, however, been referred to the executive committee for consideration and report whether a conference of a more limited nature should not be organised in London on some special subject or subjects to which it may be considered desirable to call attention.

NEW BOOKS.

Mention has already been made in these columns of two or three art-handbooks originally published in French, but recently made known to English readers through the medium of translations. Foremost amongst these is M. Ernest Chesneau's "English School of Painting"; and of scarcely less value are M. Wauter's "Flemish School" and M. Mathias Duval's "Artistic Anatomy." These works form part of a very admirable series now being published in Paris under the auspices of the Ecole des Beaux-Arts. It is very much to be regretted that with the resources at the command of the trustees of the British Museum, or of the Directors of the South Kensington Museum, something has not been produced more didactic than the bare catalogues of the former, or more popular than the expensive and practically useless handbooks of the latter. Our French neighbours are in such respects far in advance of us in the art of popularising art instruction, and the French Academy, the highest literary authority of the country, has recognised the services of the Bibliothèque de l'Enseignement des Beaux-Arts (in which the above-named works first appeared) by awarding to its publisher, M. A. Quantin, the much-coveted "couronne" for services rendered to education. Among the most recent volumes of this series, that on La Mythologie Comparée de la Grèce, by M. Max Collignon, deserves especial notice. In a certain sense, this work is the necessary sequel to his "Archéologie Grecque," one of the first volumes of the series, in which the author briefly but lucidly sketched the history of the development of Greek art, illustrating each period by drawings of its most remarkable monuments. In his later volume M. Collignon traces the various phases through which the principal mythological types passed before they became fixed by artistic tradition. The earliest form under which any Hellenic divinity is known to us, is perhaps the figure represented on the Myra coin, supposed to be the Mother of the Gods among the branches of a cedar-tree, suggesting a remote period in which the tree itself was held sacred, or was the object of direct devotion. From this point onwards, the tendency of the Greek mind was to associate human figures as types with abstract ideas, as may be traced in the vase-painting of early times. Abstract ideas, such as Sleep and Death, were early represented by sensible forms. Later, symbolism began to play a part, and we find Fate, Justice, Injustice, and the like translated into human shapes. Once, however, the types and attributes of the gods fixed by general consent, the infinite resources of the Greek mind were brought into play, and long after the sculptor's art had ceased to be exclusively religious, it retained traces of its mythological origin. It is the history of their development which M. Collignon has described with great charm of style. He puts before the readers the result of the arduous labours of the principal German and French writers on the subject; and, by the aid of numerous excellently executed illustrations, he offers a most fascinating as well as a most instructive volume. It must always, we suppose, remain an enigma how a volume of this literary value, enriched with upwards of 130 admirable reproductions of Greek statues, printed in excellent type and solidly bound, can be sold to the public for less than four shillings.

We are glad to see that Messrs. Bell and Sons have at length included in their famous Aldine edition of the poets The Poetical Works of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by T. Ashe, B.A. 2 vols. The series, it is scarcely necessary to say, contains no volumes more conspicuous for all the finer attributes of poetry. It is remarkable that one of the greatest poets of this century should have done his best work two years before the century commenced. Coleridge's poetical life was a short one, and the eventful year of that life was 1797-8. In the autumn of the former year he wrote "The Ancient Mariner," and before that season came round again he had composed the first part of "Christabel," "Lewti," "France; an Ode," "Fears in Solitude," "Kubla Khan," and "The Three Graves." "Love," a supremely beautiful lyric, was printed in 1799, but may have been written during the period which Mr. Pater justly calls his annus mirabilis. Coleridge has been dead for half a century, and it is possible that some of our readers, living under the sunshine of more recent poets, may be unfamiliar with his witchery. They cannot but feel it if they will take these volumes with them into the woods or fields and read the choicest passages aloud. Thus and thus only will they be able to appreciate Coleridge's entrancing melody and the wealth of his imagination. As a poet, he is unlike any of his contemporaries, and his profound admiration of Wordsworth has left few traces in his verse. In richness of colouring and daintiness of fancy he has perhaps more affinity with Keats; but he has his special place in the temple of fame, and a noble place it is. Poetry is but one gift among many possessed by this "myriad-minded" man. As a thinker, he has influenced some of the most powerful minds of the century; as a critic, especially of the noble art he loved, he is unsurpassed for subtlety and depth. The sad story of Coleridge's life has yet to be told at length. Mr. Traill's brief narrative in "English Men of Letters" makes the reader anxious to learn more; Mr. Ashe's elaborate introduction describing the events of the poet's life will not satisfy curiosity. The writer, by-the-way, is singularly unjust to Southey, and many of his exclamatory remarks appear to be uncalled for. Here are two instances: Southey writes "The tidings of his (Coleridge's) death would come upon me more like a stroke of lightning than any evil I have ever yet endured." To think of that! is Mr. Ashe's comment on the statement. "Coleridge and I," writes Southey, "are the best companions possible in almost all moods of mind." Almost! the editor exclaims.

It is the little rift within the lute.

To those who know how noble and generous Southey was, what burdens he bore for others, what duties he fulfilled, comment is here superfluous. Every editor has his method, and apart from the remarks on Southey, the little familiarities in which Mr. Ashe indulges, and such comments as "Coleridge is not perfect. His bane was egotism and self-consciousness," and "Coleridge when crossed had the petulance of a spoilt child," will amuse rather than offend. Enough that with great labour Mr. Ashe has produced a carefully accurate edition of a poet whose verse, slight as to quantity, is assuredly priceless in value.

The Dawn of Day (3 vols., J. and R. Maxwell), by the author of "Thy Name is Truth," is a novel with a purpose. Inspired by a strong sympathetic feeling for the poverty of the labouring class, and more especially for the working artisan and those toilers herded together in towns and cities, the author lays bare, with a powerful hand, the wrongs and the sufferings which that class but too often undergo. The grievances of the poor against the rich, which in many cases are greatly magnified, and in some are wholly imaginary, are largely dwelt upon. One misfortune, no doubt, is that in large towns the poor are crowded together, and poverty is laid away by itself: the rich landlords know nothing of their tenants; and a great deal of misery, undeserved in many instances and in all cases heartrending, is concealed from the eyes of those who could and would relieve it. The fact seems almost forgotten that there is a large section of the human race, who, far from despising the poor, spend their money, energy—nay, more, their lives, in working for or amongst them. One burning question of the day is thus characterised—that it should be possible for an idle fool to be a millionaire, and an industrious artisan a pauper, or very near it. But it is ignored that much of the idle fool's inheritance goes to ameliorate the condition of the poor. The many betwixts and betweens preventing the consumer receiving direct from the producer is a crying evil not touched on in these pages, although the tirade against landlords would have been more truthfully and effectively directed against these middle men. As a fact, although the disadvantages of the landlord system are always placed in glaring relief, its advantages are rarely, if ever, fairly realised or correctly stated. At the same time, the evil of the great poverty of the masses is pressing, and calls for instant relief. This evil "The Dawn of Day" brings prominently forward, and so far carries out a mission, which would have been still further fulfilled had the views expressed with regard to its redress been less extreme. The author, with commendable rapidity, takes the reader at once into the action of the story, and without delay the threads of the loom play into one another, and the web is woven with workman-like skill. So admirable is the construction of the novel, that it is the more to be regretted that in many instances the pages are marred by vulgarisms, strained metaphors, and a phraseology which, aiming at originality, is only far-fetched, ridiculous, or involved. The oculist, when sitting in his easy-chair "reclines his fine figure in its soft curves"; on another occasion, "lines of thought stood out prominently on his face, under the rays from the silver disc of the goddess above," the democratic shoemaker has a "corrugated face," Charlie Abbott is a "blue-blooded aristocrat" with "fine blue orbs," and when Mrs. Lurt weeps, her "ocular sluice-gates give way before a crystal flood." A nineteen-inch corset is not a refined or poetical way of expressing a waist, nor can a wardrobe be the proud possessor of an "inner consciousness" out of which "evening garbs are evolved!" The account of the want of grief on Sir Blake Harman's death is too flippant, the love scenes are good, the description of the Quaker family charming, and throughout the book the noble ministry, which is woman's highest mission, is portrayed faithfully in its beauty, energy, and untiring zeal.

The smoke of London has many sins to answer for, one of them, and not the least, being that it prevents the growth of roses in our suburban gardens. The loveliest of flowers, however, lives and blooms still in the pages of the poets, and in Ros Rosarum ex Horto Poetarum (Elliot Stock) "E. V. B." has undertaken to gather "Dew of the ever-living Rose from the Poets' Gardens of many lands." The collection is very complete, we had almost said too complete, for in several instances the passages chosen can be scarcely said to relate to the rose, although the name of the flower appears in them. The epistle "To the Gentle Reader," quaintly and fantastically written, has some pleasant talk about roses, and fitly introduces us into a lovely poetical garden full of scent and colour. And the rose-gatherer has not been satisfied with collecting her flowers from all familiar sources, ancient and modern, but has managed to obtain some fresh specimens from living poets. Here, for example, are some lines of Lord Tennyson's, hitherto unpublished:—

> The night with sudden odour reel'd,
> The southern stars a music peal'd,
> Warm beams across the meadow stole;
> For Love flew over grove and field,
> Said, "Open, Rosebud, open! Yield
> Thy fragrant soul!"

Unfortunately, as "E. V. B." reminds us, many of the roses fashionable in these days of rose shows have not a fragrant soul, and are remarkable only for colour and form.

Before revision, which does not appear to have been at all required, could be completed, and before publication was an accomplished fact, the contents of the handsome volume entitled Sport: by W. Bromley Davenport, M.P. (Chapman and Hall), had been added suddenly by a very melancholy occurrence to the list of works which are called post-humous. The pages are so full of life, vigour, and sense of enjoyment, that there is the greater difficulty in realising the truth, in understanding that the writer will write no more. This consideration, however, will enhance rather than diminish the intrinsic interest of the book, which is profusely illustrated by Lieutenant-General Henry Hope Crealocke, C.B., C.M.G., who, being evidently an accomplished draughtsman, though he does sometimes seem to take a little liberty with a horse's off fore-leg (see p. 11, especially), has ably and finely fulfilled the task which "he began out of regard for an old friend, and which he has completed as a tribute to his memory." The subjects treated of in the volume, and treated of in the "light and pleasant" style of articles contributed to a popular magazine, are fox-hunting, salmon-fishing, covert-shooting, and deer-stalking. Whether experienced sportsmen will derive more than satisfaction and amusement from the volume it is for them to decide after due perusal, but it is quite certain that many persons who talk and write about sport, without being themselves in any sense sportsmen, will find the essays a very useful corrective on some points and very instructive generally. The tone, moreover, is delightfully fresh and exhilarating, the spirit of a true sportsman pervading the whole. There are some very hard things said about "humanitarians" and the state of affairs they are likely to produce, if they have their way, in course of time; but it is quite clear that he who said the hard things was himself humane enough at bottom, and everybody's sympathy must, or ought to be, roused by the few simple words in which he has told how even he, a keen fox-hunter, could not find it in his heart to betray the skulking-place of the "beaten" fox that he had been pursuing when it looked up at him with pleading eye. Of course, the question of sport and its cruelty is a very difficult one to deal with; and certainly cannot be dealt with here. On the other hand, sport, as this book will prove, is a joyous thing, even to read about, and has a great deal that is wholesome and manly about it. The author inserted some very good anecdotes among his own original remarks; and it is scarcely necessary to add that he introduced a little political sentiment and struck a few hard blows at the Government.

The sixth course of Cantor Lectures at the Society of Arts was begun on Monday, the subject being "Photography and the Spectroscope," by C. W. De W. Abney. R.E., F.R.S.

At the Synod in Dublin last week the Dean of the Chapel Royal presented the seventh annual report of the Church of Ireland Temperance Society. It stated that the society has now 625 branches in active operation, showing an increase of twenty during the year, and altogether some 90,000 members have been enrolled since the society was started.

A meeting of shareholders in the London, Brighton, and South Coast, the South Eastern, and the London, Chatham, and Dover Railways was held last week, at the Guildhall Tavern, to consider the relations of the three undertakings to each other, when it was decided that an amalgamation or working agreement was most desirable.

THE STRENGTH OF THE ARMY.

A Bluebook was issued on Monday containing a preliminary return of the British Army for the year 1884. The return has been prepared, in anticipation of the general annual return, by the Commander-in-Chief, for the information of the Secretary of State for War.

The total effective strength of all ranks of the British Army last year was, on Jan. 1, 181,227. For the first six months of the year the number did not vary greatly. On July 1 it was 181,580, and on the 1st of every succeeding month it had somewhat increased, until on Dec. 1 it had reached 188,216, giving an average for the twelve months of 183,004. The principal arms that go to make up this total are:—Household Cavalry, 1301; Cavalry of the Line, 15,607; Horse Artillery, 4276; Artillery, 27,451; Engineers, 5573; Foot Guards, 5852; Infantry of the Line, 115,245; Colonial Corps, 2348. Of these 183,004 of all ranks, 7097 were commissioned officers, 623 warrant officers, 12,186 sergeants or farriers, 3302 were trumpeters, drummers, or buglers, and 159,796 rank and file.

More than one half of the Army were in 1884 employed abroad. Thus while on an average 62,165 men of all ranks were stationed in England, 29,424 in Ireland, and only 3400 in Scotland, making a total of 89,994 for the United Kingdom, no fewer than 93,010 were on service abroad. By Jan. 1, 1885, the numbers had risen to 188,657, and of these 87,999 were stationed at home, 15,269 in Egypt, 26,013 in the Colonies, and 57,928 in the East Indies. The rest were on passage from one station to another.

Table 7 gives the average strength of the Army for every year since 1865. In the first of these twenty years it was 208,877, and on Jan. 1 in that year the number was as high as 213,968. The strength has never been reached since. The average gradually sank until 1870, when the number was 180,444, and after some fluctuations it reached the highest point it had attained in the last decade in 1878, when, owing to the mobilisation of the First Class Army and Militia Reserves, the average number was 200,758. On Jan. 1 of last year the number was less by nearly 9000.

Other interesting details are given in the book. The recruits who joined the Regular Army in the year 1884 were 35,653 from all sources, a far larger number than in any year since 1870. Of these 22,399 were under twenty years of age: 11,126 were under 5 ft. 5 in. in height; and 11,161 were over 5 ft. 7 in. As many as 3140 were under 33 in. round the chest, 9181 were under 34 in., 11,934 under 35 in. and 11,238 over that measurement. The total number of desertion was 4478, but as 1568 rejoined the ranks, the net loss was 2910. The net loss from this cause in twenty years has been 53,749. The total number of men transferred from the Regular Army to the First Class Army Reserve was 11,199, less than half the number in 1883, when it was 23,529. The Army Reserve numbered 39,286 in Class I. and 7731 in Class II. on Jan. 1 of this year.

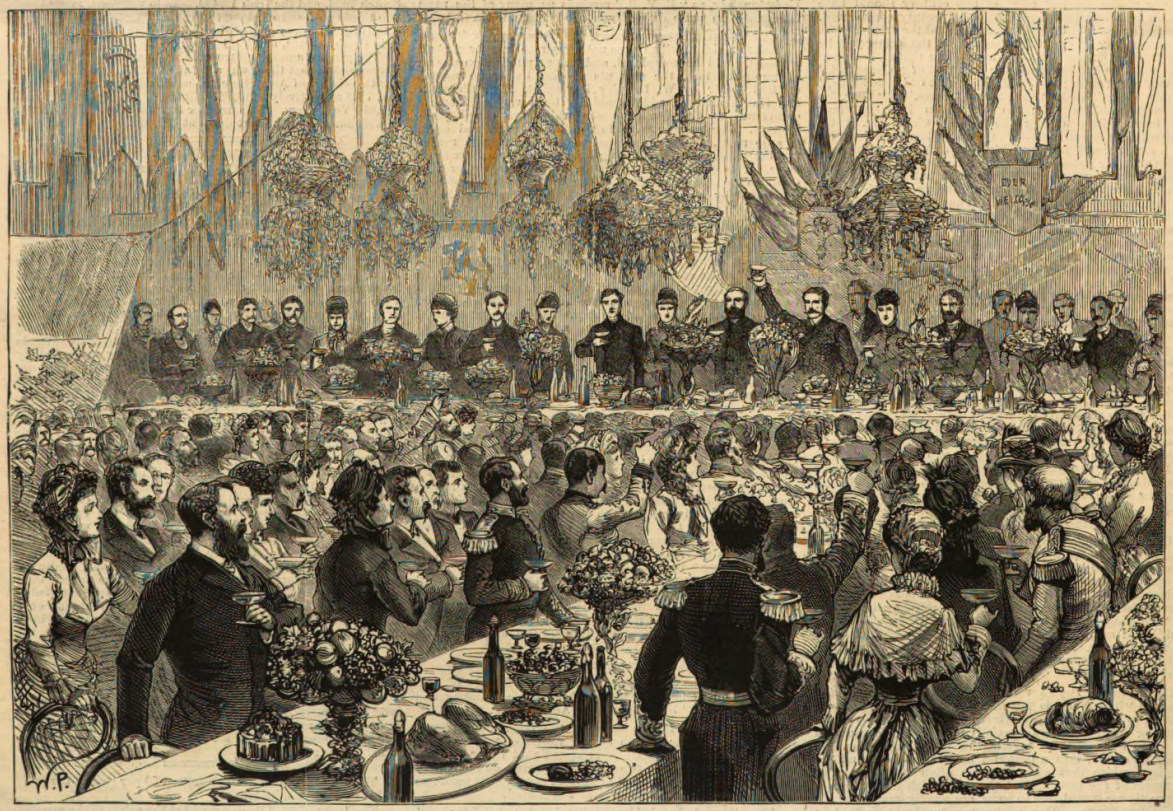
There were 7128 courts-martial held in connection with 10,040 offences, of which the commonest were making away with necessaries, desertion, and absence without leave. There were no offences in relation to the enemy, none under the head of mutiny, and no sentence of death was passed. In 13,075 cases fines were inflicted for drunkenness. On the other hand, 1491 men were in possession of good-conduct medals, and 22,957 of good-conduct badges at the beginning of this year.

A census of the 84,263 men who were serving at home on that date was taken, both to test their nationalities and their religious denominations. The English numbered 62,712, the Scotch 7003, and the Irish 13,439. As to religions, more than two thirds profess to belong to the Church of England, which claims 56,993 worshippers, while 16,260 were Roman Catholics, 6640 Presbyterians, and 3788 Wesleyans.

The general annual return of the Reserve and Auxiliary Forces shows that there was a total of 387,314 made up from the two classes of Army Reserve, as already mentioned, 39,286 and 7738 respectively; 113,787 Militia, 11,488 Yeomanry, and 215,015 Volunteers. This number falls short by 61,750 of the establishment, which is set down at 449,064.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

At a meeting of the Royal Colonial Institute held at the Westminster Palace Hotel last week—the Marquis of Lorne in the chair—a paper, entitled "Newfoundland, our Oldest Colony," was read by the Hon. Mr. Justice Pinsent.



The paper gave elaborate historical details of the discovery and colonisation of Newfoundland, which rejoiced in the appellation of being the "most ancient and loyal colony" of the British Crown. The lecturer said that he was at a loss to account for the fact that it was so little known or appreciated by the Mother-country. Its fisheries were very ancient and were still most productive. In 1881 the seal fishery resulted in the capture of 447,903 seals, of the estimated value of 957,760 dols.; and the total annual value of the various fisheries now amounted to upwards of £1,600,000. For many years in the history of the Colony immigration had been discouraged, and it was therefore not surprising that the agricultural produce of the country was not great, while the native minerals were utterly neglected. Without advising any great scheme for immigration, he contended that there were excellent opportunities for settlers with small capital; and, in conclusion, he maintained that while England held her possessions in North America, she could not dispense with Newfoundland, the outpost of America, the key of the St. Lawrence, and the head-quarters of ocean telegraphy. In proposing a vote of thanks to the lecturer, the Marquis of Lorne said he had visited the colony, and had taken great interest in it. Knowing the value of its fisheries, especially the seal fishery, he could well understand why some enterprising countrymen of his had left the neighbourhood of the Dee for the shores of Newfoundland, and if the present agricultural depression continued he (the noble Marquis) would feel inclined to follow their example. There could be no doubt that the shortening of the route between Europe and America by means of a railway across the island would be esteemed a great boon by many travellers, and would be of advantage to the colony. The resources of Newfoundland were capable of great development, and the colony possessed considerable attractions for tourists, especially the western shore, still, unfortunately, known as the French shore. It was intolerable that any foreign nation should be allowed to claim any rights over the land of an English colony, except the privilege of using the shore for mending their nets; and sooner or later the claims that had been set up through misinterpretation must be put an end to.

CHAPTER XXVI.

PRESUMPTIVE EVIDENCE.

It is obvious that the most direct route from the Gallery of French Artists to the cab-stand near Apsley House is viâ Pall-mall, Waterloo-place, and Piccadilly; but when people are deep in an interesting conversation, they are apt to follow their noses, and it must be presumed that De Wynt's nose, moving in sympathy with his mind, had led him to approach the desired end by a circuitous path. From the starting-point of Georgina's idiosyncrasies he had to make his way round through general reflections upon the philosophy of marriage to the particular instance of the lady who stood upon her dignity, and thence to the bearing of this sad case upon that of Mr. and Mrs. Vidal; and so, being absorbed in the working out of his mental proposition, he crossed Regent-circus, headed up the Quadrant, involved himself in intricacies in the neighbourhood of Vigo-street, and did not pick himself up, so to speak, until he was on the other side of Bond-street, by which time he had propounded the startling theory of the four hundred and ninety pardons above mentioned, and was able to think of shaping a straight course for home.

Thus it was that Clare awoke from the dreams engendered by her relenting mood to find herself at the corner of Grosvenor-square, and within sight of a mansion which she had little reason to love. She glanced at it, as she might have glanced at the slough of a serpent, little imagining that it was no longer untenanted, and as she looked, the doors were flung back and somebody, running down the steps, walked swiftly away westwards, his umbrella under his arm and his head bent, as though in thought. It was Adrian, who had just escaped from Miss Susan Bowman, and who assuredly would not have been congratulating himself upon that, had he known what a singularly inopportune moment he had chosen for making his exit. But, happily for his peace of mind, he did not look over his shoulder as he hurried away; and the shades of evening soon hid him from the gaze of two astonished pedestrians who were following him at a respectful distance. Both of them had recognised him, but neither thought it advisable to mention the fact. De Wynt, feeling that the good effect of his homily must be neutralised by this unexpected apparition, stopped short in the middle of a sentence, and Clare, after walking some little distance without speaking, said, somewhat constrainedly, "I must not take you any further, Mr. De Wynt. If you will stop a hansom for me, I think I will say good-bye now."

The well-balanced mind is, of course, no more affected by knowledge which is conveyed to it through the medium of sight than by such as reaches it through hearing; but a well-balanced mind is not a very common possession, and many people who can read a minute account of some hideous railway accident without the smallest discomfort, turn sick if they happen to see a single individual break his leg. Clare, for her part, found that it was one thing to accept her husband's weakness for flirtation as an abstract fact and quite another to catch him in flagrante delicto; and as the hansom bore her homewards, her thoughts about him were very bitter. Forgive?—well, yes; she could forgive perhaps; but she certainly could not tell him so; she could not consent to share his affections with Lady St. Austell. There was no doubt in her mind now—or at all events only a remnant of doubt, which she refused to recognise—that his relations with that wicked woman had, as De Wynt would have phrased it, "gone beyond a little attention." What was Lady St. Austell doing in London in November?—and why had Adrian concealed the fact that she was there? Why had he lied, saying that he would go to the picture-gallery that afternoon, when he never could have intended to do anything of the kind? If this were not strong presumptive evidence of guilt, what could be? Poor Clare felt a wild longing to escape from the choking atmosphere of deceit by which she was surrounded, to leave the man who had betrayed her, and to hide herself somewhere where he should never be able to find her again. She thought it would be almost impossible to maintain the demeanour of cold politeness which she had kept up so long, now that she knew what it was that caused Adrian to leave home early in the morning and remain away until night. If her baby had lived it would have been different. Then she would have borne everything for the child's sake: but for whose sake was she to submit to neglect and insult now?

But this despairing phase of feeling passed away. In spite of all her indignation, she knew that Adrian had as yet given her no ostensible excuse for refusing to live with him any longer; and something—it may have been the aforementioned remnant of doubt—enabled her to enter the drawing-room before dinner with a face only a little graver and paler than usual.

Adrian was already dressed, and was standing before the fire, reading the evening paper. He wore the cheerful aspect of one who does not know that he has been found out. "I was sorry I couldn't pick you up at the gallery this afternoon," he said, "but I knew De Wynt would look after you. It was all right, I suppose?"

"Perfectly right," answered Clare, marvelling at his duplicity; "I never expected you to come."

"Well, I fully intended to do so; but, somehow, the time slipped away, and then it was too late. I hope you enjoyed it."

Clare took up the newspaper which he had laid down and made no reply; but this did not arouse Adrian's suspicions.

Of late it had become a habit of hers to leave a good many of his remarks unanswered. Presently he volunteered the information that he had seen Pilkington in the course of the afternoon, and that Pilkington was in a great stew about the Anglo-Saxon, which was not fulfilling his expectations.

"He says I'm the only man on his staff who isn't perpetually getting him into hot water, and that if the public won't understand the theory of individual responsibility for signed articles he shall throw the thing up."

Clare only looked up from her paper for an instant to say, "Really?"

It was rather irritating. Lady St. Austell, to whom he had given the same intelligence an hour or two before, had seen at once how important it was, in the interest of contemporary literature, that Mr. Pilkington should be restrained from carrying out his threat. But contemporary literature seemed to have lost its charms for Clare. Adrian doubted whether she was even reading the serial story by him which was then appearing in the Cosmopolitan Magazine, and she never asked any questions about the novel which he had on hand.

Not much conversation passed between them during dinner. By an unlucky mischance, the cook had upset the salt-cellar into the soup, and a calamity of that kind is what no man, however good-tempered, can allow to pass without comment. Adrian did not behave at all badly about it; but he sent a sarcastic message to the kitchen, and Clare showed by her absolute silence that she took the rebuke as addressed to herself. That, again, was rather irritating. As soon as the melancholy repast was over, Adrian said he had work to do and retired to his study; while Clare, left alone in the drawing-room, stitched mechanically at her embroidery until it was time to go to bed.

Going to bed did not mean going to sleep. She tossed and turned half the night through, wondering how long this kind of life would last—how long she would be able to endure it; and when at length she fell into a feverish doze, she dreamt that she saw Adrian kneeling at Lady St. Austell's feet, that Lord St. Austell, surveying the couple through his eye-glass, was laughing ecstatically, and that De Wynt was saying to her, "Very sorry for you, Mrs. Vidal; but you've brought it upon yourself, you know. You ought to have taken my advice and forgiven him before it was too late."

The consequence was that she had a splitting headache in the morning, and felt justified in sending a message down stairs to say that she didn't want any breakfast, but would take a cup of tea and some dry toast in her bed-room. Upon the tray which was presently brought to her lay a letter; and no sooner had she seen the handwriting than she recognised it as that of the anonymous correspondent to whom she was indebted for some of the most miserable hours that she had ever spent. She tore open the envelope with trembling fingers; and this was what her unknown informant had to say to her:—

"You have been warned once that your husband is deceiving you; but perhaps you think his word is more to be trusted than a stranger's. Well, seeing is believing. If you want to know a little more about him, go to the Round Pond in Kensington Gardens to-morrow afternoon and walk among the trees on the north side till you have seen enough to satisfy you."

CHAPTER XXVII.

PROOF POSITIVE.

Only those who have been long under the influence of a fixed idea, can realise how difficult it is to bid farewell to hope. Susan Bowman ought, of course, to have perceived that her one chance of inducing Adrian to marry her was to strike while the iron was hot and get the ceremony concluded before his brief passion burnt itself out. She had not done this, because, for one thing, she had not felt perfectly sure of his pecuniary independence, and for another, because Heriot had succeeded in convincing her that Mr. Vidal would never be dragged to the altar so long as he had coat-tails to be clung to and a friend to cling to them. She had, however, the heroic quality of not knowing when she was beaten. What she had related of herself in St. James's Park was true, ridiculous as it may appear to the reader, and ridiculous as it did appear to the man she had hoped to win. The obstacles in the way of her marriage were, as had been pointed out to her, inferiority of birth and education. She set herself to work to render these less conspicuous by cultivating refinement and reading such books as she could afford to buy. She employed means which perhaps would not have borne close scrutiny to obtain a nursery governess's place; she had vague intentions of rising from that position to a somewhat higher one, of presenting herself to Adrian in the light of an equal, and calling upon him to redeem his promises.

The announcement of his marriage in the papers fell upon her, therefore, like a thunderbolt out of a clear sky; she felt that all her labour had been in vain, that she had been basely deceived, and that revenge became her well. Her imagination not being a very fertile one, the only vengeance that at first suggested itself to her was of the dagger and bowl order; and this, in view of the existing state of the criminal law, seemed likely to prove as uncomfortable for avenger as for victim. Besides, she did not care about slaying Adrian. What she wanted do was to make him suffer; and we have seen how circumstances put it into her power to play the part of Nemesis. Her employer's garrulity kept her pretty well informed as to Mr. Vidal's domestic affairs. She knew that his wife was jealous; she also knew that some cause for jealousy existed; though precisely how much she had not been able to determine by a careful study of the letters which Lady St. Austell was too apt to leave lying in accessible places. These, it is true, were interesting and amusing reading: they gave a clue to the tone of modern society, and showed to what imprudent lengths young gentlemen of the Johnny Spencer type will commit themselves upon paper; but unluckily there was not one amongst them that bore Mr. Vidal's signature; and so Susan, who was growing tired of watching the progress of events, resolved to jog Time's elbow and create a few little events on her own score.

It was with a countenance expressive of joyous anticipation that she set forth to keep her tryst in Kensington Gardens; and a cheering reflection it was to her that in the course of a few hours' time, if all went well, Adrian would be in the midst of a domestic tempest such as he had not yet been called upon to encounter, that he would assuredly involve himself in a network of falsehood, and that the end of it would most likely be a temporary separation, and a more or less public scandal.

Adrian was approaching the same spot at a more leisurely pace and with considerably less exultation. He was not much afraid of anything that Susan might say or do, and he had put twenty pounds in his pocket, in case ten should not be enough; but these open-air meetings were not to his taste, nor did he like the prospect of the reproaches which he took it for granted would be hurled at his head before the inevitable demand for cash came. "I'm not going to do this kind of thing again," he muttered; "and so I shall tell her. After all, what does it signify? Let her come to Alexandra-gardens and kick up a row, if she chooses. I would have given a good deal to prevent her from doing that a year ago; but now I suppose it would make very little difference."

He sighed heavily, thinking that the world was rapidly becoming a dismal place of abode, and so reached his rendezvous in a frame of mind half petulant, half dejected. Looking warily about him in search of the person whom he had come to meet, he was much astonished to recognise in a solitary figure, separated from him by the breadth of the pond, not Susan but Lady St. Austell, and his astonishment was increased when her Ladyship, after making him a slight but unmistakeable sign to follow her, walked slowly away in the direction of the trees. He caught her up presently, and, taking off his hat, said, "Lady St. Austell, what has brought you to this damp place?"

The lady addressed lifted her veil and disclosed the features of Miss Bowman.

"It isn't Lady St. Austell," she answered, meekly; "it's only me."

"Oh, it's you!" said Adrian, with some irritation. "And why have you dressed yourself up in your mistress's clothes, if I may ask?"

"Call me a thief," returned Susan, in a low, sad voice; "I shouldn't be in the least surprised at your calling me anything. These are my own clothes, though. Her Ladyship was kind enough to give them to me a few days ago, and I put them on because—because I thought perhaps you would like to see me looking nice. But of course you don't care about that now; I'm only a troublesome woman whom you'd be glad to be rid of. You won't have long to wait, maybe. I often think it would be easy enough to walk down to the river some night and have an end of it all." And here Susan heaved a sigh so profound that Lady St. Austell's dress, which, indeed, was somewhat too tight for the comfort of either its late or its present wearer, gave forth a warning crack.

"If there is one thing that I hate more than being rude to a woman," said Adrian, quite unmoved by these pathetic words, "it is beating about the bush on a cold, raw afternoon, instead of coming to the point. Therefore, Susan, you must try to forgive me if I say that we shall get on a great deal better without humbug. Tell me what you want of me, and you shall have it, so long as it is anything in reason."

Susan turned away her head, as if to conceal her emotion. "Do you think it is kind or just to talk to me like that?" she asked, with a little tremor in her voice. "Have I ever done you an injury? Some people might say that it was you who had injured me."

"I am sorry if I spoke unkindly, Susan," answered Adrian, with a twinge of compunction; "but you must remember that you addressed me in a very different tone yesterday, and that I am only here because you threatened me."

"Yes; only because I threatened you. You wouldn't have come if I had asked you to do it as a favour to me. Well, well!—times are changed. Once you would have been glad enough to meet me anywhere; and now you say, 'Tell me what you want, and let me go.' Suppose I wanted nothing, except to see you and talk to you again, and to walk a little way with you, as we used to walk when we were younger and happier than we are now?"

"I'm afraid I can't suppose that," replied Adrian, who found this reproachful tenderness even more disagreeable than the rating which he had dreaded.

"Can't you? And yet that is all I ask of you, Adrian. Come, let us walk up and down under the trees for half an hour, and I will try to forget how miserable you have made me. You can spare me half an hour, perhaps. It isn't a great deal of time to give to a girl whom you once wished to spend your life with."

She passed her arm through his, and led him across the damp grass and the fallen yellow leaves. The night was closing in fast, and a chilly fog was rising, through which the figures of the passers-by, hurrying along the broad gravel path, loomed dim and ghost-like.

"It looks dreary enough; one wouldn't think it had ever been spring-time here. But the trees are happier than I am: they don't remember what they have lost," remarked the melancholy Susan, unconsciously plagiarising from a poet of whom she had never heard.

Adrian was thoroughly uncomfortable. He didn't like being held by the arm, he didn't like being called by his Christian name, and he had a shrewd suspicion that he had not been brought there for purely sentimental purposes. Yet he hardly saw his way to escape. "I think," said he at length, "that, considering all things, we might very well consent to let by-gones be by-gones. The last time that I walked with you, you gave me to understand that all you wished for was to be revenged upon me."

Susan shook her head sadly. "There's no need for that now. I have been revenged without doing anything to revenge myself. I know you are no more happy than I am. You regret your marriage now that it is too late."

"You are drawing upon your imagination," said Adrian, coldly; and he made an effort to free his arm, which, however, Susan only gripped more tightly.

"No, indeed," she replied. "I know a great many things—more than you suspect, perhaps. I know, for instance, that you don't really care for her Ladyship, and that you only pretend to flirt with her because you want to forget how unhappy you are at home."

"I don't wish to hurt your feelings," returned Adrian; "but you must excuse my telling you that speeches of that kind are very offensive to me."

"The truth often is offensive," remarked Susan sententiously. "Ah, Adrian!" she added, with more warmth, clasping her hands round his arm as she spoke, and looking up into his face, "the real truth is that you have never loved either of these women as you loved me once."

This was more than the unfortunate man could stand. "Really, Susan," he said, shaking her off somewhat roughly, "you had better understand the real truth yourself, once for all. It is true that when I was a boy, I did for a short time fancy that I was in love with you; but the fancy didn't last long, and when once it was gone, no power on earth could ever have brought it back again. If you knew how the recollection of that time humiliates and disgusts me, you would not be so eager to remind me of it."

Susan had a gusty temper, which got the upper hand of her sometimes when she herself least expected it. It came whirling forth now, and caused her to exclaim, impetuously, "You brute!—you miserable coward! I'll make you smart for those words before I've done with you!"

Adrian raised his eyebrows, and smiled ever so slightly. It appeared to him that the moment at which pecuniary compensation might be tendered with propriety was not far distant. "And in what particular way, Susan," he asked, with the utmost suavity, "do you propose to make me smart?"

It had been no part of Susan's plan to quarrel with the sinner whom she desired to reward according to his iniquities. "You make me say things that I don't want to say," she complained. "Of course you know that I could give you trouble, if I liked. I could write a few lines to your mother-in-law, Mrs. Irvine, or I could have five minutes' conversation with your wife, or I could drop a hint to his Lordship, who isn't a pleasant man when he's angered, they say. But why should I hurt you? Hurting you wouldn't make you love me again, and neither hurting you nor leaving you alone will get a kind word out of you, it seems."

"I don't want to seem unkind, Susan," answered Adrian; "but I must make you understand, if I can, that it is a mistake for us to exchange kind words—or any words. I don't see what more I can say than that I am heartily sorry for having wronged you in the past—if I did wrong you."

"If you did!"

"Well, let us say that I did. But what reparation can I make now? I know it looks a little insulting to produce one's purse; still money is a useful thing you know; and I am sure I shall be only too glad"——

His somewhat halting speech was interrupted in a singular manner. Without the slightest warning, Susan abruptly flung her arms round his neck and held up her face close to his. "Kiss me, Adrian," she whispered. "Kiss me once!—for the sake of old days!"

What would the respected reader have done in this trying situation? The humble writer is bound to confess that he would have done what Adrian did and complied with the request which of all conceivable requests is the least easy to refuse. Adrian, then, bestowed a modest salute upon Susan's forehead; having done which, he endeavoured gently to disengage himself, but without success. Susan, regardless of the passers-by, clung to him with fond, inarticulate murmurs, and he was beginning to think that he would have done better to hold her at arm's-length, when he was released with a suddenness which threw him off his balance and caused him to stagger backwards in an undignified manner, while Susan, turning away from him, resumed the slow march which her access of tenderness had arrested.

It has just been said that she was regardless of the passers-by, and so the alarmed Adrian imagined that she was; but in reality that was exactly what she was not. For five or ten minutes she had been keeping an anxious eye on the forms that flitted to and fro through the mist a few yards away, and when among these she discerned that of a tall, slight young lady whose gait seemed less purpose-like than her neighbours', she deemed it advisable to precipitate a crisis to which she had been leading up from the outset. There was thus a slight want of artistic finish in the way that Susan carried out her task, and this she regretted; but when it is remembered that she had to reach a given point in her dialogue at a moment which could not be accurately determined beforehand, it will be allowed that she acquitted herself with a fair measure of credit. She had manœuvred so as to place Adrian with his back to the path; looking over his shoulder, she saw the lady for whose benefit she was acting start, clasp her hands together nervously, stand still for a moment, and then hurry away into the gathering gloom; after which, with a comfortable conviction that Mrs. Vidal had seen enough, she released Adrian in the manner described.

For it has to be confessed that the spectator of the scene was no other than Mrs. Vidal. Many people—most people, perhaps—will be disposed to think that it is a little beneath the dignity of a gentleman or a lady to act upon information conveyed anonymously: if so, Clare's own opinion coincided with that of the majority. She made no excuses for herself, and none shall be made for her. She went to the Round Pond, as she had been told to do; she walked slowly along the path, looking among the trees for the couple whom she expected to discover, and she saw—as she fully believed—Adrian fondly embracing Lady St. Austell. The improbability of Lady St. Austell's preferring to be embraced in the comparative publicity of Kensington Gardens, when she had a comfortable and private boudoir of her own in which to indulge in such pleasures, did not strike her; nor would it have made very much difference if it had. For there could be no question as to the fact that Adrian was the embracer whom his wife had seen; and whether the embraced person were A or B was perhaps not a matter of primary importance. Clare, as she hastened homewards, felt that the limits of her endurance had been reached.

Meanwhile, the culprit, little imagining into what a pitfall he had stepped by yielding to an amiable wish to make things pleasant, was rather surprised at the coolness which came over Susan's manner after her late demonstration.

"Well," she remarked, in a curt, business-like tone, "I won't keep you away from home any longer. Your wife may be wondering what has become of you, you know. We may as well say good-bye now."

"Good-bye, Susan," said Adrian, not unkindly. "I can see that you think me rather hard-hearted; but there's no help for that, I'm afraid. You won't ask me to meet you again in this way, will you?"

"Probably not," answered Susan, drily.

"There really is no use in it, you see. And now, I hope you'll accept a small present—I thought it possible that you might want a little help"— and he deprecatingly produced four five-pound notes.

"Sir," said Susan, "your generosity to me I shall never forget. Hand over the money."

He complied wonderingly. The woman's changes of tone were so frequent and abrupt that he began to think her intellect must be a trifle deranged; and she perceived his suspicions with much amusement. Her natural histrionic talent being but slight, she had had considerable difficulty in playing her part, and the sense that she was now free to indulge in any conduct that might seem good to her filled her with exultation.

"Twenty pounds!" said she, examining the notes. "Were you really so much afraid of me as that? Now, a common person like me ought to consider herself rich with twenty pounds in her pocket, oughtn't she?"

"I don't know," answered Adrian, still somewhat puzzled.

"Oh yes; it's wealth, I assure you. I have seen the day when twenty pence would have been welcome. With all this money, I can afford to treat myself to a luxury; and a luxury I will have. What do you think I'm going to do with your kind present?"

"I don't know," said Adrain again.

"Why, I'm going to give the whole of it away in charity; I am, indeed. I'm going to give it to a deserving person. More than that, I'm going to add to it the sum of eight pound ten out of my own purse."

She took her purse from her pocket, as she spoke, and counted out the amount mentioned, which, together with the notes, she placed in Adrian's hands. "There!" said she; "you're the deserving person; and oh, what a deserving person you are, to be sure! Don't thank me, I beg! It's a privilege to do anything for such a kind friend as you have been to me."

"What on earth do you mean?" asked Adrian.

"Only that I like to pay my debts; and I have been owing you eight pound ten since the beginning of the year. I don't know whether we're quite quits yet; but we're as near it as we shall get, I expect. Good-bye to you; and before we part, let me tell you a secret. I'd rather die of hunger in a ditch than spend a sixpence of your money!"

Susan's face, as she uttered these last words, was not agreeable to look upon. She turned on her heel, without waiting for a rejoinder; and in truth Adrian had none ready.

AMONG THE HILLS.

Five hundred feet already above the level of the sea, and that without moving from the doorstep; and in front a long beautiful sweep of hills, to the top of which we feel bound to climb, if only to see what is on the other side. The air is full of bell-ringing; first from the tiny church in the valley, and then from the square old tower on our right; and as the keen north-easter comes roaring down the one or two clefts in the range before us, we seem to hear the sound of bells brought to us from that other side, about which there cannot help being a certain sense of mystery, because of the barrier between us and it.

Notwithstanding the wind, the garden is full of flowers; graceful daffodils nod to each other, and intimate that they know all sorts of things that they could tell an' they would; on one side purple blooms and masses of white violets perfume the air, and on the other quantities of white stonecrop appear clinging to everything and peering out of every crevice of the high red wall that divides us from the passers-by along the high road: wall-flowers of course are present too - bowing hither and thither, and looking about eagerly at the world; while the flowering currant has put out his coarsely-scented ugly red blossoms gaily, and appears to mock at the trees, that are far too prudent at present to do more than show us that they are only waiting, like all the rest of us, for brighter days to put out their beauties and to begin to enjoy life. The sun, however, is out and up and shining, and as we commence our climb up the Worcestershire beacon—the object of our walk—we see, as we rest at intervals, that he is doing his work, and inviting the leaves and flowers to come out and see how beautiful the world is; and as we climb higher and higher, and the rollicking breeze skirmishes round us, darting round this or that point or taking us unexpectedly in the rear, we are impelled to admiration of weather that, cold and cheerless enough without sunshine, is bright and shining and glittering indeed when the sun comes out, and takes his own particular part in the battle between the seasons. Pausing here on the rough narrow road, it were almost possible to believe we were in Switzerland—so sharp is the ascent, so dangerous-looking the incline on the left-hand. Far, far below us lies the town—so foreign-looking, so clean, so steep, with its curious houses built in tiers, in such a manner that it appears to us that the higher inhabitants must look down their neighbours' chimneys, even if they are not curiously inclined; with the lovely old church standing up, like some gallant protector, in its midst; and lower still, the wide stretch of country laid out in squares, like some child's toy, and divided here and there by a bright silver flash, that we know is the Severn, making its way to the Bristol Channel, which we shall see presently, when we reach the top. Above the town, nearer to us, are pine-trees and larches, just tipped with pale-green tassels; and as we climb, we watch the rooks sailing about, hanging mysteriously in mid-air, now dipping, now floating, now gliding along, until we envy them their wings, and appreciate more than ever the grace and beauty inseparable from a bird's flight.

It is curious, too, as we climb, to see figures, as it appears to us above our heads, stuck on to the sides of the hill. The road is made in a series of sharp cuts, each point disappearing as it seems to a climber into hidden space; and as people above us reach their destination and disappear, it causes us a dizzy feeling that we are ashamed to confess to among our English hills, but that makes us shut our eyes for awhile and stand still, until we recover our balance and are able to proceed.

Surely, surely here, then, we are in the very home of the winds! The great north wind roars and rushes by us; the east wind takes up the tale and disputes with us every inch of his territory; and as we arrive, breathless and gasping, and seek refuge for a moment within the walls of the beacon, we are fain to confess ourselves vanquished, and cry for mercy to the rough tempests that have made the place their own. But when we can open our eyes and look around us we have no words to express all we feel. The tourists have vanished, and we are quite alone, some fifteen hundred feet above the sea. We have half a kingdom below our feet; and we seem taken suddenly and quietly straight to Nature's true and kindly heart, for we have conquered the hills, and we look right down into that hidden other side. Straightway the procession of seasons begins to glide by us. It is spring, we know—quite early spring; the yellow gorse is only just beginning to assert itself; yonder white sheet is pear-blossom just out; and below, the "snow of the mountain," in the pretty local name for the stonecrop, is pushing out of every crevice, even in the streets of the town itself. The bells have given place to the musical cry of the tiny lamb, to the deeper-toned voice of the unswering sheep; the mournful call of the peewit meets our ears; and over all a lark has sprung up, and, hanging in mid-air, is flooding the sky with its delicious, generous, never-ending stream of melody; while every now and then a sunbeam lights up the river, or falls quivering into another paler speck of water that we know quite well is soon to be the sea.

Then Spring grows older; the gnarled and mis-shapen trees, each one now conspicuous for its great bunch of mistletoe, burst into flower; the air is heavy with sweet odours, and merry with the humming of bees; the silent distant forests, where at present the larch looks conspicuous in pale emerald against the other denizens of the wood, are all in leaf, and then, again, Autumn walks the world; the golden, scarletrusset apples cluster under the foliage; the whole marvellous varied riches contained beneath autumn's mantle are displayed; and the scent of the fruit, and the voices of the gatherers, rise even to us as we wait there, dreaming our dreams among the hills. Then Winter strides by—we can feel his icy breath; he gathers up each last pitiful morsel of life, and keeps high revel here, with his attendant slaves, Frost and Snow. Then, he has the hills all to himself. The sheep are below, safe in the fold. No one comes here to dispute his reign; and silence, darkness, and rough tempests hold high revel, darting down now and then into the town, blustering and threatening, breaking here a tree, or there a chimney-pot, and finally retiring, laughing at the mischief they could do, if only they would.

But as evening begins to fall, we are back in the pale early dawn of a late spring, and once more look around us. Over the hills comes drifting a curious mysterious darkness: the sea has gone; the river glitters no more; the Cotswolds have disappeared entirely; the wind has died away; there is only a muttering of a tempest a long way off; the darkness seems nearer; we remember we have a sharp walk home—and then suddenly across the distant blackness comes a brilliant sharp something; then another. In an instant every secret of the Cotswolds is ours: we see tiny places we should never have perceived had it not been for the lightning, and we are almost tempted to linger still; but the tempest seems to travel faster and faster across those miles of different counties, and we only reach home as a sharp storm of hail, thunder, and lightning, throws itself on us, and makes us feel thankful we are in safety. Then, as the darkness leaves us, we watch it drift along quicker and quicker, until it, too, reaches the other side, that has its secrets from us no longer, and that has so much to show anyone who stays for just a little while among the Malvern Hills.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications relating to this department of the Paper should be addressed to the Editor, and have the word "Chess" written on the envelope.

C E T (Clifton).—Very neat indeed. Have you seen our No. 2140?

G G (Sittingbourne).—Thanks for the information. Obviously the correct move is Q to K 3rd.

W A (Old Romney).—We have not a complete set of the Westminster Papers; indeed, we have not a complete volume.

W B (Stratford).—The last amendments of your problem shall be examined.

Swansea.—The position shall be re-examined.

P B (Kingscliffe).—(1.) Capturing en passant is the peculiar privilege of a Pawn, and only a Pawn can be so captured. (2.) There may be two or more Queens, Bishops, Rooks, and Knights on the board at the same time. (3.) Your adversary in the case set forth was as ignorant of the rules of the game as you appear to be. Write to Messrs. Jaques, of Hatton-garden, London, for a copy of their sixpenny handbook.

W W (Eltham).—Your first problem was probably like your last, incorrect. Suppose White plays 1. R to K 3rd, how do you propose to prevent mate in two more moves?

Clare.—There are two monthly periodicals devoted to chess, the British Chess Magazine and the Chess Monthly, and both can be obtained through any bookseller.

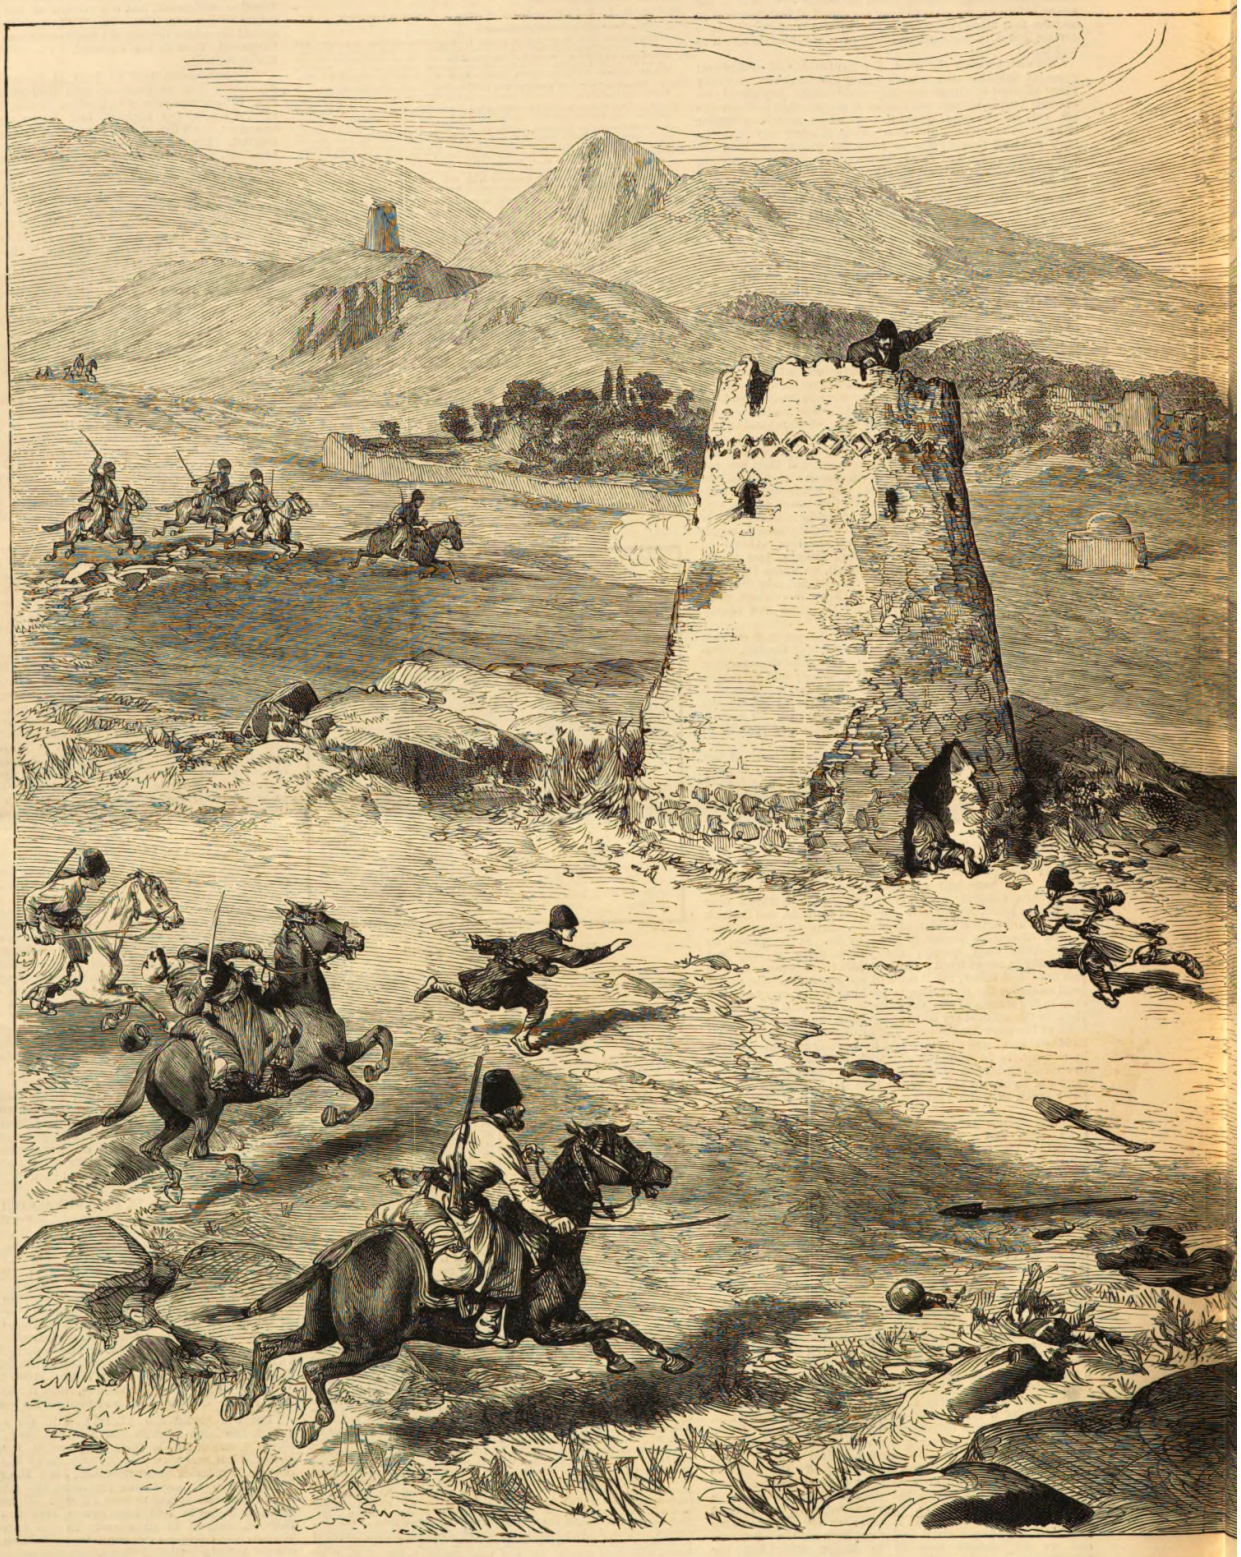
The thirty-third annual dinner of the City of London Chess Club was held at the Salutation Tavern, Newgate-street, on the evening of Tuesday, the 14th inst. The Rev. J. J. Scargill presided on the occasion, supported by Messrs. Gastineau and Pilkington as croupiers. After a merry family of Caissa's sons had enjoyed an excellent dinner, well served, the president proposed the usual loyal toasts, which were, we need hardly say, received with due honours. The toasts which followed were "The Prosperity of the Club," "The Honorary Secretary," proposed by Mr. Manning, and responded to by Mr. George Adamson in a speech characterised by that gentleman's usual practical good sense and good humour. "The Vice-Presidents and the Committee" was the next toast, the Rev. Mr. Sumner, who proposed it, coupling it with the names of Mr. Pilkington and Mr. Block. Mr. Pilkington then proposed the health of the honorary members, gracefully referring to each in rotation. The names of Baron Kolisch and Mr. Blackburne were received with a roar of cheering which satisfied those gentlemen's friends of the esteem in which they are held by the City chessplayers. The toast was coupled with the name of Dr. Zuckertort, who, in responding, observed that, although he made no noisy claim to be a better chessplayer than anyone else in the world, he should, when the occasion arose, do his best to prove that he was not second to anyone either. Mr. Cutler then proposed the "Chess Press," coupling the toast with the names of Messrs. Duffy, MacDonnell, and Hoffer. All three gentlemen responded, Mr. Duffy congratulating himself and his fellow-labourers on the cordial feeling that now exists between the makers and writers of chess history. Mr. Hoffer seized the occasion to give some interesting information of the progress of the British Chess Association; and Mr. MacDonnell, well furnished with "quips and cranks," as is usual with him, "kept the table in a roar" during a too brief speech. The next toast was the health of Mr. B. G. Laws, the winner of the first prize in the Winter Handicap, proposed by Mr. Block, and the health of the chairman, proposed by Mr. Gastineau, brought the proceedings to a conclusion. The several toasts were, in the intervals, enlivened by songs and recitations. Mr. James Hall presided at the pianoforte, and among the vocalists were Mr. Pizzi (whose point that "Little fools will play too much, and great ones not at all," was fully appreciated), and Messrs. Bridges, Woolley, Knowles, and H. F. Gastineau. Of the recitations, Mr. C. G. Cutler's delivery of a "Lay of Ancient Chessplayers," evoking much laughter and applause, was the most successful effort of the evening.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Dec. 24, 1852), with a codicil (dated Sept. 12, 1884), of Lady Georgiana Charlotte Fullerton, late of Ayrfield, Bournemouth, who died on Jan. 19 last, was proved on the 21st ult. by Alexander George Fullerton, the husband, and acting executor, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £12,000. The testatrix leaves certain sums of £10,000 and £6000 in settlement, and the residue of her real and personal estate to her son, Granville William Fullerton; but if he should die under the age of twenty-one years—which event has happened—then to her husband. The deceased was sister to Earl Granville.

The will (dated Dec. 11, 1884) of Dame Emma Bruce De Koetteritz, late of Florence, who died at Baden-Baden, on Feb. 18 last, was proved in London on the 30th ult. by John Eliot Pringle, the nephew, and James Curtis Leman, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £60,000. The testatrix bequeaths £5000, upon trust, for Mrs. Elizabeth Bruce, the wife of her nephew for life, and at her death for four of their children; and other legacies. The residue of her property she leaves, upon trust, for her husband, Le Chevalier Colonel Bernard Ernest Jules De Koetteritz, for life, or until he shall marry again; then she bequeaths £5000 to her said nephew John Eliot Pringle; £3000 to her great-nephew and godson, Arthur Pringle; £7000 to her nephew Reginald Pringle; £4000 to her niece, Nellie Plaountine; and some other legacies. The ultimate residue she gives to her said nephews, John Eliot and Reginald Pringle.



The will (dated Nov. 16, 1878), with three codicils (dated Nov. 16, 1878, and March 16 and Nov. 10, 1882), of Mr. William Whitfield, late of No. 17, Gracechurch-street, merchant, and of No. 21, Langham-place, who died on the 7th ult., was proved on the 1st inst. by George Whitfield, the acting executor, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £247,000. The testator gives the furniture, pictures, plate, and effects at his principal residence to his cousin, the said George Whitfield; a farm in the province of Quebec to the said George Whitfield, for life, and then to his eldest son; a piece of land at Barbadoes to his cousin, Mrs. Jane Duguid Whitfield; £10,000, upon trust, for his brother, George Whitfield, for life; £7000, upon trust, for Ann Betteridge, for life; and numerous other legacies and annuities. The residue of his real and personal estate, including his property in Barbadoes, is to be held, upon trusts, for accumulation until the youngest child of his said cousin, George Whitfield, by the said Jane Duguid Whitfield, attains twenty-one, and then for all their children.

The will (dated Dec. 4, 1882) of Mr. James Bury Capel, late of No. 5, Throgmorton-street, and of North Cray Place, Kent, who died on Feb. 2 last, at Brighton, was proved on the 9th inst. by Frank Charles Capel and Charles Cecil Capel, the sons, Hugh Frederick Drummond, and Arthur Carnegy Capel, the nephew, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £237,000. The testator bequeaths £1000, all his wines and consumable stores, and all his household furniture, pictures, plate, jewellery, effects, horses and carriages, to his wife, Mrs. Georgina Capel; but any of such articles and effects which she does not dispose of in her lifetime are to go at her death to his son Charles Cecil; £20,000 to his said son, Charles Cecil; £5000 to his brother, Arthur Risdon Capel, and £1000 to each of his children: £500 each to his executors Mr. Drummond and Mr. A. C. Capel; and £200 each to Walter Suggars and David Windsor, if in his service at his decease. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held, upon trust, for his wife, for life; at her death, he leaves one moiety to his son Charles Cecil; £50,000 out of the other moiety to his son Frank Charles, and the remainder of the last-named moiety, upon trust, for his son Frank Charles, for life, then for his son Charles Cecil, for life, then for his said brother, Arthur Risdon, for life, and then for his said brother's children.

The will (dated July 12, 1881) of Mr. John Francis Campbell, of Islay, late of Niddry Lodge, Campden-hill, Kensington, barrister-at-law, who died on Feb. 17 last, at Cannes, was proved on the 1st inst., by the Duke of Argyll, K.G., Mrs. Katharine Isabella Campbell, and Henry Vincent Wing, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £52,000. The testator gives certain books and manuscripts relating to Celtic and other matters to the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, on condition that they are kept together and made available for the use of Gaelic scholars and others; all his real leasehold and heritable estate, except Niddry Lodge and his freehold property at Chale, Isle of Wight, to his half-brother, Walter Douglas Somerset Campbell; and some annuities and legacies. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held, upon trust, for his stepmother, Mrs. Katharine Isabella Campbell, for life; at her death he leaves the pictures, prints, and busts at Niddry Lodge, including two statues lent to Earl Granville, to the Duke of Argyll, or in case of his previous death to his heir in possession of Inverary Castle, as it is his wish that these family relics should go back to the county from which they came, and be in the possession of "my chief or his successors." As to the ultimate residue of his property, two sixths are to go to his said half-brother, and one sixth to each of his four half-sisters.

The will (dated June 18, 1863), with a codicil (dated July 19, 1869), of Mr. Robert Augustus Aspinall, formerly of Motcomb-street, Belgrave-square, but late of No. 15, Queensberry-place, Cromwell-road, who died on Jan. 5 last, was proved on the 19th ult. by John Ireland Blackburne, M.P., and Henry George Allen, Q.C., M.P., the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £50,000. The testator bequeaths £500 and all his household furniture and effects to his wife, Mrs. Mary Isabella Maria Aspinall; he also bequeaths £5000, upon trust, for her, for life or widowhood, in addition to the amount she receives under their settlement; £100 to each of his executors; and the residue of his property to his children. In default of children, he leaves £5000 to his sister, Miss Betty Aspinall; £2000 to his brother, John; £1000 to his nephew, William; and the ultimate residue, upon further trust, for his wife, for life or widowhood, and then for his said sister.

The will (dated Nov. 17, 1874), with three codicils (dated Jan. 2, 1880, and April 28 and Nov. 24, 1882), of Mr. James Burchell, late of No. 34, Gordon-square, St. Pancras, who died on Dec. 3 last, was proved on the 20th ult. by William Burchell, the son, Frederick Lacy Robinson, John Henry Hortin, and William Henry Cousins, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £33,000. The testator gives a freehold house in Red Lion-square, and also one in High Holborn, subject to an annuity to his sister, to his son William; and legacies and annuities to children, brothers, and others. As to the residue of his real and personal estate, including his freehold property in Clerkenwell, he leaves three twelfths, upon trust, for his son James, for life, and then for his children; three twelfths, upon trust, for his son William, for life, and then for his wife and daughters in succession; three twelfths, upon trust, for his daughter Mrs. Julia Mary Kennedy, for life, and then for her children; and three twelfths, upon trust, for the three daughters of his daughter Mrs. Hollins.

PAST DAYS ON THE PERSIAN BORDER.—A TU

SKETCH BY MR. WILLIAM SIMPSON, OUR SPECIAL AR

URKOMAN RAID: THE TOWER OF REFUGE.

IST WITH THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

THE RUSSIAN CRISIS.

It is difficult to prophesy what may be the ultimate effect upon the Indian Empire of the rash act of General Komaroff on the 30th ult. The lives of 900 Afghans, as compared to the maintenance of peace between two such powerful countries as Great Britain and Russia, may indeed appear of very trifling value; nevertheless, we must remember that 900 Afghans have been killed for apparently no other reason than that they assumed (according to General Komaroff's report) "a provocative and manifestly hostile attitude." The statement is naive in the extreme, and reminds one of the American's excuse for shooting a friend of his at a bar: "I guess I shot him in self-defence, 'cause I saw him put his hand in his pocket for his six-shooter to blaze at me with."

Having demonstrated to the complete satisfaction of all concerned the weakness of the Afghans, General Komaroff is awaiting the instructions of his Government, or, as some maintain, the arrival of reinforcements. In the meantime, 900 Afghans lie strewn around Penjdeh, and the Ameer Abdurrahman will be expected by his subjects to show cause why an insult of so "provocative and manifestly hostile" a nature shall remain unavenged. The mothers and wives and sisters of those 900 are probably, at the moment we are going to press, sending up their prayers to Heaven for vengeance. What value are Oriental nations likely to place in our alliance, what respect may we hope to receive from our Indian fellow-subjects, what chance have we of retaining our ancient and much-abused prestige, if we allow allies of ours to be shot down in cold blood at the will and pleasure of any dashing foreign officer yearning for distinction? I am inclined to think that, if this "regrettable incident," as the Emperor of Russia calls it, is allowed to pass over without apology or reparation of any kind, our moral influence in India will pass away also. This is not a question of British interests, it is a question of the lives of our friends and allies. As was stated in a previous Number of the Illustrated London News, "we would not, and dare not, write and print one single sentence that might seem calculated to inflame the passions of either nation to hostility;" at the same time, it is a solemn duty, as a mouthpiece of public opinion, to formally protest against the indifference which seems to be shown in high places both here and at St. Petersburg to the lives of fellow-beings, who have done nothing more criminal than assume a "provocative and manifestly hostile attitude." Had General Komaroff told his Government that the "regrettable incident" had arisen from a desire on his part to test the efficiency of his arms and ammunition, the explanation would not have been more puerile. We must remember that the eyes of 250,000,000 natives of Asia are gazing on us, awaiting the result of the "regrettable incident," with amused curiosity, perhaps, more than interest, and wondering whether the English Sahib is going to salaam to the White Eagle or not. We must remember that our Continental neighbours are looking on also with amused curiosity; and we must not forget that if to these two elements—the population of Asia and Europe—we prove ourselves incapable of defending our national honour and protecting our friends, British interests, which are perhaps not involved at present, will cease to exist in the future. Nor should we leave out of account that wider and Greater Britain, of whose loyalty to the old country we have recently received such striking proofs, but who will scarcely consent to remain under our flag when that flag has become a disgrace and a by-word among nations. If we are really anxious for an honourable extrication from our present dilemma, we should not be content with proclaiming to the wondering world that we are making war preparations, that the B battery of Horse Artillery has received orders to hold itself in readiness for immediate service abroad, and that a torpedo-boat has been commissioned for the Baltic. We should act. We are told that 25,000 men could be massed in Quetta at three weeks' notice. They should be massed at once. While we are telling all the world that we shall be able to send a handful of troops against the Russians a month after war is declared, Russia is coolly concentrating 120,000 men in Central Asia. Our diplomatic negotiations, our terrible manifestoes, frighten nobody; they only serve to give Russia time to concentrate her forces. I am firmly of opinion that the more decided the attitude we assume, the stronger the forces we muster, the better will be our chances of peace—and of an honourable peace.

Russia has much to weigh before going to war. She runs many risks in opposing us. Perhaps the first consideration is that of strength. We know that Russia, when the reserves are called out, can muster (on paper) three million strong. With this army she has to protect an area of nearly nine million square miles. We, on the other hand, have only our Indian frontier to protect by our land forces; the Navy will do the rest. These land forces, nominally, do not exceed 500,000 men; as a matter of fact, they could be raised to almost any desired numbers, and we should have no difficulty in massing a force of 100,000 fully equipped troops on the Afghan frontier, to be reinforced by a second army of 100,000 men on the commencement of hostilities. It is by adopting measures like these that peace may be maintained, and our objects gained more promptly than by telling everybody that we do not intend to mobilise more than 50,000 men. Russia, on the other hand, would not be able to get more than 100,000 men, at most, as far as Herat, and it would take her an enormously long time to transport this large mass of troops to the Desert and maintain it there; besides, even this number would be materially weakened by the necessity of leaving forces to guard the railway, which would have to be built, and convoy the provisions.

Another consideration which Russia would have to face, is the all-important one of finance. Where is the money to come from? say some. Russia is already practically bankrupt, and a big war now might possibly ruin her. It might, of course, have the opposite effect, and stimulate Russian internal industry and agriculture to its utmost. In the event of the war being popular, we must also remember that Russia is rich in sunk capital. Her nobility, her churches and religious houses, her merchants, possess fabulous quantities of jewellery and gems, and these, of course, at the beck of the omnipotent Tsar, would be poured into the Imperial treasury. Besides, for internal purposes, a paper currency would answer the purposes of a circulating medium, just as it did in America. We are, therefore, not inclined to attach the importance to the financial aspect of the question which the English public seems to give it. In this respect, General Skobeleff's view was, perhaps, correct.

But the really weak point of Russia's armour is her uncertainty of the loyalty of her own subjects. The large majority of these can, no doubt, be absolutely relied on, but who are the minority that should be distrusted? This is the question. Who and where are the Nihilists? It is quite impossible to say how and when the determined social agitation known to us as Nihilism will break out into an open revolt. In our opinion, there is but little to dread from the towns, because they are few; from the country, because its inhabitants are scattered. The dangerous place is the army, the very place that should be the safest. Where would Russia be if the army should mutiny? It would not be the first time that autocrats have been betrayed by the very engines with which they have maintained themselves; and mutinies among the troops have occurred in Russia before. Latest advices would seem to show that the Nihilists are fully alive to the importance of gaining over the army, and that they have not been entirely unsuccessful in their labours.

This, then, is the point. England has everything to lose by retreating before Russia, and nothing to fear by confronting her. Russia has everything to gain by fighting us; but it is a gambler's stake on hazard, for she may crumble entirely to dust under the combined influence of English arms, internal disorders, bankruptcy, and destitution.

We should not therefore risk our reputation, our moral influence in Asia, our prestige all over the world, for fear of Russia. By taking up a firm and upright position we are more likely to attain our objects and preserve peace than if we lead Russia to believe that we are either too weak or too cowardly to oppose her.

THE HILL TRIBES OF INDIA.

A delightfully interesting personal narrative, intermixed with characteristic fresh anecdotes of native life on the eastern borders of India, and of administrative official business in the management of primitive races of people, is entitled by its author, with humorous modesty, A Fly on the Wheel (published by W. H. Allen and Co.). "How I Helped to Govern India," which is the second part of the title, sufficiently explains the first part; and Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Herbert Lewin, formerly Superintendent of Hill Tribes in the highland districts above Chittagong, seems to be a first-rate example of those virtues and abilities by which the Indian Civil Service performs its wonderful and beneficent work, to the admiration of all who know what it really is and does. His earliest Indian experience was military, going out in 1857 as a young cadet from Addiscombe, and landing in Bengal just in time, as he relates, to see a sharp bit of warfare in the Sepoy Mutiny War, at the defence of Cawnpore, at the siege of Lucknow, and in the pursuit of Tantia Topee. In 1862, Lieutenant Lewin was appointed District Superintendent of Police at Hazaribagh, among the Sonthals; whence he was transferred, after a year or two, to Noacolly, in the labyrinth of waters and marshy islets at the outlets of the Ganges; but was soon removed again to Chittagong, near the head of the Gulf of Bengal, opposite Calcutta, and dwelt in the hill country of that district till after the Lushai campaign of 1872. The best portions of this volume narrate his adventures and dealings, mostly friendly, and we believe always faithful and useful, with different native tribes who are extremely unlike the Hindoos of the mere cultivated Indian provinces. The Sonthals, inhabiting some tracts of Upper Bengal are a fine, manly race, and the author of this book has a manifest liking for them; but he had the gift of quickly making himself at home with simple folk, ignorant barbarians of brave and honest nature, and of winning their confidence, and even their affection, as well as their respect. The tokens of such mutual sentiments of goodwill are agreeably abundant throughout the volume, which is full of the liveliest incidents, told with great spirit and humour, illustrative of the habits and customs, the ideas and feelings, of the very original people among whom he lived on familiar terms as a patron and protector. A convenient map of the eastern coast, from the Tipperah district down to the port of Akyab, including Chittagong and Arracan, with the rivers and mountain ranges inland to the frontier of Burmah, helps the reader to follow Captain Lewin's frequent excursions in different directions up and down there, to find Chandraguna and Rangamati, successively places of his official residence on the Karnaphuli river; the several abodes of neighbouring chieftains, the Mong Rajah, the Bohmong, the Ranee Kalindi, and Rutton Poia, with whom he had to negotiate; the whereabouts of the Shendus and of the Lushais, predatory highlanders whom it was necessary at length to chastise for their raids in the British tea-plantations of Cachar. He made very laborious journeys, usually on foot, with one or two attendants, to explore the almost unknown topography of the wild region behind the Indian settlements on that shore, and was more than once in peril of his life, being severely wounded by a Shendu assassin, and shot at upon other occasions. The courage, and the energy and determination, with which he proceeded in arresting malefactors and checking mischievous practices, deserved probably more notice from his official superiors at Calcutta than they received for some time; but his services as political officer with General Brownlow, commanding in 1872 the southern wing of the force dispatched against the Lushais, from Demagree into the country of the Sylu and Howlong clans, were publicly acknowledged. It was due to his personal influence with the natives, and to his patience, tact, and sagacity, that the captive British subjects, including the little English girl, Mary Winchester, a child of six years, were safely released, and that the marauders were brought to submit without completely destroying their villages and dispersing their tribes. Captain Lewin had pleasanter relations, of course, with the people under his immediate rule, the Mughs, Chakmas, Bunjoghis, and others, mostly of Arracan race, kindred to the Burmese, and of the Buddhist religion. He studied their language, history, institutions, and local mythology, to very good profit, and it is worth while to learn what he tells us about them. Hunting adventures with tigers, elephants, and other grand game of the forests of South-Eastern Asia, will also be found in this book, for which which Colonel Lewin merits the best thanks of his readers, and as large a number of them as will accept any book of the kind.

A meeting of descendants of Huguenots settled in the United Kingdom was held last evening at the Criterion Restaurant, and a Huguenot Society was formed, with Sir. H. Austen Layard as president.

The School Board for London reassembled on the 16th inst. after the Easter recess. An ineffectual attempt was made by the Rev. G. M. Murphy to induce the Board to present a petition to Parliament in favour of educational endowments, landed property, and ecclesiastical revenues being to some extent made available towards the reduction of the education rate. The Board agreed that a peripatetic plan of teaching mechanics should be tried in Olga-street school and in about twenty of the neighbouring schools in Hackney and the Tower Hamlets.—A bluebook contains some statistics compiled by the Education Department respecting school boards and school attendance committees. From the tables given it appears that, of the total population of England and Wales (Census 1881), 25,974,439, the proportion under school boards was 16,153,855, and under school attendance committees 9,820,584. The jurisdiction of school boards, exclusive of the metropolis, extends over 144 boroughs and 2823 civil parishes; whilst 109 boroughs, 73 urban sanitary districts, and 579 unions are educationally governed by school attendance committees.

A TURKOMAN RAID.

The readers of the Illustrated London News during the past six months have had the opportunity of learning much of the actual condition of those countries of Central Asia, bordering on the line of the Russian advance from the Caspian to Afghanistan, which are immediately affected by the extension of military conquests in that direction. Mr. Simpson, our Special Artist with the British Afghan Boundary Commission, in his long journey from Teheran through the northern parts of Persia and Khorassan to the banks of the Heri-Rud and of the Murghab, north of Herat, continually found the evidences of immense mischief done for many years past by the incessant raids of the marauding Turkomans, whom Russia has effectually subdued. Among his Sketches early published in this Journal were those of Lasgird, a singular "town of refuge," scarcely a hundred miles eastward of Teheran, built expressly to afford occasional shelter to the unhappy peasantry of Northern Persia at the sudden approach of those merciless depredators, manslayers, and kidnappers for the Turkistan slave-markets. A circular fortress of high walls, constructed of hard dried mud, with one low doorway, which could be closed by a stone door and strongly barricaded, and with projecting round bastions and loopholes and battlements for the defenders' musketry, contained interior galleries and platforms, one above another, with hundreds of cells for the accommodation of families gathered from the surrounding country, while their cattle and stores of grain, and their little store of household property, might lie secure at the basement. Similar structures are to be seen in other places along the Border, in some instances with outworks, detached round towers, by the fire from which the enemy's approach could perhaps be arrested for a little while, giving time for those in the main fortress to collect themselves and prepare for its defence.

Mr. Simpson has made personal inquiries in many localities, and obtained a correct acquaintance with the state of things which existed not many years ago, while he has visited some of the Turkoman tribes now inhabiting the country between Merv and Herat, whose former marauding propensities have recently been checked. Our large Engraving is from a Sketch designed by him to illustrate, with complete accuracy in the details of scenery and costume, one of those fierce attacks by the wild horsemen of the Kara-Kum Desert, baffled here, apparently, by the "Tower of Refuge," which were of yearly occurrence, at one point or another, over the entire region. The last of the terrified fugitives, running for their lives from the fields where they have been labouring, or from their village homes beyond, are speeding to the still open door of the fortress; while in the tower outside a few brave men, directed by the chief, who waves his hand and shouts from the roof, begin to fire upon the Turkomans as they gallop up the hill, so as to gain a few minutes for their friends seeking refuge in the main citadel. There is another tower on the rock in the background, the elevated position of which must have commanded a distant view of the coming enemy. The stone cisterns or wells, for use when the stream dries up in summer, the small gardens inclosed with low fences, and two or three small structures looking like tombs or Moslem shrines, are such as may be found about a collection of native dwellings. The usual dress of the Turkomans consists of loose trousers, boots for riding on horseback, and wide-sleeved gowns, with a woollen or cotton scarf tied as a girdle round the waist, and with a "kalpak" or head-dress of sheepskin, the wool outside. A horseman generally does not sit straight, but obliquely, with his left shoulder turned to the rear, and is apt to stand in his stirrups at full gallop. The bridle, and the straps on the horse's neck, are embroidered or ornamented with silver scales and cornelians; the weapons are a musket or rifle slung behind the shoulder, a sabre, and a pistol or two stuck in the girdle.

Captain H. Spalding, in his book on "Khiva and Turkestan," published in 1874, gives a minute account of these people and their habits, and of the manner in which they were, at that time, accustomed to conduct their plundering and kidnapping expeditions. "A week rarely passes," he says, "without a troop of Turkomans equipping themselves for an incursion, or their return from one, and rarely do they return without booty. The hardest lot is that of the Persians, whom the Yomuds, Salors, and Tekkes carry off; the Turkomans take them in such numbers every year, that the price of a Persian slave in the bazaar of Khiva does not exceed twenty-five roubles, or £4 sterling. Still worse is the condition of the captured Persians who fail to find purchasers in Khiva, or whom the Turkomans keep for their own convenience, as slaves in their aouls, for the severest labours. They hamstring those whom they employ as shepherds, to prevent their flight. It is difficult to credit the extent of the cruelty exercised by the Turkomans on their Persian captives. The Persian is much to be pitied who finds himself exposed to the nocturnal attack of these marauders; rags, which scarcely cover his body, are at once substituted for his garments; his hands and feet are loaded with chains, which gall him severely at the slightest movement; and, in the course of several days and weeks, he gets nothing but the worst of food. At night, to prevent any attempt at flight, they place an iron collar round the neck of the prisoner, and fasten it to a block by a chain, which makes every motion known by its rattling. During Vambéry's stay at Gumush Tepe, a night never passed without fire-arms being discharged from the seashore, announcing the return of pirate vessels with their plunder. It was rare to find a Turkoman tent where there were not two or three Persians loaded with chains." Forty thousand of these captives were in Khiva when the Russians came. We will add no further reflections, but merely quote the observation made by Captain Spalding, eleven years ago, upon the Russian expedition to Khiva:—"The success of the expedition will prove a blessing to the whole of Central Asia. One of the first consequences of the fall of Khiva has been the liberation of those Persian captives whose cruel fate is described in these pages, and the abolition of slavery in its chief stronghold. These facts alone should make us join in applauding the triumph of Russia."

The Hon. H. W. Petre has resigned the mastership of the Essex pack of staghounds, which has for about twenty years gone under his name. Mr. Petre is to be presented with a testimonial by members of the Hunt.

A largely attended public meeting, over which the Lord Mayor presided, was held at the Cannon-street Hotel on the 16th inst., at which resolutions were carried that the meeting viewed with deep concern and anxiety the present state of the Navy, and pressing on the Government the necessity of taking immediate steps to provide such additional ships, guns, and men as shall afford the security which our Empire and commerce require; and that the meeting was convinced that, in any financial scheme necessary in the public interests, the Government would have the hearty co-operation of all classes. The principal speakers were Mr. W. H. Smith, M.P., Mr. W. E. Forster, M.P., Admiral Sir J. D. Hay, M.P., and Sir E. Reed, M.P.

THE "LOUIS" VELVETEEN IS "The favourite and most fashionable material of the day." THE WEAR OF EVERY YARD IS GUARANTEED by the Manufacturer, and every yard of the genuine bears the name "LOUIS."

Patterns and prices post-free from nearly all drapers throughout the kingdom.

The strictest examiner may try every test of touch and sight without discovering that these are other than the Genoa Velvets which they so closely resemble, while the peculiar arrangements resulting in the fast woven pile enable them to stand interminable and rough wear, which would ruin real velvets at four times the price. For Costumes and Trimmings it is unequalled, and, in fact, for all purposes in which Silk Velvet may be used we specially recommend the "LOUIS" VELVETEEN.

Every yard of the genuine bears the name "LOUIS."

FROM A SKETCH BY DR. CUNINGHAM, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT OF THE "LANCET."

OUR NOTE-BOOK

When Mr. Palgrave published his "Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics" in 1861, he dedicated the volume to the Poet Laureate, and on stating in the preface that the collection did not include living authors, he expressed a hope that by other hands and in days far distant poems by Tennyson, Lowell, and others would be inserted in his Treasury. Happily, that day has not yet arrived; but Mr. Palgrave has this week proved his admiration of Lord Tennyson's poetry in a way that must be alike satisfactory to poet and to critic. "Lyrical Poems by Alfred, Lord Tennyson, selected and annotated by Francis Turner Palgrave," is an announcement that will be read with interest by all lovers of lyric poetry. His poems have been known to the public for more than half a century, and time and familiarity have in no wise lessened their charm. It is as a singer that the name of Tennyson will live in the literature of his country; and a volume of such a poet's best lyrics must contain "infinite riches in a little room." By-the-way, considering what a consummate master of rhythm Lord Tennyson has become, it is curious to read the statement made by Coleridge fifty-two years ago on the Laureate's earliest volumes. "There are some things of a good deal of beauty in what I have seen. The misfortune is that he has begun to write verses without very well understanding what metre is."

Love, says Thomas Hood, may haunt the grave of love, and watch the mould in vain; but this useless occupation will be gone if Sir Spencer Wells carries his darling scheme of cremation. No doubt it has much to commend it. A city churchyard is the most melancholy place in existence, and we have discovered of late years that it is also one of the most unhealthy. On the other hand, a country churchyard has its poetical aspects, and if cremation had been in vogue in Gray's time we should never have had his "Elegy." Sentiment and poetry, however, need not be wholly banished by cremation. "He that hath the ashes of his friend," says Sir Thomas Browne, "hath an everlasting treasure"; and this fine old writer gives also the following quaint reason for preferring fire to interment: "To be knaved out of our graves, to have our skulls made drinking-bowls, and our bones turned into pipes to delight and sport our enemies are tragical abominations escaped in burning burials."

Nomenclature is not the least curious of the many curious things connected with horse-racing. The same name is bestowed over and over again, either from poverty of invention or from inadvertence, or by mere accident, or perhaps as a good omen; and, like Cremorne, Zephyr, Little Duck, and many another, is both applicable and applied to either sex indifferently, though the mythic Zephyr, who was the sire of the two horses Xanthos and Balios that belonged to Achilles, would probably have considered himself libelled by the little liberty which has been taken with his masculine name. Paradox, the observed of all observers this season, has had at least two predecessors of the same name and of his own sex—Paradox, son of Merlin and Penelope's sister (Pawn), foaled in 1827, and Paradox, son of Phlegon and Clelia, foaled in 1859. Of them the latter ran no fewer than ten times at two years of age; but only won once (the Little John Stakes at Nottingham), and eight times at three years and won once (a Handicap Sweepstakes at Newmarket); and the former, a "terribly high-bred" animal, belonging to the very successful Duke of Grafton, ran many times at two, three, and four years of age, for the Clearwell Stakes, for the Criterion Stakes, for the Oatland Stakes, and so on; but was not a competitor either for the Two Thousand or for the Derby, and only won a few inferior races. This Paradox, son of Merlin, became the property, it would seem, of Prince Demidoff and went to Florence first and afterwards to France, where he remained (till he was sold) as a stud-horse, but did not greatly "illustrate" himself as a sire. Perhaps his namesake of this season may be destined to take away the reproach.

The ex-Presidents of the United States retire very quietly into private life when their term of office is over. President Arthur has resumed his connection as counsel with the firm of Knevals and Ransom, his former partners, and began practice once more on April 15.

French hostesses, ever on the qui vive for something new, have introduced several Tonquinese dishes into their menus for state occasions. One of these is Pilow Turc, a curious amalgamation of cooked rice and fowl, tossed in butter and served with tomato sauce. Another is Dolmas de riz, tiny croquettes, each wrapped in a fresh vine-leaf, and fried in olive oil; and a third is Artichauts à la Russe, formed by stuffing the centres of artichokes with rich forcemeat, and serving them cold in olive oil. The proper garniture of this dish is fresh olive-leaves.

Diplomatists have been very much surprised at the appointment of Count Paul Andreevitch Schouvaloff as Ambassador from the Court of St. Petersburg to Berlin. He is a distinguished soldier, and has seen a great deal of service, having been in the Caucasian and Crimean wars, in the Polish insurrection of 1863, and the Turco-Russian campaign, in the closing conflict of which, the battle of Philippopolis, he took a prominent part. He is well known in Berlin, and is a personal favourite with the Emperor William, so that the appointment is probably one of the best that could possibly be made. His brother, Count Peter Schouvaloff, who has filled the post of Russian Ambassador in London, had so much influence over the late Czar that he was familarly called Peter IV., the last Peter who sat on the throne of all the Russias having been the third of his name. The Schouvaloffs belong to a very ancient family, and it is said that they are all born with the gifts of brains and beauty, and the art of savoir faire.

The Italian Derby, which was run at Rome about a fortnight ago, for the second time since its institution, has set people talking as if horse-racing in English fashion (quite different from that of the "barberi") were an entirely new thing in Italy. But it was in vogue at Florence a long while ago, though of course it was not of much account; there was a Florence Jockey Club in existence at a comparatively early date; there was a movement to found a Società Ippica Toscana in 1868; and some readers may be "surprised to learn" that Florence was the place where the famous Sir Joseph Hawley, who won the Derby four times and "belonged to" Teddington, Beadsman, Musjid, Blue Gown, Fitz-Roland, Rosicrucian, Green Sleeves, Madame Eglentine, Miami, and a "galaxy of talent," began his horse-racing career.

Apparently, even attorneys are human; that is to say that, with all their knowledge of the law, they cannot refrain from libel. An attorney of Bedford has been sentenced to a month's imprisonment for libelling another attorney of Bedford. Surely, an attorney ought to be able to slander his neighbour and yet keep clear of legal consequences, else what is the good of legal education, training, and experience? That diamond should cut diamond, that attorney should libel attorney at all—this, perhaps, is the strangest part of the phenomenon. Augur will libel augur next.

A "Pupil of Eight Years' Standing" at Epsom College offers some rectifications of a paragraph relating to that establishment which appeared in our Issue of April 18, and we willingly make room for the gentleman's emendations. In the first place, he says, the number of foundationers is fifty, and not forty-five. He very truly observes that ten masters, ten prefects, ten sub-prefects, and two sergeants, always on the move, are enough to maintain order among the pupils; and says that the reason why no candidates pass the Oxford and Cambridge Local Examinations is that none are ever sent in; adding, that one fellow went up last year to the Oxford School Board exam., and passed, and that five out of six passed the first M.B. of London University last year. He also points out that nine assistant masters always dine with the boys, the head master dining with those who live in his own house; and pays a well-deserved tribute to that gentleman's scholarship. That Dr. West is a ripe scholar and a fine specimen of an English gentleman is well known by all who have ever been brought into contact with him.

The Municipal Council of Antwerp do not intend the visitors to come to its Exposition to be fleeced by the greed of hotel and lodging-house keepers. Visits of inspection have been paid, details summarised, and an office opened at the Hôtel de Ville to which travellers only have to drive on their arrival. They will find every particular in the books, and can choose accommodation varying from 1s. 3d. to 10s. per day, according to their means. The Council has gone still further by converting the building formerly called the Royal Athenæum into a popular hotel, where five hundred persons can live at the moderate price of one franc a day. The hotel-keepers are not loud in their praises of the authorities, but their action is very wise; for though Antwerp has always been a busy city, her future will be greater than her past, as in a very short time she will be found to have developed into one of the largest ports for merchant shipping in Europe.

The painter of the "Roll-Call" would surely have been a proud and happy woman if she had stood in Antwerp Cathedral the other day while one of her compatriots gazed at Rubens' "Descent from the Cross." He looked long and fixedly, and at last turned away, saying to his companion: "Wonderful! Worthy of Miss Thompson!"

Society, and especially musical society, will miss the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, if they break up their homes in England and retire to Germany, as is said to be likely if war breaks out between Great Britain and Russia. Such a step would, however, be perfectly natural; for a woman, however high her rank, cannot be expected to steel her heart against her own kith and kin; and a more painful position than that of the Duchess of Edinburgh in this country, if the two nations go to war, can hardly be imagined.

It has been thought in some quarters that the new Albert Palace at Battersea might perhaps prove a rival to the Sydenham edifice, which Mr. Ruskin so emphatically declares "not a Palace, nor of Crystal." But in reality there is room enough for both; and, however much the new one may prosper, English men and women are faithful to their old loves, and will never cease to regard the old Palace, which commands so vast a view of pretty country on all sides, with feelings of affection. Was it not there that Joe and Jane, from Hoxton, spent their wedding day? And did not Edwin make a point of taking Angelina down to the flower shows during their courtship? And when Pater and Mater familias take the youngsters down to Sydenham on a firework night, some shreds of romance still hang about the old place and linger in their hearts, and they cannot invest a new locality with the same associations.

The two great races for this week were the Great Metropolitan Stakes (on Tuesday) and the City and Suburban Handicap (on Wednesday); but neither of those races is wont to project a shadow significant of coming events, so far as the chief three-year-old contests are concerned, although St. Albans, winner of the Great Metropolitan, won the St. Leger also in 1860; Virago, winner both of the Great Metropolitan and of the City and Suburban, won the One Thousand also in 1854; and Sefton, winner of the City and Suburban, won the Derby also in 1878. Caractacus, moreover, ran second for the Great Metropolitan in 1862 just before he won his sensational Derby; and for the City and Suburban the famous American horse, Foxhall, ran second just before he began to win his wonderful series of successes at three years of age. As a rule, however, neither of the great spring handicaps at Epsom gives much of a "line" for the "classic" races of the year.

The attire of some of the ladies at the private view of the Grosvenor Gallery was of the fearful and wonderful order. Those saloons have always been the rendezvous of the æsthetes, and grey greens and green browns were in full force, with a sprinkling of old pinks, new golds, and every variety of drabs. Mrs. Langtry, who can wear what she pleases, had a resplendent green butterfly in her black bonnet; and Mrs. Oscar Wilde, who is also pretty enough to set her own fashions, had just borrowed one from Kate Greenaway. It was rather a loss to the community that Mrs. Bernard Beere wore the hue of woe, but she looked remarkably well in it.

How Darley's Arabian preponderates over the two other "primitive sires" take what follows as the proof. Up to the close of the Newmarket Craven Meeting the most notable races were the Lincolnshire Handicap (won by Bendigo), the Leicestershire Handicap (won by Whitelock), the Spencer Plate (won by Cairo), the Great Northamptonshire Stakes (won by Marmora), the Newmarket Biennial for three-year-olds (won by Gracchus), the Crawfurd Plate (won by Ordovix), the Column Stakes (won by the son of Hampton and Red Rag), the Babraham Plate (won by Macheath), the Biennial for four-year-olds (won by Zadig), the Craven Stakes (won by Esterling), the Newmarket Handicap (won by Pizarro), the Friday Plate for three-year-olds (won by Glimmer), and for two-year-olds, the Brocklesby Stakes (won by The Bard), the Lincoln Cup (won by Assignation), the Molyneux Stakes (won by The Bard), the Sefton Park Plate (won by Queen Joanna), the Little John Plate (won by Esher), the Zetland Stakes (won by Moonstruck), the Althorp Park Stakes and the Ascot Plate (both won by The Bard), the Double Trial Plate at Newmarket (won by Assignation), the Two-Year-Old Plate (won by the daughter of Ethelred and Cerise), and the 200-sovs. Plate (won by Luc); and, with the exceptions of Macheath and Assignation, who acknowledge Byerley's Turk for their "first parent," all the winners mentioned trace back in the direct male line to Darley's Arabian.

The quaint and pretty fashion of dancing round the maypole is more familiar to Londoners from seeing the festivities reproduced in pantomime and in comic opera than from witnessing them participated in by buxom, cherry-checked mild-maids and boisterous cow-boys. Yet the maypoles nearest to the metropolis used to be the best attended, and, according to the old authorities, afforded the most sportive entertainments. The one that stood the longest near to London was near Kennington-green, at the back of the houses at the south corner of the Workhouse lane leading from the Vauxhall-road and Elizabeth-place. The site was then vacant, and the maypole used to be placed in the field facing the old Black Prince public-house. It was removed as far back as 1795, when the ground was required for building purposes. Jack o' the Green, too, was a different fellow to what he is now, even down to twenty years ago, when he walked about adorned with a floral wreath, and carrying a long walking-stick, which he whisked about in the course of his rustic dance.

It seems curious that wealthy connoisseurs of the most artistic classes of china and works of art do not care to collect Wedgwood ware. Yet such is the case, and a sale of this beautiful English pottery at Christie's last week failed to realise anything like a satisfactory result. There seems to be little reason for the disregard into which it has fallen, and it can only be accounted for by the fact that crazes after any special articles or any special colours are usually only of a fleeting character. There is such a lot of Wedgwood china, and the modern reproductions at the famous pottery are almost as artistic as the originals, many of which were designed by Flaxman, while those representing classical bas-reliefs were copied from ancient models from Herculaneum, lent by Sir William Hamilton to Josiah Wedgwood. Of course, these have been standing patterns ever since 1759, when the factory commenced to turn out the celebrated ware; and as there is a continuous flow on the market, the pottery of a hundred and twenty years ago is little more sought after than that of the present day. Nevertheless, we should like to see native artistic pottery meet with more encouragement at the hands of those who set the fashions in bric-à-braccircles.

The French Government having taken the Hotel of the Prince Chimay, in Paris, for the purpose of extending l'Ecole des Beaux-Arts, his Highness disposed by auction of his collection of pictures and articles of virtù. The gem which attracted amateurs from all parts of Europe was Greuze's celebrated picture, "La Dormeuse." Although only 21 inches in height by 18 in breadth, it realised 3600 guineas. Small pictures have lately fetched much larger prices, in proportion to their size, than big ones. And no wonder. Few people have room for gigantic canvases, however worthy; while a place can always be found for a little treasure. Let modern painters who aspire to posthumous honours take the hint.

The coming Aylesbury and Rickmansworth Railway, with its branch to Chesham and détour in the direction of Amersham, will open up some of the loveliest country in South Bucks. The county has hitherto been practically unknown, as it is merely skirted on its borders by the North and Great Western lines of rail, and its centre is as slow and primitive as if the iron horse were a thing unknown. When the Chiltern Hills, with their hanging beech woods, are accessible, artists will, indeed, have fresh fields and pastures new open to them, and we may expect to see some very novel and vigorous landscapes in our exhibitions. Buckinghamshire has no prominent rivers or picturesque streams, but fir and beech trees mingle as they do on the broken ground at the foot of the Alps, and it is as rich in wild flowers as the lower slopes of the Jura.

What if it should turn out that the "explosive" which cost poor Mr. Swainson so dear was merely a "sample" submitted for the inspection of "my Lords," long forgotten, and left to itself until it "went off" by one of those accidents that will happen in the best regulated Admiralties, without any malice prepense on the part either of "dynamitards" or aggrieved officials? Such an idea, wild as it may be, has been entertained.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

The one hundred and sixteenth exhibition of the Royal Academy, which opens on Monday next, will be chiefly recollected for the increase in the number rather than for the quality of the works exhibited. By this, we do not mean that the general average falls below that of many of its immediate predecessors, but that the additional wall-space is not accompanied by any very remarkable display of that genius which we had been led to imagine was waiting for an opportunity to assert itself. The principal change in the arrangement of the rooms, by means of which Sir Frederick Leighton's promises have been fulfilled, is the opening out of what is known as Gallery II. of two new rooms especially devoted to water colours, engravings, &c., and the extension of oil pictures over the two rooms thus gained. Whether this is an altogether unmixed benefit, the public will have to pronounce upon. They have now no less than eleven galleries—including the sculpture—through which to work, before arriving at that happy oasis of solitude which we venture to prophesy the Water-Colour Room will become, unless it be used as an annexe to the refreshment department, of which it almost seems to form an element. But the question which naturally arises is—To what purpose are water colours included in the exhibitions at Burlington House? Its governing body recognises no distinction, however eminent, in this branch of painting. David Cox, P. De Wint, Copley Fielding, William Hunt, are a few among many names, which may be cited as being found in the first ranks of English art, yet never acknowledged by the Royal Academy or admitted to take a place in their ranks; although no such exclusiveness was contemplated or imposed by the original foundation. For different reasons, we think that the exhibition of architectural drawings might far more advantageously take place at the institution especially devoted to that art. It is true that among the Royal Academicians architects find a few places; but it is not, let us hope, on the strength of their paper designs, but upon their practical achievements, that they are elected. It is, however, by no means with the view of obtaining still further wall-room for oil paintings that we raise this objection to the admittance of water-colour drawings, &c., to Burlington House; for a very casual survey of this year's exhibition is sufficient to show that for the present, at least, the space is sufficient for the demand, provided that among the rejected or unhung works none are of higher merit than those for which room has been found. Moreover, we are still more strongly of opinion that it is not by indefinitely increasing accommodation, but by restricting privileges, that the best impetus will be given to art in this country.

On the present occasion, we cannot do more than glance generally at the contents of the galleries, reserving for the future any particular remarks on the special qualities of the works exhibited. The places of honour in the large gallery are this year assigned to Mr. Millais and Mr. Tadema. "The Ruling Passion" (212) represents an ornithologist lying on a sofa, covered by a blanket, and explaining to a group of eagerly listening children the beauties of a stuffed bird, which he holds in his hand. The wistful, curious faces of the children are full of life and expressiveness, and their attitudes charmingly simple and naive. The ornithologist himself, which is a capital, if somewhat free, portrait of Mr. Millais' brother-Academician, Mr. T. O. Barlow, the engraver, gives scope for a display of that ease of posture which Mr. Millais catches with far greater sympathy than he displays for dignity or formality. Another work by Mr. Millais, "The Orphans" (859), is a charming little girl in a white dress, carrying a rabbit in her apron. It is a work which belongs to the series of children's portraits on which he has been occupied for some time past, and is very much sweeter than most of its predecessors. But, amongst the portrait-painters of the year, Mr. Herkomer will gain increased reputation by "Miss Katharine Grant" (360), dressed in white, on a very light background. In finish and delicacy—qualities which have not hitherto been the distinctive marks of Mr. Herkomer's talent—this work will vie with any in the rooms. Mr. Alma Tadema's "Piano" (276) represents the philosopher on a marble seat, and recalls somewhat the "Sappho" of two years ago. All that marvellous fidelity of execution and careful study of archæology which distinguish Mr. Tadema's work are to be found in the accessories of the work, whilst the colours are more subdued than usual. In the face of the Greek philosopher, as in that of each of his Sicilian auditors, male and female, there is evidence of a persistent desire to reproduce the types which have been handed down to us; but whilst showing himself a faithful interpreter of the past, Mr. Alma Tadema does not forget that he is an artist of the present, and throws into his canvas a sense of living actuality. To him also must be in a measure credited the success of his follower, Mr. Waterhouse, whose "St. Eulalia" (503) is one of the most striking works by the younger men. Mr. Orchardson's "Salon of Madame Récamier" (172) will be one of the chief centres of attraction, uniting as it does literary interest to artistic merit. Far richer in tone than anything he has of late attempted, this work is almost entirely free from that "acidity" of colour with which Mr. Orchardson has been so frequently reproached. The deep crimson curtain contrasts admirably with the white and gold of the room, and whilst maintaining a high tone throughout the canvas, in no degree eclipses the importance of the characters. Of these, Madame Récamier, the "sphinx" of the Empire, is the most important and the most graceful figure, reclining on an ottoman, and holding in conversation a group of statesmen, littérateurs, and soldiers, who occupy one side of the large canvas. Amongst these are to be distinguished Talleyrand and Metternich, Sieyès and Bernadotte, and a host of others; whilst in the centre of a group on the left is Madame Récamier's literary rival, Madame De Staël, who, for the peace of mind of some of her contemporaries, was "so consolingly plain."

Of the other works which in a cursory glance most strike the eye may be mentioned the President's frieze, "Music" (344), a companion work to "The Dance," already exhibited—a picture with a score of figures, delightful in colour, but scarcely successful in pose; Mr. Frank Holl's portrait of "Lord Dufferin" (219), a full-length standing figure in a fur coat; Mr. Hook's "The weary sun hath made a golden set" (240), conceived in a very different spirit to the majority of the artist's works. The sea is glistening with innumerable colours, under a sky flecked with many-coloured clouds, through which the sun's light is glancing. The spot chosen is on the Cornish coast, looking towards the Land's End; and the skill with which the orange and purple tints of an autumn evening on that shore have been caught is very remarkable. Mr. Brett has likewise been practising his magic art in neighbouring seas, and his "Norman Archipelago" (1106), in the full blaze of a mid-day sun, will be accounted one of his most successful achievements. Over the scarcely rippled sea a few fisher-boats are lazily drifting in the tideway—the only objects giving any sense of movement, for the water seems to have scarcely energy enough to ripple over the sea-weed covered rocks which break the foreground. In the distance rise Herm, Brichon, and Guernsey, breaking through a sea-mist which obscures the lower shores.

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.

It may be thought by some that the present year's exhibition shows a falling off in interest from some of its predecessors; but if it displays few remarkable works—and although Mr. Burne Jones is altogether unrepresented—the general average is a fair one. The place of honour is honestly earned by Mr. W. B. Richmond's "Audience of an Athens Theatre" (69), a large canvas containing upwards of fifty figures, upon all of whom careful elaboration has been bestowed. The audience is supposed to be watching the performance of the "Agamemnon" of Æschylus, and to have had its feelings roused to fever pitch by the speech in which Clytemnestra declares how she carried out her dreadful oath. In the centre of the group is the Archon performing his principal function as constitutional ruler of Athens, in attending the theatre. On either side of him stands a young priest of Dionysos in leopard skins, but beyond there is nothing to indicate his office or position. The elders, ranged on the marble benches in dignified attitudes, are wrapt in deepest attention, their richly-coloured robes—saffron and red—giving picturesqueness to the scene. In the back rows a few women are seen, rather, however, as attendants than as spectators. Beyond the theatre, which is in the open air, but covered with a yellow veil, one sees the Acropolis, and in the farther distance the blue mountains which look on Marathon. It is with this part of the picture that we are disposed to be least content; the deep blue of the sky above the theatre, where it is visible under the veil, contrasts too strongly with the same sky as seen more obliquely between the pillars of the theatre; whilst the absolutely shapeless blue mountains, without form or substance, have a look of uncompleted work. In spite, however, of these drawbacks, the picture is a very remarkable one, and will give an additional cause of regret to the Royal Academy that this painter persistently holds himself aloof from its exhibitions and declines to accept its advances. Mr. Richmond's other works comprise portraits of "Miss M. Burne Jones" (10), of an old lady with silver hair (110), dressed in black, very stately and noble looking; of "Mrs. Waters" (113), in a low-toned red brocade dress; of "Lady Loyd-Lindsay" (174), who, in spite of her grey hair, has a smooth brow and a young face—a portrait full of grace and quiet dignity; of "Mr. Andrew Lang" (191), in brown velveteen coat, looking somewhat wan and sad, and wanting in that keen glance which the original possesses, but nevertheless a very masterful performance; and one of "Miss Freshfield" (309), dressed all in white, displaying those delicate refinements of shadow which Mr. Richmond uses with so much effect.

Mr. Millais exhibits two portraits—one of his niece, "Miss Margaret Millais" (56), a fair-haired girl in a white frock, and one of "Mr. Gladstone" (54), in his red gown as D.C.L. (Oxon). The face, either intentionally or not, is far softer in expression, especially about the mouth and chin, than in the previous portrait of the Premier by the same artist; and somehow it seems to lack something of the character of the man who has exercised so remarkable an influence over his contemporaries. As a work of art, however, Mr. Millais' work cannot compare with Mr. Frank Holl's portrait of the late "Lord Overstone" (33), which is the best picture of the room for brilliancy, transparency, and colouring. Lord Overstone is represented in his wheel chair, in a black velvet coat and cap—the ideal of a venerable old man, who faces the close of life with serenity. If, however, any should be disposed to find a want of stern simplicity in the work, they have only to turn to the adjoining work of the same artist, the "Portrait of Mr. William T. Palmer" (28) where a quiet gentleman in a plain frock-coat is rendered with simple strength. Between these two specimens of realistic art is hung Mr. G. Watts' "Love and Life" (30), of which the replica has excited so much furore in the United States. The idea is expressed by two young figures scaling the heights of time or duty, Love helping on Life and making the hardest road pleasant—the roughest ways smooth. In none of his recent works has Mr. Watts succeeded better in showing how great he is as a colourist, and how defective as an anatomist. The limbs of both of the figures are painfully attenuated, regardless alike of classic proportions and natural development, whilst the trunk of the body of the mortal being is framed upon a model which can scarcely have drawn the breath of life. On the other hand, in the figure of Love, Mr. Watts has succeeded in gracefully combining the adjunct of wings with arm-bearing shoulders—no small achievement, as both artist and sculptor well know; and on the iridescent feathers of these wings he has expended his art with a result which is almost marvellous. Mr. Watts has another ideal work, "Ararat" (172), of which the chief characteristic is the varying depths of the blue sky against which the mountain top stands out. In "Life and Love," the foreground is made up of studies of rocks, painted with much detail—the more distant hills being lost in blue, whilst all above the cloud-flecked sky is lighted up with innumerable colours. In the "Ararat" the one colour prevails, and a comparison between the two works reveals the artist's power and sense of beauty. He contributes also two excellent portraits, one of "Mrs. F. Myers," under a canopy of dark leaves—a bright face and a gorgeous costume—and one of the late "Lord Hobart" (344), painted in a more serious tone and full of dignity; and one of "Miss Rachel Gurney" (62), a lovely figure in a black dress leaning against a wall, her hands folded behind her.

There are two portraits of "Mr. Robert Browning," one in his doctor's robes (6), by his son, Mr. R. B. Browning, and consequently challenging comparison with Mr. Millais's portrait of "Mr. Gladstone," and showing, but too clearly, the impassable gulf which lies between the artist and the craftsman; the other, by Mr. R. Lehmann (127), very simple and quiet, carefully painted, but a somewhat prosaic likeness of the poet.

Amongst the other portraits which will attract attention, mention should be made of those by Mr. Herkomer, of which that of "Mr. Sandbach" (197), a quiet, grey-headed old gentleman, is the best, though that of Mr. Villiers Stamford, the composer of "Savonarola," is the most ambitious; of Mr. Sargent's portrait of "Mrs. Mason" (31), full-length in black dress, with much transparent muslin—very clever, but hard and stiff; of Mr. P. R. Morris's "Miss Serjeantson" (51), a young girl in black and white, well planted on her feet, but otherwise uninteresting, whilst it occupies a space which might have been better occupied by the same artist's "Portrait in Silver Tones" (236), recalling some of his earlier work; of Mr. C. E. Hallé's portraits of his father (209) and of "Mrs. Douglas Labalmondière" (193), in neither of which does he seem to have seized more than a surface likeness of the originals. It is difficult to say whether Mr. Herbert Schmalz's figures—"Edmée" (52), "Denise" (86), and the like—should be ranked amongst the portraits. They are rather full-length studies, harmonious in colour, and executed with remarkable skill, but not altogether without a taint of affectation. In his portrait of "Lady Walsingham" (64) the attention to lace and frills reduces the value of the work as a portrait to a minimum, and suggests more the idea of a coloured photograph than of a work in which the painter's power has been allowed to dominate over the milliner's skill, and that Mr. Schmalz is capable of better work may be seen in the "Souvenir de Blankenberghe" (235), artificial and imitative as it is.

We must not conclude this first notice of the Grosvenor without alluding to Mr. Alma Tadema. He is represented by two portraits: one of "Dr. Epps" (1), seated by the bedside of a patient, painted with great minuteness—the black coat, red beard, and even the hand holding the watch being reckoned with carefully in filling up a canvas in which the white bed occupies so much space; the other, which pleases us far more, that of "Mr. Francis Powell" (58), looking as if it had been dashed off at the spur of the moment, and carrying with it the first fresh impressions of the artist. Mr. Alma Tadema also sends two of his carefully executed Roman archæological works, "Who is It?" (57), a group of three girls on a marble terrace, one of whom is looking over the wall; and the other, "Expectation" (81), a single figure of a girl watching the arrival of her lover from across the blue bay, on the smooth face of which the brown sail of his boat is to be seen; in the distance the white town—of which every house seems to have been painted separately—is glistening in the sun; whilst over the edge of the marble terrace the pink flowers of the oleander are climbing, and shedding warmth upon the scene.

We reserve for a future occasion our remarks on the remaining works.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

Our Special Artist, Mr. Walter Paget, accompanying the army of Lieutenant-General Sir Gerald Graham in the operations around Souakim, was with the force marching to Tamai, in the first days of April, and sends us Sketches of a few incidents which he then witnessed. General Graham took with him nearly all his troops, leaving the New South Wales Artillery, the 17th Bengal Infantry, and small detachments of every regiment, to guard the camp at Souakim, on Thursday, the 2nd ult.; and, in the evening of that day, his force occupied Teselah Hill and other heights overlooking Tamai. Early next morning, two columns advanced to that place; the one under command of General Fremantle consisted of Lancers, Hussars, Mounted Infantry, General Hudson's Indian Horse, four guns of the Horse Artillery, six Gardners and two mountain guns, the Grenadiers, the Coldstreams, the Scots Guards, and the Australians. The other body of troops was under the command of General Sir John McNeill, comprising a detachment of the Berkshire Regiment, the East Surrey and the Shropshire Regiments. The entire infantry force numbered 6500. A zereba was formed in the course of the march, and, in order to lessen the work of the scouts, it was decided to inflate the balloon, the gas being carried in tubes compressed into seventy-five volumes. The officers of the Royal Engineers in charge of the balloon are Major Temple and Lieutenant Mackenzie. The balloon is made of gold-beaters' skin, is 23 ft. in diameter, contains 7000 ft. cubic of gas, and its total weight is 90 lb. It is attached by a rope 200 ft. long to a waggon or any other convenient holdfast; one of the officers goes up in the car, and thence commands a very extensive view. Messages are sent up and down, written on small pieces of paper attached to the rope by a sliding loop. The gas is brought from England, having been manufactured at Chatham, and the balloon can remain aloft during nine hours. The force above mentioned, on the 3rd ult., occupied Tamai, after a slight resistance on the part of the enemy. The Arabs made themselves scarce, and the infantry returned to rest at McNeill's zereba, the cavalry going back to Souakim. The British loss during the operations was one man killed and six wounded, amongst the latter two Australians. The Arab encampment or collection of huts at Tamai was set on fire before the troops left it; but a correspondent says that it was scarcely worth a lucifer-match. A Soudani village is the most abjectly poverty-stricken collection of dog-holes in the universe. A tiny inclosure of sticks and coarse matting, with a hole inside for fire-place, perhaps an "angareeb," or bed, and a couple of flat stones for grinding corn—such is the description of an ordinarily comfortable dwelling in Tamai. Osman Digma's own house was not a whit better than the others. As the Arabs appear to have taken good care to send away all their cattle and portable property to the hills, the burning of their village will not do them much harm; they may regard it as a symbol of their defeat, and that is all."

We are indebted to Dr. Cuningham, of the Medical Staff, who has been acting as special correspondent of the Lancet, for a Sketch of the battle of Hasheen, fought on March 20, some Illustrations of which, by our Special Artist, were published on the 11th inst. This Sketch, taken from a different point of view, shows the square formed by the British troops, assailed on all sides by thousands of Arabs, who poured down from the surrounding hills; to the left, on a rising ground above the road to Tamai, are the Naval Brigade with their guns, and some of the Royal Marines; the village of Hasheen is seen lying at the base of two hills in the background, towards the right of the view. In the foreground are some of the Royal Engineers and other troops who had been at work constructing a new intrenched position and zereba, and were interrupted by the enemy's attack. The advancing bodies of the enemy were repeatedly charged by the 5th Regiment of Lancers and the 20th Hussars, as well as by the Bengal Cavalry, but rallied afterwards with great courage, and were finally repulsed by the infantry formed in square. Among the foremost combatants on this occasion, as in the attack made on the zereba two days later, on Sunday, the 22nd, were young boys, who fought as bravely as any of the men. Two of them were made prisoners, and a photograph was taken of them, which is copied in the corner of our Engraving.

It has been officially announced that the greater portion of the Souakim column is about to be withdrawn and brought to Cairo. The autumn campaign in the Soudan will be abandoned. The troops will return as soon as the Nile again begins to rise. A garrison will, however, in all probability be left at Dongola, Wady Halfa, and Korosko. The health of the British troops on the Nile remains good. They have nearly finished building their mud huts, and the hospital huts have been in use some time. Great difficulty is experienced in getting sufficient wood and mats for roofing. The weather is very hot, the maximum temperature by day being about 110 deg.; but the nights are cool. Lord Wolseley was expected to arrive at Souakim this week to superintend the final arrangements there. The railway is not to be constructed beyond Otao. Scattered bands of Arabs here and there continue to annoy the British convoys, but no important action has recently taken place.

The Board of Trinity College, Dublin, at their meeting last Saturday, decided to submit the names of the Marquis of Waterford, the Earl of Milltown, and the Earl of Rosse to the Senate of the University of Dublin, which is to select a Chancellor of the University in room of the late Lord Cairns.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

In a society constituted on a limited though not exclusive basis it is always easy to forecast the general character of the year's exhibition. Members before their election have already acquired a distinctive style; and it is only natural that they should be content with conditions which have found acceptance with the public, and have established their claims to distinction; and with limited wall-space at their disposal, it must happen that certain peculiarities must seem constant qualities. But it can scarcely be said that the exhibitions of the "Old Society" are ever monotonous: each year some members show distinctive qualities or superior excellence, and this year is no exception to the general rule. Sir John Gilbert, the President, for instance, forsakes military pageants and the noise of battle to give us an almost Salvator-like landscape, "Banditti Gambling" (151), in which the figures play a very subordinate part. The gnarled trees, with their rich foliage, the lights glinting through the wood, the purple hills in the background, form a landscape all the more attractive as it differs so widely from its surroundings. Mr. Carl Haag, in addition to two Arab heads—"Ali Ben Osman" (6), and a "Soudanese Beauty" (40)—painted with consummate power and skill, sends a bustling scene of the "Bab el Mahkamah" (161), the gate of justice at Jerusalem, through which a bound captive is being hurried into prison. The lights falling from above are reflected on the rich coloured cloaks of the jailers and others, and in the gloom of the doorway on either side stands a grim soldier in chain armour. Mr. Stacy Mark's "Favourite Author" (154) is another gem of the exhibition—a priest in undress, seated at a table immersed in a book. There is here no straining after effect, no forced humour or facile trick. The artist relies solely upon the excellence of his work and the reality of his subject. The picture might have been painted three hundred years ago; it would have been as equally true to life as it will be three hundred years hence. Mr. Du Maurier, who is also ambitious in this line, can scarcely be considered as successful. His full-length portrait of a lady with a violin, to which he gives the title of "A Young Face, an Old Tune" (176), is rather wanting in life. Her yellow skirt, with brown bodice and train, are very admirably painted; her surroundings are delicate and harmonious: but the figure does not live as Mr. Marks' old bookworm in his grey serge frock and black thread stockings. In Mr. E. K. Johnson's companion works, "Saturday" (174) and "Sunday" (96), there is no little simple grace—a plainly dressed country girl doing her shopping in the one, and on her way to church in the other picture. Better still, however, is Mr. Henry Wallis's "Bruges Girl Going to Market" (140) in her black faille and lace cap, painted with Flemish accuracy and finish. Mr. Albert Moore has three figure-pieces, of which the most important is "A Yellow Room" (232), a nude figure, excellently drawn, standing against a rich yellow background. His draped figures are but slightly distinguishable from his previous works except by their names, "Oranges" (286) being a girl in a rich orange-coloured dress, and "Lanterns" (294), one in light green amongst a number of paper lanterns, from which no light apparently falls. Miss Constance Phillott's "Last Stitches" (57) is the best of her decorative figures, and Mr. Arthur Hopkins' "Daphne" (141) of his rustic maidens with classic names. Prominent among the genre pictures is Mr. Charles Gregory's "Smuggler" (31): a wounded man, about whom his companions seem very indifferent, is lying on a coil of ropes behind a boat, whilst his wife leans over him full of anxiety and fear. If the rest of the picture were up to the level of this group, it would deserve great praise; but the artist's powers or interest seem to have failed him before the work was completed. Similarly, Mr. H. Glindoni's "Love Philtre" (67), in spite of the care with which the old alchemist's laboratory is worked up, is a disappointing work; the lady's face tells no tale—whether the philtre be for herself or for another, and that of the old man suggests only contemptuous indifference, either for his own wares or for those who use them. Mrs. Allingham's "Lessons," on the other hand, is complete and carefully composed. The light from the open window is streaming into the schoolroom where the governess and her two pupils are cheerily facing the day's duties. There is a charming grace as well as expressiveness in the faces of all three, and the pose of the girl reciting her task is excellent.

It is out of doors, however, that water-colour artists show to the most advantage; and between the limits of the intense realism of Mr. Birket Foster's "Dipping Place" (91) and the idealism of Mr. Francis Powell's "Sunlit Waters" (30) and "Opalescent Sea" (254), or Mrs. M. Lofthouse's "Pembroke Castle" (234), there are plenty of works to admire. Mr. Herbert Marshall, for example, who has made his art-home among London streets, is very strong in the view of "St. Paul's, Looking up Ludgate-hill" (129), before the disfigurement of the street by the railway viaduct, just as autumn evening is closing in, and gaslight and daylight are struggling for pre-eminence, and in "Piccadilly-circus" (111) by night. At "South Shields," too (117), and at "Newcastle" (227) he is equally at his ease, and manages to throw into his work the sense of busy movement, and at the same time to lift from the scene its more sordid elements. Mr. Thorne Waite, on the other hand, is the painter of quiet nooks and peaceful pastorals. His "Village in the Marsh" (167), with downs rising in the distance, is a spot far from the busy strife of men; and of such he gives half a dozen examples under various conditions of weather and light, but all breathing the same air of repose. His old colleague, Mr. Collingwood Smith, is another to whom the Southdowns are familiar sketching grounds—although he is not so faithful to his native county, but wanders at will over the Simplon to the "Lagoons of Venice" (20)—to the "Claudian Aqueduct" (124), back to Hampshire again, taking pleasant notes by the way. Mr. George Boyce's "Brougham Castle" (103) will, we think, disappoint his admirers as much by its fantastic colouring, as by a certain hardness of outline; but Mr. Albert Goodwin will charm equally by his grey "Clovelly" (85), as by his "Delectable Mountains" (92), covered with patches of pink flowers; and Mr. North's "Mill Stream" (44), with its tender green foliage and plashing water, will establish him still more firmly in his place in the first rank of English water colourists. Mr. Cuthbert Rigby's "Seascale" (1) is interesting as a study of sand and sky, but he fails to analyse the true effects of light as Mr. Alfred W. Hunt has done in his "Summer Paradise" (5), or his still more characteristic work, "Before the Blaze of Noon" (18). It is, perhaps, unnecessary to add that Mr. W. Callow, Mr. W. Collingwood, Mr. Charles Davidson, Mr. J. P. Jackson, contribute their usual quota of excellent work, but none of the specimens are so distinctive as to call for any remark beyond saying that they fully maintain the high level to which these artists have raised English water-colour painting. Miss Clara Montalba has also a number of Venice sketches, in which the white or grey skies and water predominate. Mr. Henry Moore's "Waiting for the Tide" (214)—a number of fishing-boats high and dry upon the beach—is the most important of his four works, and displays a greater variety of colour than usual with him; and Mr. Oswald Brierly gives a lively scene from "A Whale Chase" (185), of which the chief defect seems to be the dirtiness of both sky and sea.

Here we break off, not because we have in any way exhausted all the good works on the walls, but because want of space precludes our referring individually to a majority of the works exhibited.

Messrs. Christie, Manson, and Woods disposed last Saturday of a choice collection of modern pictures, water-colour drawings, and sculpture, formed by the late Mr. George Schotel, of Brixton. The collection contained some fine examples of J. L. Gérôme, Carl Haag, J. Linnell, sen., T. Faed, R.A., and Turner, for which good prices were obtained; the whole collection realising £15,300.

The growing taste for photography, and the ease with which amateurs can obtain very satisfactory results, justify Messrs. Marion in issuing a new edition of their "Practical Guide to Photography" (Marion and Co., Soho-square). It is written in plain language, gives definite instruction to beginners, and tells adepts how, by retouching and other processes, to give finish to their works. The more delicate operations of printing with sensitised paper, toning and fixing prints, and the means by which the difficulties of printing and toning may be surmounted, are explained with care and clearness.

Sir Thomas Jones, President of the Royal Hibernian Academy, presided last Saturday night at a distribution of prizes to the successful students, and gave an address, in the course of which he said that if they desired to win fame they ought to bend all their energies towards the great arena of artists, the Metropolis of the British Empire. It might be thought that in saying this he was giving unpatriotic advice; but it was sound advice. Did they imagine that the names of Barry, Mulready, Danby, Sir Martin Shee, Foley, and the present Irish director of the National Gallery in London, would be as familiar as household words if these eminent men had remained in Ireland? One of these had been President, and another might have been President had he chosen, of the Royal Academy.

The East London Industrial Exhibition at the Drill-Hall, Whitechapel-road, will be opened next Monday afternoon.

Mr. Alderman Isaacs and Mr. Alderman Gray having declined to serve the office of Sheriff at the election in June, Mr. Alderman Evans has consented to serve. The senior Alderman for Lord Mayor is Mr. Alderman Staples.

Last week the Lord Mayor opened an attractive bazaar and art exhibition at the Vestry-hall, Haverstock-hill, in aid of the Hampstead Home Hospital and Nursing Institution. This institution was founded in 1882, its object being to combine the medical advantage of a hospital with the privacy and comfort of a home for patients able to pay, wholly or in part. An address read by Mr. Owthwaite, hon. secretary, stated that 174 patients had been treated. It was for the purpose of paying off a debt and of enlarging the sphere of that institution that the bazaar and art exhibition was organised. The meeting was addressed by the Lord Mayor, Sir H. Holland, M.P., Alderman and Sheriff Whitehead, and other gentlemen, in advocacy of the claims of the institution.

The mail-steamer Duke of Westminster, Captain Waterman, has sailed for Queensland with the following emigrants and bounty passengers—viz., 207 single men, 103 single women, and married couples and children equal to 108 adults.

The seventh annual Italian ball (evening and fancy dress), under the patronage of Mr. H. Burnley Heath, Consul-General of Italy, for the benefit of the Italian Benevolent Society and French Hospital, will take place at the Freemasons' Hall on Tuesday, the 12th inst. Tickets may be obtained at the Italian Consulate, 31, Old Jewry, and at the Freemasons' Tavern.

Steamers arrived at Liverpool during the past week with live stock and fresh meat on board from American and Canadian ports; making the total arrivals for the week 2614 cattle, 9730 quarters of beef, and 2060 carcases of mutton—which figures, in comparison with those of the preceding week, show a somewhat large increase in the imports of live stock, but a decrease in the shipments of fresh meat.

Mr. Sydney Buxton, M.P., presided last Saturday at the second annual general meeting in connection with the Committee of Managers of London Board Schools. Sir John Lubbock, M.P., in the course of some observations, expressed his opinion that the inhabitants of London owed the managers of elementary schools a deep debt of gratitude for the zeal and unselfishness with which they devoted much valuable time to the very important functions they had patriotically consented to undertake.

A fancy market was held on Thursday and Friday at the National Industrial Home for Crippled Boys at Kensington; a concert is announced to be given to-day (Saturday) at the Townhall, Kensington, by the South Kensington Ladies' Choir, on behalf of the Children's Hospital, Paddington; and a floral calendar bazaar on behalf of Mrs. Hilton's Crèche, Infant Infirmary, Orphan, Convalescent, and Training Homes, is to be held at Cannon-street Hotel this (Saturday) afternoon, and on Monday and Tuesday next.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

It was surely a mistake to suppose that Robertson's comedy, called "Ours," was revived at the Haymarket Theatre as a catchpenny method of increasing public excitement during a grave moment of political anxiety. True it is that the play is dated at or about the period when the Guards left London for the Crimea; that one of the characters is a Russian Prince; and that the last act of the play takes place in an officer's hut in the Crimea. But these bare facts would surely not be sufficient to revive an interest in a favourite comedy just because the Afghans have been defeated at Pul-i-Khisti, and the Russian and English Foreign Offices are at loggerheads. The play was revived because, unfortunately, Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft have decided very shortly to retire from management, and because this particular play was not included in the Robertsonian farewell series of comedies given at the Haymarket a short time ago. It would have been, no doubt, a disappointment to very many if that pleasant and pretty volume full of old Prince-of-Wales-Theatre recollections had been closed without showing us once more the original Mary Netley and the Hugh Chalcot of Mr. Bancroft. Many may have forgotten that in the first cast of "Ours" Mr. Bancroft was the young lover, Hugh M'Alister, who composes pretty verses for young ladies, and flirts with them, sheltering from the rain, sub tegmine fagi. But Mr. Bancroft soon abandoned light comedy for strongly marked character parts. He succeeded Mr. Dewar as Tom Stylus and Mr. John Clarke as Hugh Chalcot in the two earliest plays of Robertson, and he has played them with renewed point and strength ever since. As for Mary Netley, there could be only one representative of that delightful character. This and other congenial characters were written for Mrs. Bancroft, and no one but Mrs. Bancroft can be quite satisfactory in them. People complain of the absurdity of several scenes in "Ours," particularly the playing at soldiers by the two light-hearted girls in the Crimean hut. But it always struck me that the objection was quite as extravagant as the incident. If Mary Netley had not been painted as she was, understood as she was, and acted as she was, of course such a scene would have been impossible; but I can find nothing in Mary or her friend so babyish, unnatural, or even so hard-hearted, as some severe critics represent. I see only two merry unconventional girls, full of high spirits at the novelty of landing in the Crimea, and full of joy at the prospect of an early meeting with the men they love. They are not sketched or represented as either frivolous or inhuman. They are borne away by the excitement of the moment, as many girls are, and do not pause to reflect or to be serious. In the old days, when these plays were first produced, we never saw these blemishes that are now so constantly—and no doubt with reason—pointed out. I have seen many an audience moved to tears by the exquisite playing of Sergeant Jones by Fred Younge, an actor who had an appreciation of a tender situation such as I have never seen equalled. The parting between Sergeant Jones and the young ladies in the drawing-room, the sense of military duty and discipline overbearing the full heart that is swelling almost to bursting under the affectionate fellow's tunic, and that wonderful throb in the voice with which Younge used to bring up before the mind a whole future of despair with the words, "the missus is waiting down-stairs in the hall for me now"—that was something like acting, was it not? Robertson's plays would never have lived a week if they had not been understood. Where are the tears now when Sergeant Jones says anything? Not a single eye can squeeze out one, for the pathos is not even suggested. I don't think in the old days we regarded Lady Shendryn as a vulgar, uncongenial, irrational woman, who tries to be comic at her husband's expense; or Sir Alexander as a mixture of boor and martinet, whose utterances with "my lady" that once caused a laugh now produce a shudder. It was the fashion, once upon a time, to love Blanche Haye and to admire her soldier lover, Angus. But alas! the romance has gone, the poetry has disappeared. Nothing, no bad acting in the world, can crush the emotion that uprises at the scene of the departure of the soldiers. No time or circumstance can kill that. The most jaded audience awakes to enthusiasm when the soldiers march and the bands play and the cheers ring out. There may be less of the passion of desperation in the last hurried embrace of Angus; there may be less truth and humanity in the heart-wrung cry of the love-lorn Blanche Haye, as she falls fainting on the ground as the regiment marches away; but the incident remains the most stirring and pathetic in the whole range of drama, because it is effected wholly on its dramatic merits and without the aid of scenic illusion. Nothing can deprive Robertson of the credit of that one scene. Lydia Footes and Harry Montagues do not appear on the stage every day in the week, and it is true that the younger school has not had the advantage of getting in touch of that wonderful enthusiasm that was part and parcel of Robertson's nature: but it may be fairly asked whether the most modern school of acting has the appreciation, the mere sympathy for what is both funny and touching that the young folk had in Robertson's time? I fairly think not. Natural acting, as it is called, requires something more than committing many words to memory, and gabbling them off without appearing to understand them. Point-making, when unduly emphasised, belongs to the most artificial style of acting, but playing without point at all results in desperate dulness. Every actor and actress ought to have the power of influencing every mind in the theatre to a greater or less degree. They speak words that are to be heard and understood also. But in these later days it is the voice only that we hear, vox et præterea nihil. They speak words, but they present no individuality of character. The consequence is that the audience does not sympathise with them, and ends with not attending to them. They "personate" no one but themselves; and their individual characters may be very interesting to their own immediate circle, but not to the playgoing public. The marvel is that those who watch Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft night after night cannot appreciate the difference between acting and talking. C. S.

A matinée will be given at St. George's Hall, next Wednesday, for the benefit of Miss Edith Heraud. Mrs. Kendal, Mrs. Dion Boucicault, Lady Monckton, Mrs. Beerbohm Tree, Mrs. Aylmer Gowring, Mr. J. L. Toole, Mr. Hermann Vezin, Mr. Charles Wyndham, Mr. Charles Warner, Mr. Henry Neville, Mr. George Grossmith, Mr. Beerbohm Tree, and others have promised to assist on the occasion.

The general meeting of the members of the Art Union of London was held on Tuesday in the Adelphi Theatre, Strand. The council in their report stated that the subscription of the year amounts to £8786. Of this amount £2265 was allotted for prizes.

Mr. W. Cornwallis West presided on Tuesday evening, at the Memorial Hall, over a meeting held to urge the introduction of the intermediate Education Bill for Wales, when several gentlemen interested in the cause of education in the Principality insisted that the measure ought to be at once passed, or at any rate laid on the table of the House of Commons, so that it might be seen and discussed.

MUSIC.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company, at Drury-Lane Theatre, have given, since our last notice repetitions of works recently commented on. Mr. A. Goring Thomas's new opera, "Nadeshda" (fully noticed by us last week), has been repeated several times with a success similar to that of its first production. The next specialty will be the first performance in London of the English version of M. Massenet's "Manon," as brought out by Mr. Rosa last January at the Court Theatre, Liverpool. The London cast will include Madame Marie Roze in the title-character, and Mr. B. McGuckin as the Chevalier des Grieux. Some changes, including a new scena for Manon, have been made specially for Mr. Rosa's company by the composer. The opera is to be produced here on May 7. For this (Saturday) evening, the first and only performance this season of Mr. Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda" is announced.

The Philharmonic Society's concert of last week—the fourth of the seventy-third season—brought forward a new symphony, expressly written for the society by the eminent composer, Herr Anton Dvorák, who conducted its performance. The work consists of four divisions, "Allegro Maestoso," "Andante sostenuto e molto tranquillo," "Scherzo" (with trio), and final "Allegro." The opening and closing movements (both in D minor) are distinguished by great vigour and impulsive romanticism, offering some fine climaxes, and a strong reflection of the Sclavonic nationality of the composer. The slow movement is in a flowing and melodious style that contrasts well with the more demonstrative tone of the first and final divisions. The scherzo has much strongly marked rhythmical character, relieved by the graceful trio. The symphony and its composer were enthusiastically received. Other familiar works—skilfully directed by Sir Arthur Sullivan, conductor to the society—made up a varied programme, of which we need only specify Weber's pianoforte "Concertstück," brilliantly played by Mdlle. Kleeberg; the beautiful duet "How sweet the moonlight" (from Sir A. Sullivan's "Kenilworth"), expressively sung by Miss M. Etherington and Mr. E. Lloyd; and Walther's "Preislied," rendered by Mr. Lloyd.

The benefit concert of Mr. Manns, at the Crystal Palace, last Saturday afternoon, formed the usual pendent to the series of Saturday concerts, the twenty-ninth season of which closed on the previous Saturday, when Berlioz's "Te Deum" was produced, for the first time in England, as noticed by us last week. The concert now referred to included the "Verwandlung's-musik" and the closing scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal," the last stage work of the composer, which has already been commented on. The orchestral features of the extracts were well rendered on Saturday, as were the incidental vocal passages by Mr. Watkin Mills; but in some instances the chorus (especially the choir of boys) might have been better. Mdlle. Pauline Cramer (from the Munich Opera) made a very favourable impression by her dramatic singing in the soprano solo from Weber's "Oberon," as did Mdlle. Kleeberg in her performance of Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor. Signor Foli and Mr. E. Lloyd contributed to the vocal programme, and Mr. J. Dunn played a violin fantasia by Ernst with skilful execution. Mr. Manns received the usual warm greeting on the completion of another period of his occupancy of the office of conductor. The summer season will be inaugurated this (Saturday) afternoon by a grand concert, which will include a performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," with the co-operation of a chorus numbering about six hundred voices.

Mr. William Carter's sixth grand national concert—in celebration of St. George's Day—was a great success. Madame Christine Nilsson, Mr. Sims Reeves, and other eminent artists, contributed effective performances.

Herr Peiniger, a skilful violinist, gave the first of three recitals at Prince's Hall on Tuesday afternoon.

Señor Sarasate's second orchestral concert takes place at St. James's Hall this (Saturday) afternoon; and in the evening the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society will give the third concert of the thirteenth season at the Royal Albert Hall; and the Musical Artists' Society will give the thirty-sixth performance of new compositions at Willis's Rooms.

The students' orchestral concert of the Royal Academy of Music, which took place yesterday (Friday) week at St. James's Hall, gave good proofs of the efficient course of study pursued there, in instrumental and vocal performance, and in composition. Several commendable new works were produced, and the soloists in pianoforte and violin pieces displayed highly cultivated skill. Mr. W. Shakespeare conducted ably.

The evening concert of the Vocal Academy of the late Madame Sainton-Dolby took place notwithstanding her decease, as specially requested by herself. It was held at Prince's Hall, yesterday (Friday) week, and included a performance of her cantata, "Florimel," a graceful composition for female solos and chorus. The music is especially vocal in its flowing melody, and was very well rendered, the soloists having been Misses F. Moody, Hyde, and A. Foster. The second part of the programme consisted, by desire of the students, entirely of music by the deceased composer; and included a pleasing song, "Ladylove," from her cantata, "Thalassa," excellently sung by Mr. E. Lloyd. Several students, besides those above named, contributed efficient performances. M. Sainton conducted.

The famous Richter Concerts entered on their eleventh season at St. James's Hall last Monday evening, when very fine orchestral performances were given of Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser," Schubert's uncompleted symphony in B minor, Liszt's fourth Hungarian rhapsody, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Beethoven's seventh symphony (in A). Herr Richter was enthusiastically welcomed on his reappearance.

A concert of vocal and instrumental music was given on Tuesday evening by the Merchant Taylors' School Choral and Orchestral Societies; and on the same evening Miss Edith Brand gave a concert for her pupils at The Abbey, Campden-hill-road, Kensington, by permission of Mrs. William Abbott. Mr. Ernest Kiver's concert of chamber music was given on Wednesday evening at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly. Madame Jenny Viard-Louis gave at Prince's Hall on Thursday the first of her third series of Beethoven's works; and Miss Synge's pianoforte recital takes place this (Saturday) afternoon at Prince's Hall. Mdlle. Lilas Spontini gives her matinée musicale next Monday at Messrs. Collard's Concert-Rooms; and Mr. W. Nicholl's concert takes place next Friday evening at Steinway Hall. Signor Romano will give his annual concert on Monday morning, the 11th inst., at Messrs. Collard's Pianoforte and Concert Rooms, 16, Grosvenor-street. Signor L. Denza's annual concert is fixed for Saturday evening, May 16, at Prince's Hall. He will be assisted by Signor Raimo's drawing-room orchestra, and by several eminent singers.

Mr. W. H. Holmes—distinguished as a pianist, and the oldest professor at the Royal Academy of Music—died last week at an advanced age. He entered as a student on the opening of the Academy, in 1822, and was the instructor of many eminent musicians.

THE COUNTRY AROUND HERAT.

Our Extra Supplement is a Bird's-Eye View of the north-western border region of Afghanistan for some two hundred miles around Herat, including the territory of Badghis, between the Heri-Rud and the Murghab rivers, with the Kushk river joining the latter near Pul-i-Khisti and Ak Tapa, where the conflict between the Russians and Afghans took place on March 30; and Penjdeh and Maruchak will be seen on the banks of the Murghab at a short distance. The boundary line claimed by Russia, which is marked on our Engraving by a line of small crosses, would appropriate those positions to the Russian dominion; it would bend southward from the Zulfikar Pass to Ak Robat, thence running to Chaman-i-Bed and eastward to Bala Murghab, the site of Sir Peter Lumsden's winter camp. The road from Herat to Maimana and to the other provinces of Afghan Turkestan, which are of great political importance to the Ameer's sovereignty, passes eastward from Bala Murghab. This is probably the most serious matter of consideration with regard to the limitation of Afghan territory on the Kushk and Murghab, where there is no population of Afghan race. The hill-ranges immediately north of Herat can be crossed by several not very difficult passes; and it would be still more easy for an invader to approach Herat from the Persian territory, crossing the Heri-Rud at the Tirpul bridge, just above Kuhsan. The amount of Russian forces actually disposable for an attack on Herat within the next few weeks may depend on the condition of the Russian line of railway in the Trans-Caspian. All we know is that this line is certainly being made at the present moment from Kizil Arvat to Askabad, and a 2 ft. 4 in. gauge railway, or more correctly steam tramway, connects Mikhailovsk, near Krasnovodsk, with Bami or with Beurma. From Kizil Arvat to Askabad is 161 miles, from Askabad to Sarakhs 171 miles, and from Sarakhs to Herat 202 miles. These are the new Russian advantages acquired since 1881 for the conduct of another campaign beyond Askabad, and possibly for an advance to Herat.

EXPLOSION AT THE ADMIRALTY.

On Thursday week, a few minutes before eleven in the morning, the Admiralty Office in Whitehall was the scene of an explosion caused by some apparatus maliciously placed in one of the rooms; and we regret to say that severe personal injuries were inflicted on a gentleman officially employed there. The room in which it occurred overlooks a small inclosed garden facing the open space of the Horse Guards Parade, St. James's Park. This apartment was occupied by Mr. Swainson, Assistant Permanent Under-Secretary of the Admiralty. It is about 15 ft. by 13 ft., and 12 ft. in height, lighted by two large windows. In common with the arrangements at other official buildings, special precautions had been taken of late to guard the Admiralty. The spacious quadrangle facing Whitehall was duly watched and patrolled; detectives stood in the entrance-hall, and at points along the corridors and staircases. There are but two ways of approaching Mr. Swainson's room; either by the passage leading from the central hall, or from the garden door on the Parade. The garden door was supposed to be kept locked, and there was a policeman on his beat. In spite of these precautions, some person must have contrived to get access to Mr. Swainson's room. That gentleman came to the office, as usual, at a quarter past ten in the morning, entered through the Whitehall quadrangle, and passed through the front entrance-hall to his own room. Half an hour afterwards, the sound of an explosion was heard, and from the shattered windows of the room, at the back of the building, a volume of dust and smoke poured forth. A policeman and some of the officials hastened to Mr. Swainson's room, and found that gentleman lying in a corner, quite insensible, and bleeding from severe cuts on the head and hands; his hair and beard were singed, and were full of dust, fragments of plaster, and splinters of wood and glass. The interior of the room was a complete wreck. The two windows were blown out; a swing door communicating with a staircase was wrenched from its hinges and hurled against the balustrade of the staircase and broken up; the ceiling was torn, and great strips of the wall laid bare. Scraps of lath and plaster hung down over the mass of rubbish which covered the floor. Strong office furniture dislodged from its place was damaged and broken, but not altogether destroyed. A book-case which was fixed between the two windows had been wrenched from the wall, and its contents scattered. Immediately above the line of the book-case was a large disruption of plaster from the wall, of irregular oval form, about 2½ feet by 2 feet. From this it would appear that the exploding apparatus had been placed on the book-shelves, and that the first flash took a lateral direction, not, as in the action of dynamite, a vertical direction. Neither the ceiling immediately above, nor the floor beneath, which rests on vaulted arches, showed any such effect of vertical explosive force as in other instances where dynamite was employed. The floor was covered several inches thick with broken plaster, glass, and general débris. Judging from the force that must have been exercised on the furniture, doors, and windows, it is wonderful that Mr. Swainson, who was sitting at the desk close to the book-case, should have escaped with his life. The room was seen and minutely examined by Colonel Majendie, Inspector of Explosives, and Mr. Dupré. After their visit a photograph was taken of the scene, exactly as it appeared when the full effects of the outrage were known. The external damage was slight. Not more than a score of windows of the other offices and rooms of the Admiralty were broken. It is thought probable that the explosive material was gun-cotton, in some way connected with gunpowder, and ignited by a short-time fuse. Fragments of a gallipot, and of a small iron pot, have been found among the rubbish in the room. Mr. Swainson, who had suffered a severe concussion of the brain, regained consciousness after some hours, but can remember nothing that happened immediately before the explosion. It is hoped that he will completely recover from the injuries which he has sustained.

Mr. W. A. Hutchings has been appointed Superintendent of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade, consequent on the retirement of Mr. Richard H. Gatehouse, after thirty-four years' active and creditable service.

Mr. Charles Beal has been appointed a Registrar of the Supreme Court of Judicature, in succession of the late Mr. Teesdale, and the vacancy caused by Mr. Beal's appointment has been filled up by the appointment of Mr. Bloxam as a Clerk to the Chancery Registrars.

The first party of little girls sent out by the Church Society for Providing Homes for Waifs and Strays has left Liverpool for Quebec in the Polynesia. They proceed, in charge of the Rev. J. Bridger, to the society's home at Sherbrooke, and thence they will be distributed amongst settlers and others as suitable homes are found for them. This branch of the society's work is managed by two committees, the English one presided over by the Bishop of Bedford and that in Canada by the Bishop of Quebec.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

The great speech of Mr. Gladstone on Monday has been the theme of general admiration, not only in Parliament, in the Press, and all over the country, but likewise throughout Europe. It was an oration worthy a high-principled and courageous British Minister. It roused the House to enthusiasm. It warned Russia that England was thoroughly in earnest, and would not endure much longer the delays and prevarications of Russian statecraft in regard to the settlement of the disputed Afghan frontier line violated by General Komaroff.

Mr. Gladstone, who was a little late in taking his seat on the Treasury bench next the Marquis of Hartington on Monday afternoon, looked hale and erect, and, as is usual with him when he has to make an important speech, wore a flower in his button-hole—a brilliant red one on this occasion. Prior to the arrival of the Prime Minister, the House had learned with satisfaction from Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice that, with respect to the suspension at Cairo of the French journal, the Bosphore Egyptien, her Majesty's Government were "on the point of coming to an arrangement on this question satisfactory to France, Egypt, and themselves." It was in easy, conversational tones that the Premier informed the House that General Sir Peter Lumsden had desired Mr. Stephen to leave for London in order to convey to Lord Granville "a map and detailed despatch of all the circumstances connected with the Russian attack on the Afghans at Penjdeh." Mr. Gladstone quietly waved aside an inconvenient interrogation addressed to him by the irrepressible Mr. Ashmead Bartlett from his place next the infinitesimal "Fourth Party," which was quite jubilant again, by-the-way, at the return of the bronzed head and front of its offending, Lord Randolph Churchill. Parenthetically, apropos of the special mission of Mr. Stephen to the Foreign Secretary, it may be remarked that Mr. William Simpson, lately the Special Artist of the Illustrated London News, with Sir Peter Lumsden, is on his way home, and would probably be in a position to give the Government useful information concerning the topography of the debated frontier, and respecting the Russian and Afghan movements antecedent to the "unhappy incident" at Penjdeh.

The Government, for reasons of "high policy," deemed it advisable to lump together the vote for the Soudan and that for the War preparations. Not so Mr. Arthur O'Connor, who, when Mr. Gladstone moved that the House should go into Committee on the vote, rose to introduce a resolution affirming it to be desirable to divide the two votes. Though the amendment was seconded by Sir Henry Holland, and supported by Mr. W. H. Smith and others, it was not generally approved, and was negatived by a majority of 43—229 against 186 votes; a result greeted with cheers and counter-cheers.

The House was then, so to speak, cleared for action. Sir Arthur Otway took the chair in place of the Speaker, and made known that the question before the Committee was the Vote of Credit for Eleven Millions. Mr. Gladstone was not long before he gave eloquent proof that there was really no need for the opening apology for his hoarseness. Clear and trenchant was the speech in which he solicited the grant of the £11,000,000—six millions and a half for "special preparations," and four and a half millions for the Soudan expenses, or for "another purpose." Cheered with remarkable heartiness were the chief points. Ministerialists uttered their "Hear, hears," with lively emphasis when Mr. Gladstone made an interruption on the part of Lord Randolph Churchill the peg on which to hang a vivacious but hardly judicious criticism on the preceding Government's Vote of Credit in 1878—when, it will be remembered, the Russians were almost at the gates of Constantinople. The historical reminiscences got rid of, the termination of the Soudan war was justified, and Mr. Gladstone was warmly cheered when he came to "the proposition that it is a paramount duty incumbent upon us of holding our forces in the Soudan available for service wherever the call of duty and honour may take them in the service of the British Empire." In support of the "national and imperial policy," which he advocated with a vehemence worthy of Lord Beaconsfield himself, the Premier said the Government had laboured and continue to labour "for an honourable settlement by pacific means," but demonstrated that it was indispensably necessary to prepare for any eventuality—i.e., war with Russia. Citing our obligations to protect Afghanistan against invasion, the Prime Minister lucidly recounted the sinister occurrences on the Afghan frontier—the "woeful engagement of the 30th of March" following the "solemn covenant" of March 16 to maintain the statu quô. In a most impressive peroration, Mr. Gladstone concluded:—

> We know that the attack was a Russian attack; we know that the Afghans suffered in life, in spirit, and in repute; we know that a blow was struck at the credit and authority of a Sovereign, our protected ally, who had committed no offence. All I say, Sir, is that we cannot, in that state of things, close this book and say—We will look into it no more. We must do our best to have right done in the matter. Under these circumstances, there is a case for preparation, and I hope that the House will feel with me, after what I have said about the necessity we are under of holding Soudanese funds available for services elsewhere—I hope the House will not press upon us a demand for time, which can have no other effect than that of propagating here and elsewhere a belief that there is some indecision in the mind of Parliament—(loud cheers); whereas I believe that with one heart, and one soul, and one purpose only, while reserving the absolute liberty of judging the conduct of the Government and visiting them with its consequences, they will go forward to perform and meet the demands of justice and the calls of honour, and will, subject only to justice and to honour, labour for the purposes of peace (Loud and general cheers).

Spellbound, as it were, by the masterful eloquence of Mr. Gladstone, the House unanimously agreed to the Vote of Credit, and enthusiastically cheered the Prime Minister. Compared with this momentous Parliament episode, all other subjects paled their ineffectual fires, till the night came for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to unfold his Budget—a statement which must be reviewed next week.

KIRKMAN and SON'S STEEL GRANDS (horizontal and upright) are constructed with their patent wrought-steel frame and wrest-plank, securing a pure tone as well as the utmost durability. They also make an overstrung iron grand, only 5 ft. 9 in. long, at a lower price.

KIRKMAN and SON'S IRON-FRAMED COTTAGE PIANOS range from 4 ft. in height, are full trichord, and are fitted with the best repetition check-actions. They can be obtained in solid wood cases, and specially prepared for extreme climates. A new model has just been introduced 9 in. high by 2 ft. wide), but full trichord, and with check action.
All their Pianos are for sale, hire, or on the three-years' system.

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
A few drops of the FRAGRANT FLORILINE on a wet tooth-brush produces a delightful foam, which cleanses the Teeth from all impurities, strengthens and hardens the gums, prevents tartar, and arrests the progress of decay. It gives to the teeth a peculiar and beautiful whiteness, and imparts a delightful fragrance to the breath. It removes all unpleasant odour arising from decayed teeth, a disordered stomach, or tobacco smoke. The FRAGRANT FLORILINE is purely vegetable, and equally adapted to old and young.
The FRAGRANT FLORILINE should be used in all cases of bad breath, and particularly by gentlemen after smoking. The Floriline combines, in a concentrated form, the most delectable, cleansing, and astringent properties. At the same time, it contains nothing which can possibly injure the most sensitive and delicate organisation.
It beautifies the teeth and gums.
It arrests the decay of the teeth.
It acts as a detergent after smoking.
It renders the gums hard and healthy.
It neutralises the offensive secretions of the mouth.
It imparts to the breath a fragrance purely aromatic and pleasant.
Put up in large bottles (only one size) and in elegant toilet-cases, complete, at 2s. 6d. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers.
Wholesale by the ANGLO-AMERICAN DRUG COMPANY, Limited, Farringdon-road, London.

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.

Sweet as the ambrosial air,
With its perfume rich and rare;
Sweet as violets at the morn,
Which the emerald nooks adorn;
Sweet as rosebuds bursting forth
From the richly-laden earth,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

The teeth it makes a pearly white,
So pure and lovely to the sight;
The gums assume a rosy hue,
The breath is sweet as violets blue;
While scented as the flowers of May,
Which cast their sweetness from each spray,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

Sure, some fairy with its hand
Cast around its mystic wand,
And produced from fairy's bower
Scented perfumes from each flower;
For in this liquid gem we trace—
All that can beauty add and grace—
Such is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
Is the best liquid dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke.
For children and adults whose teeth show marks of decay its advantages are paramount. The "Floriline" should be thoroughly brushed into all the cavities; no one need fear using it too often or too much at a time. Among the ingredients being soda, honey, spirits of wine, borax, and extracts from sweet herbs and plants, it forms not only the very best dentifrice for cleansing ever discovered, but one that is perfectly delicious to the taste and as harmless as sherry. The taste is so pleasing that, instead of taking up the toothbrush with dislike, as is often the case, children will on no account omit to use the "Floriline" regularly each morning if only left to their own choice. Children cannot be taught the use of the toothbrush too young; early neglect invariably produces premature decay of the teeth. "Floriline" is sold by all Chemists and Perfumers throughout the world, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH

If teeth are white and beautiful,
It keeps them so intact;
If they're discoloured in the least,
It brings their whiteness back;
And by its use no bad good effects
Are daily to be seen;
Thus hence it is that general praise
Greets "FRAGRANT FLORILINE!"

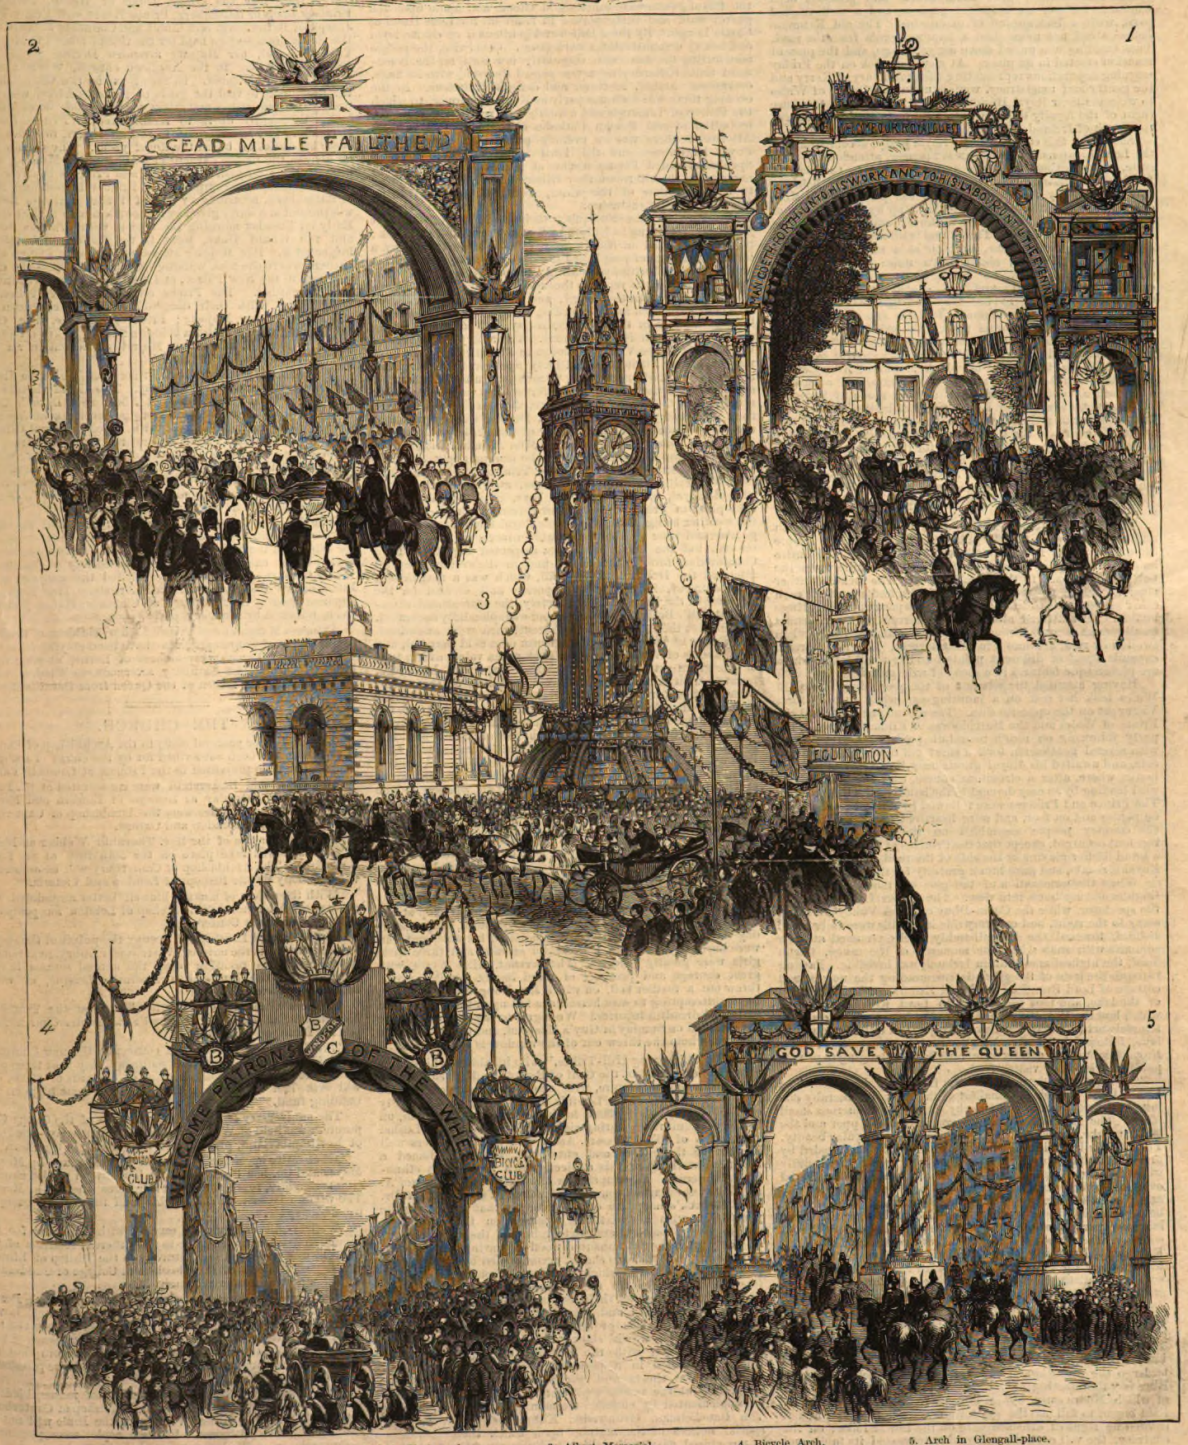
One trial proves conclusive quite,
That by its constant use
The very best effects arise
That science can produce.
It is the talk of every one,
An all-absorbing theme;
Whilst general now becomes the use
Of "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

It makes the breath as sweet as flowers,
The teeth a pearly white;
The gums it hardens, and it gives
Sensations of delight.
All vile secretions it removes,
However long they've been;
The enamel, too, it will preserve.
The "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
It may or may not be generally known that microscopical examinations have proved that animal or vegetable parasites gather, unobserved by the naked eye, upon the teeth and gums of at least nine persons in every ten; any individual may soon satisfy himself in this matter by placing a powerful microscope over a partially-decayed tooth, when the living animalculæ will be found to reside in a partially-decayed cheese more than anything else we can compare it to. We may also state that the FRAGRANT FLORILINE is the only remedy yet discovered able perfectly to free the teeth and gums from these parasites without the slightest injury to the teeth or the most tender gums.
Read this.—From the "Weekly Times," March 26, 1871.—"There are so many toilet articles which obtain all their celebrity from being constantly and extensively advertised that it makes it necessary when anything new and good is introduced to the public that special attention should be called to it. The most delightful and effective toilet article for cleansing and beautifying the teeth that we in a long experience have ever used is the new Fragrant Floriline. It is quite a pleasure to use it, and its properties of imparting a fragrance to the breath and giving a pearly whiteness to the teeth make it still more valuable. Of all the numerous nostrums for cleaning the teeth which from time to time have been fashionable and popular, nothing to be compared with the Floriline has hitherto been produced, whether considered as a beautifier or a valuable cleanser and preserver of the teeth and gums."
From the "Young Ladies' Journal."—"An agreeable dentifrice is always a luxury. As one of the most agreeable may be reckoned Floriline. It cleanses the teeth and imparts a pleasant odour to the breath. It has been analysed by several eminent professors of chemistry, and they concur in their testimony to its excellence. We are frequently asked to recommend a dentifrice to our readers; therefore we cannot do better than advise them to try the Fragrant Floriline."

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.

I have heard a strange statement, dear Fanny, to-day,
That the reason that teeth do decay
Is traced to some objects that form in the gums,
And eat them in time quite away.
Animalcules, they say, are engendered—that is,
If the mouth is not wholesome and clean;
And I also have heard to preserve them the best
Is the fragrant, the sweet "FLORILINE!"



Oh, yes! it is true that secretions will cause
Living objects to form on your teeth,
And certainly and silently do they gnaw on
In cavities made underneath;
But a certain preservative has now been found
To keep your mouth wholesome and clean;
And you're perfectly right, for your teeth to preserve,
There's nothing like sweet "FLORILINE!"

'Tis nice and refreshing, and pleasant to use,
And no danger its use can attend;
For clever physicians and dentists as well
Their uniform praises now blend.
They say it's the best preparation that's known,
And evident proofs have they seen,
That nothing can equal the virtues that dwell
In the fragrant, the sweet "FLORILINE!"

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
The "Christian World" of March 17, 1871, says, with respect to Floriline:—"Floriline bids fair to become a household word in England, and one of peculiarly pleasant meaning. It would be difficult to conceive a more efficacious and agreeable preparation for the teeth. Those who once begin to use it will certainly never willingly give it up."
Dr. G. H. Jones, of 37, Great Russell-street, London, Surgeon-Dentist and Doctor of Dental Surgery, F.R.M.S., F.R.S.I., F.R.G.S., F.S.A., &c., in his pamphlet, "Painless Dentistry," says:—
"I consider 'Fragrant Floriline' is, without exception, an excellent preparation for the teeth and gums."
The words "Fragrant Floriline" are a Trade-Mark.
Sold retail everywhere; and wholesale by the ANGLO-AMERICAN DRUG COMPANY, Limited, Farringdon-road, London.

Royal Visit to Ireland

CEAD MILE FAILTHE

RECEPTION OF THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES AT BELFAST: FESTIVE ARCHES AND DECORATIONS.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND.

The Prince and Princess of Wales and Prince Albert Victor Edward of Wales, during their sojourn with Earl and Countess Spencer at Killarney, on Friday and Saturday, the 17th and 18th ult., enjoyed pleasant excursions amidst the romantic scenery of that neighbourhood. They were staying at Killarney House, the mansion of the Earl and Countess of Kenmare, who had permitted Lord and Lady Spencer to act as host and hostess upon this occasion, but who remained with the Royal party. The celebrated Lakes of Killarney are three in number—the Upper Lake; the Middle, Muckross or Torc Lake; and the Lower Lake, or Lough Laune. The last is much the largest, being nine miles long by four and a half miles broad. Tourists know the excursion from Killarney town through the Gap of Dunloe, and home through the three lakes. The road journey is fourteen, and the passage of the lakes twelve, Irish miles.

Killarney House, a large building of red brick, designed in a mixture of the Gothic and Tudor styles, stands on the Lower Lake, Lough Laune, half a mile from the water. It is a handsome edifice, with broad courts and pleasant oriel windows, looking on beautiful gardens and a well-wooded park, with a background of mountains. The old Kenmare House stood not more than a hundred yards from the road. That building was pulled down six years ago, and the present mansion erected in its place. At eleven o'clock on the Friday morning deputations representing the grand jury of Kerry and the gentry and magistracy, waited upon the Prince of Wales to welcome their Royal Highnesses to Killarney, and to assure them of the loyalty of the Queen's subjects in this portion of the South of Ireland.

Soon after this ceremony, the Royal party, accompanied by the Lord Lieutenant and Countess Spencer, attended by their suite, entered their carriages and proceeded to the Gap of Dunloe. The Earl of Kenmare, the Marchioness of Kildare, and Lady Emily Kingscote were of the party. They were escorted as far as the entrance to the Gap by a small body of the 11th Hussars, in undress uniform, under command of Lieutenant Warburton. The Royal visitors drove through Lord Kenmare's demesne, and on at a smart pace to the entrance to the Gap, about seven miles from the town of Killarney. Here, at Kate Kearney's cottage, the escort was dismissed, and the Royal party proceeded over a rugged road to the Gap cottages, where there is a house, kept by Mrs. French, for the sale of articles of marqueterie, of arbutus and other Irish woods, and bog-oak ornaments. Their Royal Highnesses entered the cottage, and, having examined Mrs. French's stock, selected a beautiful round table, in the centre of which Muckross Abbey is represented, a card-table of similar description, and a number of brooches, bracelets, and other articles made of bog-oak. All the members of the Royal party did Mrs. French the honour of writing their names in her visiting-book. At this point of the route the Royal carriage was sent back, and a couple of jaunting-cars were ready for the conveyance of the Princess of Wales, Countess Spencer, and other ladies, to the point near Lord Brandon's cottage on the upper lake, where Lord Kenmare's barge was awaiting them. The Princess, however, preferred walking until a great part of the Gap had been traversed.

The Gap of Dunloe is a wild, deep glen running due north and south between the Macgillicuddy Reeks and the Purple Mountain, which is a shoulder of the Toomies. The entire length of the pass is between four and five miles from the northern entrance to the Black Valley. The rocks, at either side, are high, rugged, and precipitous, and approach each other so closely as to leave but a narrow space between. Huge boulders lie scattered alongside the narrow pathway; and a small stream courses through the valley, which at times, when swollen by rain, becomes a foaming torrent. This little stream expands itself at different points into five small lakes, which are picturesque features in a scene of wild grandeur.

Having attained the summit of the pass, the Princess of Wales took her seat on a jaunting-car, while Prince Albert Victor sat on the opposite side. The second car contained the Prince of Wales and the Marchioness of Kildare, others of the party following on rough mountain ponies. Earl Spencer, with several gentlemen, took a short cut down the mountain side, and awaited his Royal guests near the National School-house, where, after a circuitous course, they reached a better road leading by an easy descent to the banks of the Upper Lake. The Prince and Princess were followed by a number of people on ponies and on foot, and were heartily cheered by groups of the country people assembled on the hills. No special incident occurred, except that the Princess of Wales, observing a blind fiddler playing at the side of the road, called one of the Royal servants, and gave him a gratuity for the poor musician.

When the termination of the pass was reached, a scene of singular beauty burst into view. The Upper Lake lay before the spectator, while the Coom-Dhuv or Black Valley stretched away to the right, and on every side lofty hills were to be seen. Behind, towered the Macgillicuddy Reeks, streaked at their summits with snow; but the monarch of the range, Carun Tual, the highest mountain in Ireland, was invisible. Passing through the gate of the grounds surrounding the now ruined cottage of Lord Brandon, the Royal visitors reached the banks of the lake, and took their seats in Lord Kenmare's barge, which had the Royal standard hoisted at her stern. Rowed by ten stalwart oarsmen, the Royal barge sped quickly down the lake, followed by another barge containing the suite of their Royal Highnesses, and by numerous boats belonging to private persons or hired by visitors.

The lakes of Killarney have been frequently described. The Upper Lake, though the smallest of the three, is generally admired on account of its wild rocky shores and numerous small islets. The Long Range, which connects the Upper and the Middle Lake, presents a variety of scenes of singular beauty. The Middle Lake is a spacious sheet of water surrounded by grand mountains of varied outline, and having splendidly wooded banks. The Lower Lake, Lough Laune, has scattered over its surface about thirty islands of every variety of size and form, the principal being Innisfallen and Ross Islands, both celebrated in song and story. Before leaving the upper lake the party landed on a rocky promontory called Derrycunihy, where they lunched in a cottage belonging to Lord Kenmare. In passing through the Long Range, the barge was stopped for a few minutes to hear the echoes repeat, with great distinctness airs played by a bugler who acted as guide to a party of visitors from the Railway Hotel.

At the end of the Middle Lake is the old weir. Some of the boats were able to shoot the harmless rapid under the ancient bridge. The Royal barge was too heavily freighted. The gentlemen got out and walked round, leaving the Princess, Lady Spencer, Lady Kildare, and Lady Emily Kingscote to undergo the sensation of the narrow, swift, broken channel. Here is "the Meeting of the Waters" not that of Wicklow, of which Moore sang, but an imaginary junction of the lakes. Rain began to fall as the expedition arrived thus far, and it showed no signs of discontinuing on the Lower Lake; on the contrary, the veil over the mountains increased its folds, and the boats, instead of calling at Glena, as was intended, went straight to Lord Kenmare's landing-place at Killarney.

On the Saturday, the weather being fine, the Royal tourists took up the programme where it was dropped on Friday, rowing to Glena to luncheon. Lord Kenmare has a cottage ornée on the shore of the bay, and the luncheon was there served. The Princess of Wales expressed her admiration of the fine combination of mountain, lake, bay, and wood which makes Glena one of the most charming places of the district. Just opposite is Brickeen Island, connected by a bridge with the Muckross peninsula. The expedition was again in motion. The three boats, pulled by Lord Kenmare's men—the eight-oared barge flying the Royal standard, leading the way—made across to Castle Lough Bay. The ivy-clad ruins of the castle stand at the end of a natural causeway of turf, and over its ancient trees and evergreens the union-jack waved freely. The ruins of Muckross Abbey are the chief attraction at this place. The Royal visitors lingered long in their admiration of the well-preserved and beautiful cloisters, whose graceful arches inclose the romantically placed quadrangle, with its venerable yew-tree casting shadows beneath.

On this day, as on Friday, the excursion was of a private nature. A number of persons assembled at Dinas, while the Royal guests were lunching at Glena, and again upon the gravel walk and turfy border in front of the Lake Hotel at Castle Lough. By these ladies and gentlemen of course loyal and hearty demonstrations were given. Otherwise, the people seen during the drive were singularly few until on the homeward route Killarney town was passed through, with its flags, evergreens, arches, mottoes, and delighted citizens. In the evening there was a dinner party at Kenmare House, to which the Bishop of Limerick and a number of resident gentlemen, including several Roman Catholic clergymen, were invited. Afterwards there was an evening party. On Sunday their Royal Highnesses and the Lord Lieutenant and Countess Spencer attended Divine service at Killarney parish church, and during the afternoon they visited Ross Castle, but, owing to the roughness of the water, were not able to take an intended boating excursion.

On Monday (the 20th ult.) their Royal Highnesses left Killarney, returning to Dublin by way of Tralee and Limerick; they were greeted on the journey, at both those towns, by a large assemblage of people at the railway station, and by some of the local authorities presenting addresses of welcome. The Prince of Wales, in reply to the addresses of the Chamber of Commerce, magistrates, clergy, and others at Limerick, said he would have been much gratified, if it had been possible, to have seen more of that important city, and to gain a better acquaintance with its institutions. Their Royal Highnesses went to stay at the Viceregal Lodge in Phœnix Park, Dublin, with the Lord Lieutenant and Lady Spencer, until Thursday morning. On the Tuesday they were at the Punchestown races, near Naas, but the weather was unfortunately very bad, raining nearly all day. Before going there, they received an address from the Sunday-school children of Dublin, who assembled in the cricket-ground to the number of ten or eleven thousand. A hundred young girls, headed by Miss Plunket, daughter of the Archbishop of Dublin, formed the leading party, and presented a basket of flowers to the Princess of Wales. The Rev. W. Tristram read the address, and the Dean of the Chapel Royal, on behalf of the boys, presented an ormolu card-plate to Prince Albert Victor Edward. On Wednesday, the weather being still rainy, their Royal Highnesses did not go a second time to the Punchestown races, as they had intended, but the Prince of Wales inspected the Royal Irish Constabulary force in the Park; and in the evening they all attended the Dublin Citizens' Ball, which was a magnificent entertainment, in the vast temporary hall erected on the premises of the Royal Dublin Society, the agricultural show-yard at Ball's Bridge. The ball-room was splendidly decorated. Four or five thousand ladies and gentlemen were assembled. The Prince of Wales wore the uniform of a field marshal, and the Princess of Wales wore a dress of green velvet over a jupe of pale green satin and silver gauze draped with Irish lace, fastened with bouquets of shamrock and lilies of the valley. Countess Spencer wore a rich white satin dress, with tablier embroidered in pearls. Shortly after the arrival of the Royal party, dancing was commenced, the Royal quadrille being formed as follows:—The Princess of Wales and Mr. Richard Martin (chairman of the Citizens' Committee); Mrs. Edward Cecil Guinness and the Prince of Wales; Countess Spencer and Mr. E. C. Guinness (High Sheriff of the county of Dublin); Mrs. Richard Martin and Earl Spencer. The Duchess of Manchester danced with Prince Albert Victor Edward. Their Royal Highnesses went next day to Belfast.

An influential conference was held at the Mansion House on Tuesday, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, to advocate more economical administration by the London School Board.

By a fire which occurred in an oil and colour shop at the corner of Gravel-lane and Union-street, Borough, early yesterday week, the proprietor, Mr. H. Chandler, his wife, and son, were burnt to death, and a domestic servant and three little girls were greatly injured. The servant, Alice Ayres, with great courage and presence of mind in the terrible crisis, threw out a feather bed, on which she dropped the children; but in attempting to save herself she fell upon the ground and sustained dreadful injuries. We regret to say that this heroic woman died on Sunday in Guy's Hospital, and one of the three children whom she threw out of the window is also dead.

"The Chittagong Hill-Tribes," who inhabit the highlands above the east coast of the Gulf of Bengal, and are subjects of the British Indian Empire, were spoken of last week in our review of Colonel T. H. Lewin's entertaining book, "A Fly on the Wheel," that officer having resided among them, on the Karnaphuli river, during eight years preceding the Lushai Expedition of 1872. Messrs. Asher and Co., publishers well known for their taste and enterprise, have just issued a beautiful work upon this subject, which is of great ethnological interest. It comprises a translation, by Professor A. H. Keane, the learned compiler of Stanford's "Asia," of Dr. Emil Riebeck's narrative of a journey in that country in the year 1882, with his scientific treatises on the ethnology, anthropology, zoology, and meteorology of the entire region; all finely printed, with numerous wood-engravings interspersed in the text, on loose folio sheets, accompanied by some twenty plates, on cardboard, which represent in photo-lithography (two of the plates are richly coloured) the various types of the native races, their costumes, dwellings, utensils, weapons, ornaments, and other properties, and the skulls of some rare species of animals. There is also a map, carefully drawn, which shows the labyrinth of hill and mountain ranges, with the altitudes duly marked. The whole is inclosed in a portfolio of convenient form, out of which the sheets and plates can be taken separately for perusal at the reader's pleasure. Dr. Riebeck's account is supplemented by eminent German scientific men, Herren Von Danckelman, Grünwedel, Kühn, and Virchow, with special notices of the matters upon which their authority is recognised as standing high in European estimation; but justice is done to the useful works of Colonel Lewin, Dr. W. W. Hunter, and other Englishmen who have written upon the hill tribes of Eastern Bengal and of the Burmese frontier.

THE COURT.

Queen Victoria is in excellent health. Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice, accompanied by their suite, arrived at Darmstadt on the morning of Thursday week, and were received at the railway station by the members of the Grand Ducal family. It is officially announced that they very greatly enjoyed their visit to Aix-les-Bains, and that every possible mark of attention and respect was shown to them. Next morning the Queen, Princess Beatrice, and the Grand Duke of Hesse drove out, and again in the afternoon for two hours. The weather was so warm and fine that her Majesty was able to read and deal with her telegrams in the open air. Last Saturday the Queen and Princess Beatrice were present at the confirmation of Prince Ernest Louis, the Hereditary Grand Duke of Hesse. Her Majesty also attended the christening of the infant child of Princess Louis of Battenberg, and was one of the sponsors. On Sunday morning her Majesty and the Princess lunched with Prince Alexander of Hesse and the Princess of Battenberg, where they met the Grand Duke of Hesse, Prince and Princess Louis of Battenberg, Prince Henry and Prince Francis Joseph of Battenberg, and Count and Countess Erbach. After the communion service held for the Grand Ducal family in the Palace Chapel, her Majesty attended Divine service, with Princess Beatrice, in the Anglican church, where the Rev. King Commin officiated. In the afternoon the Queen drove to the Rosenhöhe to visit the grave of Princess Alice, which had been decorated with numberless wreaths and floral crosses; and subsequently drove to Kranichstein. Prince Louis of Battenberg left for England in the afternoon, in order to resume his duties on board the Royal yacht. The Queen spent an hour in the Palace gardens at Darmstadt on Monday morning. In the afternoon her Majesty and Princess Beatrice drove to Ludwigshöhe, accompanied by Princes Ernest and Henry of Battenberg, returning by way of Traisa. Princess Beatrice was present at a soirée given by Prince Alexander in the evening. Early on Tuesday morning the Queen, with Princess Beatrice and the Grand Duke, went to the Catholic Church and inspected it. Her Majesty afterwards drove to Prince Emil's garden, where she took walking exercise. At noon the Queen returned to the New Palace, and worked at her correspondence in the garden. The Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, with their daughter, visited the Queen and lunched with her Majesty; Princess Beatrice, the Grand Duke, and Princess Victoria being present. At five o'clock the Queen's visitors left, and her Majesty drove out in an open carriage in the neighbourhood.

The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Ireland was brought to a close on Monday. The Royal visitors took leave of the Duke and Duchess of Abercorn at Baron's Court, and proceeded first to Carrickfergus, receiving addresses at Omagh, Dungannon, and Cookstown. The Prince and Princess, with Prince Albert Victor, afterwards went to Larne, and embarked on the Royal yacht Osborne for Stranraer, whence they returned to London. On arriving at Euston Station on Tuesday morning, their Royal Highnesses were enthusiastically welcomed by a large assemblage. The Prince of Wales was present at the Epsom Spring Meeting on Tuesday.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh visited the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours on Thursday week. In the afternoon the Duke and Duchess and Princess Louise paid a visit to the exhibition of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours. Princess Louise visited the galleries of the Incorporated Society of British Artists. The Duke and Duchess gave a dinner party at Clarence House yesterday week, followed by a musical party.

Princess Margaret and Prince Arthur, children of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, who have been staying for a week with Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne) at Kensington Palace, returned last Saturday afternoon to Windsor, where they will await the return of the Queen from Darmstadt.

THE CHURCH.

The crozier (or pastoral staff) to the Archbishop of Canterbury, which has been subscribed for by the clergy of the archdiocese, has been presented to the Primate at Lambeth Palace.

Drs. King and Bickersteth were consecrated at St. Paul's Cathedral last Saturday as Bishops of Lincoln and Exeter. The consecrating prelates were the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishops of London and Oxford.

The consecration of the Rev. Thornhill Webber as Bishop of Brisbane will take place on the 26th inst. at St. Paul's Cathedral. The Archbishop of Canterbury will be assisted in the ceremony by the Bishops of London and Victoria.

With the object of making himself better acquainted with the wants of the diocese, the Bishop of London has postponed the usual Diocesan Conference.

The Bishop of London will occupy the pulpit at the special evening service in the nave of Westminster Abbey, next Sunday (to-morrow), the occasion being the annual sermon in connection with the National Temperance League, of which society he is president.

Princess Christian opened the bazaar at the Townhall, Kensington, in aid of St. Matthew's Bayswater Church Completion Fund, on Tuesday.

The Bishop of London will consecrate the new Church of All Saints', Tuffnell Park, next Saturday, May 9, at three p.m. The church has been built at a cost of upwards of £5000, and will seat 720. There is a debt of £500 remaining on the building fund.

The anniversary festival of the Friends of the Clergy Corporation was held at Willis's Rooms on Wednesday—the Duke of Northumberland, president of the society, in the chair.

An effective specimen of Munich stained glass by Messrs. Mayer and Co. has been placed in Twigworth parish church, Gloucestershire, representing our Lord preaching on the Mount. The window consists of three lights, and the subject occupies the whole space.

A silver-gilt communion service, with furniture for the communion-table appropriate to the different festivals of the Church, was presented last Saturday to the Bishop of Lincoln by the past students of the Theological College of Cuddesdon, of which he was formerly Principal.

At a largely-attended meeting of the Chapter and Restoration Committee of Peterborough Cathedral Tower, it was resolved—"That the opinion of the Archbishop upon the two plans submitted to him be accepted, without reference of that question to the executive committee, and therefore that the present contract for rebuilding the central tower be proceeded with at once."

Both Houses of Canterbury Convocation reassembled on Tuesday. In the Upper House, the Archbishop of Canterbury announced that the Revised Version of the Bible will not be published till the 19th inst.; but two copies were presented to Convocation on Wednesday.

Sir Tatton Sykes, Bart., has given a handsome cross, 16 ft. high, which has been erected in the churchyard at Kirby Grindalythe, East Yorkshire.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, April 29.

This week opened with an important rise in Consols and most other securities dependent upon the course of foreign affairs, but Monday had not closed when fresh telegrams of a disturbing character were published. It was said that a fresh conflict had arisen on the Afghan frontier, and it was at once concluded that there was renewed danger of war being thus precipitated. The relapse in prices was nearly equal to the advance which had taken place in the early part of the day. The effect of these violent fluctuations on the first day of the settlement was important, and rumours of probable failures were generally current. Meanwhile, money is accumulating in London. This is the natural result of the distrust which prevails amongst the investing and commercial classes. Fear of war causes both to avoid new ventures, and hence the return of British capital. But the Bank of England can scarcely reduce the rate further until peace is secured. On Saturday it was nearly impossible to lend money from day to day at any price. There is, however not equal depression in the bill market, though 2⅝ is the best rate that can be quoted for bills of three months.

The Local Government Board have made a return to Parliament as to the metropolitan water companies, which should have the careful consideration of all concerned in the great monopolies which oppress the householder in London. This return shows that while in the past ten years the houses supplied have increased by no less than 32½ per cent, such additional custom to the companies has not led to a reduced charge to the customer, but has been accompanied by a very large increase, the growth in water rents in that time being as much as 58¾ per cent. It would be some answer to this if householders could be shown to be now using more water; but of the eight companies, six are now supplying less water to each house than they did before this increase of charge per house. Another form of answer would be that the cost of supplying water had increased; but the evidence is of another sort, as the profits to the companies have so greatly increased that the dividends paid to holders of water stocks have risen from 25 to 50 per cent, and at the same time very large amounts of stock have been allotted at considerably under the market price. It seems, therefore, a reasonable conclusion that the consumers have not been allowed to in any way participate in the advantages which have of late years accrued to the water companies, while it is obvious that such a monopoly can only be tolerable as long as it is equitably administered.

As reference has been made here to the Grand Trunk dividend statement having been unaccompanied by the material qualification that as much as £66,000 had been taken from net revenue to meet renewal charges of the half-year, it is just to say that at the meeting of stockholders on Monday the president explained that the board did not themselves know of the deduction until the receipt of the postal particulars, about twelve days after the dividend had been announced. They regretted the omission of the information by their manager, and had instructed him to in future include such points in his dividend telegram. In the opinion of the Board the main cause of the present unfortunate position of the company is the disorder prevailing in the posting arrangements with the several American allies, and the president is about to proceed to Canada and the States at once, to see what he can do towards restoring these posts to satisfactory bases.

According to a telegram from Ottawa, the Canadian Pacific Railway is to be completed by Aug. 25 next. It is presumed that this information is given in reply to inquiries in view of possible difficulties in regard to Afghanistan and the Suez Canal. But to Canada the present Indian and half-breed revolt makes it scarcely less important that the projected branch lines should be proceeded with.

An active correspondence has been carried on recently in connection with the proposed formation of a company to buy land in large quantities with the object of re-selling it in small plots of between one to thirty or forty acres, on a system of deferred payments, extending over a term of years. The scheme has received definite shape, and a meeting has been held for the purpose of taking preliminary steps in the matter.

Like its partners in the Atlantic cable business, the Direct United States Cable Company is to pay a reduced dividend—3s. per share as against 5s.

The shareholders of the General Credit and United Discount Companies have agreed to the proposed plan of amalgamation.

The Hammersmith Suspension Bridge has been closed, and the wooden temporary bridge constructed on the west side of it is open for traffic.

A Treasury warrant contains provisions for the conveyance by post of parcels between the United Kingdom and British India. The warrant comes into operation on July 1.

Admiral Sir. A. Cooper-Key, has received at the Admiralty a deputation of East Coast fishermen, who, through Mr. E. Birkbeck, M.P., complained of the mischief done to their nets and gear by Belgian fishermen. Assurance was given that the Admiralty would give the matter its very serious consideration.

At length the mystery surrounding the fate of the Rev. Merton Smith, Vicar of Plympton, has been cleared up, his body having been found in the Pyrenees, where he disappeared nearly two years ago. He was touring in the Pyrenees with a friend, and left his hotel for a morning walk. He was not seen afterwards, and a most anxious search, stimulated by the offer of a reward of £500, failed to recover any trace of him.

A proposal to amalgamate the London Society for Teaching and Training the Blind in Industrial Occupations at St. John's-wood with the Royal Normal College of Music for the Blind at Norwood has been before Vice-Chancellor Bacon, who decided that neither the necessity for an amalgamation nor the expediency has been shown to exist. The Court had not the power to sanction the alteration, and if it had, his Lordship said he would not do it.

Mr. William Alfred Gibbs has published a "Knapsack Edition" of his stirring poem entitled "The Battle of the Standard," and in a preface to it refers in suitable terms to the enormous importance of the Volunteer movement as our second grand line of defence, and indignantly complains that such a splendid force should not be provided with the proper equipments for taking the field. The book is published in a neat form by Messrs. Rydal and Co., of Paternoster-row.

Lord Brabazon opened the disused burial-ground of St. Mary's, Paddington-green, as a public ornamental garden last week. The ground is nearly three and a half acres in extent; the cost of conversion has been about £2000, and the work has been carried out at the instance of the Paddington Vestry, which bears one half, and the Metropolitan Board of Works the other half of the expense.—The Metropolitan Public Gardens Association, which has a fund in hand for giving work to the unemployed labourers of the metropolis, is at present converting into public gardens five squares and one burial-ground, all situated in the poorest districts, and on these works seventy "unemployed" workmen are engaged.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, April 28.

Three Senatorial elections which took place on Sunday attracted much attention in the political world on account of the great hopes of success which the reactionaries had formed on the strength of a few recent victories in the elections of Counsellors-General. Once more the reactionaries will have to adjourn their hopes, for in the elections of Sunday they were utterly defeated. In the Gironde, a Republican, M. Caduc, was elected by 774 votes against 476 obtained by the Duc Decazes; in the Deux-Sèvres, M. Bergeon, Republican, obtained a majority of 66 votes over the Bonapartist candidate; in the Basses-Pyrénées, M. Plantié, Republican, scored 579 votes against 431 obtained by General Bourbaki. In all three cases the reactionary candidates were chosen men, either having great notoriety or great influence in the department. Furthermore, in all three elections the different parties hostile to the Republic united together: in the Gironde, the Bonapartists voted for the Duc Decazes; and in the Basses-Pyrénées, the Royalists voted for General Bourbaki.

M. Ferdinand De Lesseps, the great piercer of isthmuses, was received at the French Academy last Thursday. His short speech was not remarkable, but the reply of M. Renan was one of those literary treats of which Paris seems to have the privilege. M. Renan's speech was patriotic, political, philosophical, and, above all, literary. The orator regretted that the French system of a Mussulman dynasty in Egypt had not been carried out. Such a dynasty, Mussulman in appearance, but really without fanaticism, and ready to recognise the superiority of the West, would have given civilisation command of all the Eastern Soudan, and have prevented those dangerous cyclones which Central Africa will produce periodically since it has imprudently been allowed to become Mussulman. The French system would have allowed the careful surveillance of the mosque of El-Hazar, the centre of Mussulman propagandism in Africa. "Isolated and given up to fetishism," said M. Renan, "the Soudanian races do not amount to much; but converted to Islam they become centres of intense fanaticism. For want of foresight, Europe has allowed the formation west of the Nile of an Arabia far more dangerous than the real Arabia." There are a dozen passages to quote out of this speech; but, for want of space, we must content ourselves with a few lines about that great battle-field of the future, the Suez Canal, for which M. De Lesseps is responsible. "What can we do," said M. Renan, "but inclose the lists where the blind masses come into collision? What can we do but favour in their effort towards existence all these obscure things which groan, weep, and suffer before they come into being? No deception shall stop us; we will be incorrigible. The King of Abyssinia said of you: 'Lesseps, who is of the tribe of light. . . .' We are all of that tribe. It is a rule in the army always to march towards the cannon, on whichever side it may be heard. For us it is a law to march towards the light, though often we do not know whither it is leading us."

Although we are on the eve of the opening of the vast annual exhibition of the Salon, new picture shows still continue to invite attention. The latest is that of paintings, water-colours, and drawings by the great German artist, Adolf Menzel, just opened in the Rue des Tuileries. As a painter, Menzel was almost unknown in France, and as an illustrator, he was only known to a few artists and amateurs by his grand work on Frederick the Great, certainly one of the most marvellous resuscitations of an epoch ever made. To judge from this present exhibition and from the impression made on the artists and on the public, Menzel's oil painting will not stand comparison with French work; but some of his water colours are marvels, and his drawings and illustrations entitle him to rank even above the great French national painter, the much-lauded Meissonier. Without exaggeration, Menzel is one of the most wonderful draughtsmen of ancient or modern times.

M. Léon Henzey, Curator of Antiques at the Louvre, has been elected free member of the Académie des Beaux-Arts to succeed M. Du Sommerard. Baron Alphonse De Rothschild, whose candidature created so much excitement and controversy, came out second, there being in all five candidates.

A posthumous opera in three acts, by Victor Massé, was produced with great success at the Opéra Comique on Saturday. The libretto is taken from a beautiful story by Théophile Gautier, called "Une Nuit de Cléopâtre," and the subject furnishes a pretext for sumptuous scenery and dresses and a reconstitution of Egyptian civilisation, which will enable the Opéra Comique to vie with the two Parisian theatres where people are marvelling at the reconstitution of Rome and Byzantium in "Messalina" and "Théodora." The music of "Une Nuit de Cléopâtre" is charming and full of melody. The leading rôles are played by Madame Marie Heilbron and M. Talazac.

Regnier, the eminent actor of the Comédie Française, died yesterday, at the age of seventy-eight. Regnier made his début at the Comédie Française in 1831. He had been professor at the Conservatoire since 1854, and almost all the French actors or actresses of the day have profited either by his private or his public lessons.

The Princess Hilda of Nassau was on Sunday evening betrothed to the Hereditary Grand Duke Frederick William of Baden, grandson of the German Emperor. The betrothal took place privately at the palace of the Prince of Nassau in Vienna. The bridegroom, who is twenty-eight, is major à la suite in the 1st Regiment of Footguards, and the bride is the daughter of a former Duke of Nassau.

The Lower House of the Hungarian Diet, after several days' debate, has passed, by 219 against 133 votes, the bill for the reform of the Upper House in the terms agreed upon by that assembly.

On Tuesday the Belgian Chamber of Representatives unanimously adopted the bill authorising King Leopold II. to accept the title of Sovereign of the Congo Free State.

According to Reuter despatches from Ottawa, the massacre at Frog Lake is confirmed, the Indians having shot ten helpless whites and beaten two priests to death. At Fort Pitt the police drove back the Indians, killing and wounding several of them, after which they went down river to Battleford in a scow. The rails will be completely laid and the Canadian Pacific Railway be available for through traffic on Aug. 25 next. Uninterrupted railway communication will then exist between Halifax, Nova Scotia, and the Pacific coast entirely through British territory.

News has been received from Java that the largest and most active of the volcanoes in that island is in eruption.

OBITUARY.

SIR WILLIAM LEESON.

Sir William Edward Leeson, Genealogist of the Order of St. Patrick, died on the 21st ult., at Caen, Normandy, in his eighty-fifth year. He was the youngest son of the Hon. Robert Leeson, by Grace, his wife, daughter of Mr. Michael Head, and was grandson of Joseph, first Earl of Milltown. After holding for some time a commission in the Army, he was appointed, in 1835, Chamberlain to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. From 1838 to 1841 he was Usher of the Black Rod, and from 1841 to the hour of his death held the sinecure office of Genealogist to the Order of St. Patrick, an office now abolished. In 1838 he received the honour of knighthood. Sir William married, first, 1826, Louisa Araminta, daughter of Colonel T. B. Daly Sewell; and secondly, 1853, Julia, daughter of Captain Edwin Richards, R.N., of Rivington House, county Cavan. By the former (who died in 1851) he had three sons and three daughters, and by the latter (who died 1879) two sons and one daughter.

GENERAL MACAN.

General Henry Macan, C.B., whose death, in his eighty-first year, is just announced, entered the Bombay Army in 1821, and attained the rank of General in 1877. He served with distinction in India, was on the staff in the Scinde and Afghan campaign 1840-1, and commanded a brigade during the Indian Mutiny. For his services at the assault and capture of Kotah, he was awarded a medal and made a C.B.

SURGEON-GENERAL INNES.

Surgeon-General Francis William Innes, M.D., C.B., died at 2, Lyndhurst-road, Hampstead, on the 23rd inst. He was born in 1812, the son of the Rev. George Innes, of Cullen, N.B., and educated at the University of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M.D. in 1836. In the following year he entered the medical department of the Army, and in 1871 became Surgeon-General. During the Indian Mutiny his services were acknowledged by the thanks of the Governor-General and by a medal with two clasps. The decoration of C.B. was conferred on him in 1860. Dr. Innes married a daughter of Mr. John Barclay, of Calcot, Elgin.

MR. H. HALFORD VAUGHAN.

Mr. Henry Halford Vaughan, formerly Fellow of Oriel College, and subsequently Professor of Modern History at Oxford, died on the 19th ult., at Upton Castle, Pembrokeshire. After receiving his education under Dr. Arnold at Rugby, where his name headed the long list of exhibitioners in the palmiest days of that great school, he graduated first class at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1833. He retired, however, at an early period from the profession of the law, and disappointed the hopes of a brilliant career. He was younger son of the Right Hon. Sir John Vaughan, D.C.L., a Judge of the Common Pleas, by Augusta, his wife, second daughter of Henry Lord St. John, and was nephew of Sir Henry (Vaughan) Halford, Bart., the famous physician.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Thomas Neville Ussher, formerly H.M. Chargé-d'Affaires and Consul-General at Hayti, on the 18th ult., at Guernsey. He was eldest son of Rear-Admiral Sir Thomas Ussher.

Mr. Alfred Kingston, Assistant Keeper of the Public Records, distinguished in literary and antiquarian circles, and Honorary Secretary of the Camden Society, on the 23rd inst.

Mr. Robert Anderson, A.R.S.A., well known as an engraver, and subsequently as a water-colour artist, on the 24th ult., aged forty-three.

Lady Selina Dent, daughter of the eleventh Earl of Huntingdon, and widow of Rear-Admiral Charles Dent, on the 22nd ult., in her seventy-eighth year.

Mr. Alan Bagot, F.S.A., the inventor of several apparatus for saving life and preventing accidents in mines, as well as the author of some scientific works, aged twenty-eight.

The Hon. Mrs. Hamilton (Margaret Frances Florence), second daughter of Henry Augustus, thirteenth Viscount Dillon, and widow of Mr. William John Hamilton, M.P., on the 19th ult., at Florence.

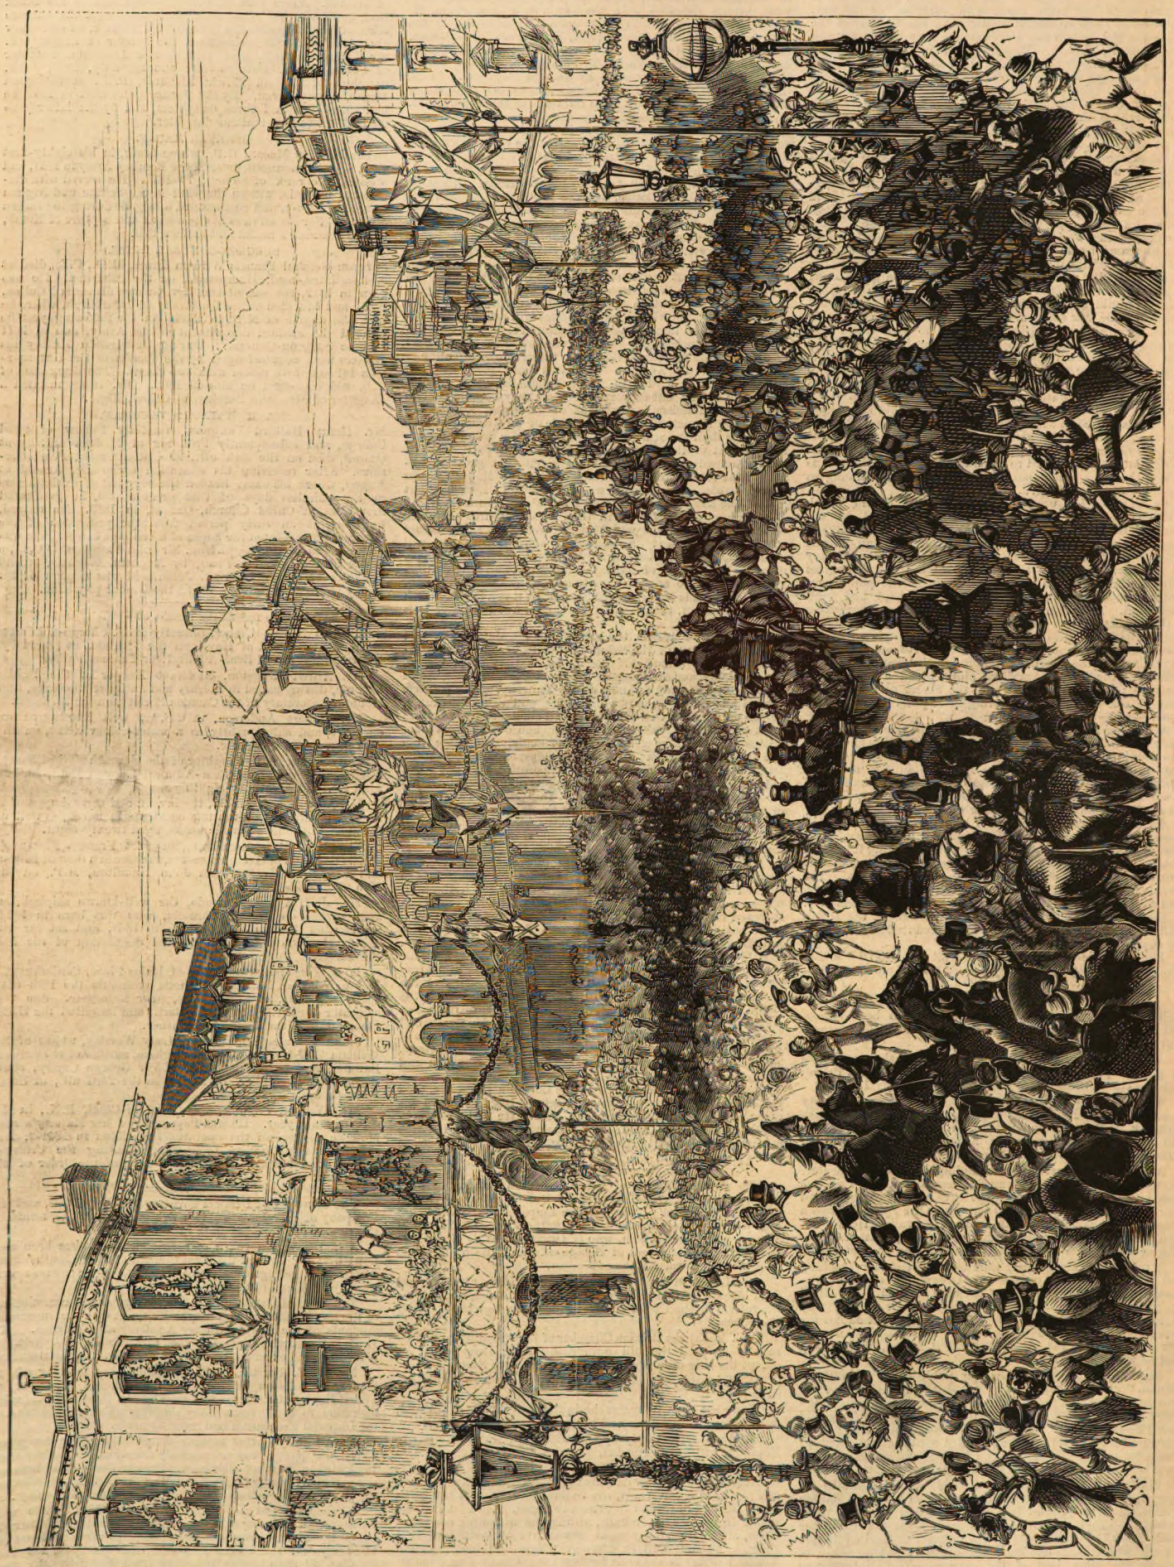
Mr. J. D'Aguilar Samuda, the well-known shipbuilder, aged seventy-two. Mr. Samuda, who was born in 1813, represented Tavistock from 1865 to 1868, and sat for the Tower Hamlets from 1868 till the dissolution of the last Parliament.

Miss Mary Barbara Hales, of Hales Place, Canterbury, a lady well-known in Roman Catholic circles, on the 18th ult., aged forty-nine, at Sarre Court, near Ramsgate. She was daughter of Sir Edward Hales, Bart., and inherited the Hales Place estate at the death of her father.

Sarah Philadelphia, Dowager Lady Worsley, widow of Sir William Worsley, Bart., of Hovingham, mother of the present Baronet, and fourth daughter of Sir George Cayley, sixth Baronet, of Brompton, Yorkshire, on the 23rd ult., at Scarborough, aged eighty-two.

Mr. William Pinhorn, Paymaster-in-Chief, R.N., in his sixty-seventh year. He was Paymaster of her Majesty's ship Modeste during all the operations in China in 1841-2, and served in the Crimean Campaign, receiving the Crimean and Turkish medals, and the Fifth Class of the Order of the Medjidieh.

The Company of Drapers have given fifty guineas, and the Company of Merchant Taylors five guineas, to the funds of the Homes for Working Boys in London.



Alfred Terry, a youth of seventeen years, has been sentenced, at the Central Criminal Court, to twelve months' hard labour for sending threatening letters to Mr. Gladstone with the object of extorting money.

The Duke of Cambridge on Tuesday presented commissions in the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers to the successful students of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich. The Duke afterwards expressed the pleasure he had felt on receiving such excellent reports of the conduct of the students.

Mr. W. E. Forster, M.P., presiding at a meeting of the Society of Arts on Tuesday night, at which a paper on the Federation of the Empire was read by Mr. Gorst, M.P., called attention to the extraordinary progress which the movement for Imperial Federation had recently made.

Her Majesty's steel armour-plated ship Howe, ten guns, 7500-horse power, was successfully launched from Pembroke Dockyard on Tuesday afternoon. The christening and launching ceremony was performed by Miss Keith Stewart, niece of Sir W. Houston Stewart, late Controller of the Admiralty.

In London last week 2541 births and 1743 deaths were registered; the former having been 216, and the latter 33, below the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. There were 39 deaths from smallpox, 103 from measles, 40 from scarlet fever, 10 from diphtheria, 57 from whooping-cough, and 21 from dysentery. Different forms of violence caused 62 deaths; 54 being the result of negligence or accident, among which were 28 from fractures and contusions, 5 from burns and scalds, 2 from drowning, 3 from poison, and 13 of infants from suffocation.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND: THE PROCESSION PASSING ALONG CASTLE-PLACE, BELFAST.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND: THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES AT THE LAKES OF KILLARNEY.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO BELFAST.

An account of the sojourn of the Prince and Princess of Wales and their son, Prince Albert Edward of Wales, at Killarney, and of their rambles, with Earl and Countess Spencer and other friends, among the beautiful scenes of lake and mountain in that romantic neighbourhood, will be found on another page. Their return to Dublin, on Monday, the 20th, is also mentioned, with the incidents of two following days, when their intended amusement at the Punchestown races, famous among sporting men for the exhibition of Irish leaping horses, was sadly marred by the persistent rain. Their Royal Highnesses left Dublin on Thursday; but, instead of going by sea to Belfast, as had been proposed, they travelled by railway, arriving at three o'clock. They were received by the Mayor and aldermen and town councillors of the city. The station was prettily ornamented, and a large concourse of people was assembled. Hearty cheers greeted the Prince and Princess as their train entered. A guard of the 2nd Royal Fusiliers presented arms, and the band played the National Anthem and "God Bless the Prince of Wales." Several of the Corporation having been introduced to the Prince and Princess, their Royal Highnesses were conducted to their carriage. A number of persons rushed forward and surrounded the carriage and held out their hands. The Prince and Princess at once acknowledged the kindly intention by shaking hands with some of them. The Royal party drove to the Ulster Hall, escorted by the Royal Irish Fusiliers, receiving a welcome which for cordiality and enthusiasm has never been surpassed. The streets of Belfast presented a spectacle of extraordinary animation and festive gaiety. The lavishness of the decorations may be estimated from the fact that, leaving the public institutions out of account, the inhabitants of Belfast had spent over £50,000 in the display at shops and private houses. The Royal party passed under three triumphal arches on their way to the Ulster Hall; all these bore inscriptions of welcome and affection variously expressed. From the railway station to the Ulster Hall the entire route was decorated with Venetian masts, exhibiting shields and trophies of flowers. Extending from mast to mast the whole way were ropes of evergreens interspersed with flowers, while every

QUARTERLY MAGAZINES.

The articles in the Church Quarterly Review are all of a more or less professional character, even the one on Mrs. Oliphant's "Literary History of England." Some, however, have great merit, especially a learned disquisition on Greek liturgies. The obituary notices of Bishop Wordsworth and Edward Coleridge are interesting, and the review of Mr. Thorold Rogers's edition of Gascoigne's "Theological Dictionary" produces most curious illustrations of the state of things which preceded and prepared the Reformation.

The Scottish Review has thoughtful articles on our foreign policy and the politics of the Dominion of Canada; a curious account of a Stuart pretender in the eighteenth century claiming to be a grandson of Charles II.; and an essay on the well-worn subject of George Eliot, which achieves originality by the suggestion that Mrs. Cross, had she lived, would have excelled Mrs. Lewes. The best feature, however, is, as usual, the quarterly digest of foreign periodical literature, which is quite unique in this country and most valuable.

The City Quarterly Magazine, a new undertaking, promises well. Besides a record of the condition of the leading securities—seemingly impartial, and, if so, calculated to be of much value to investors—it has some telling papers on subjects closely connected with finance—such as the political prospects of Mr. Goschen, the value of our colonial trade, and the abatement of legal expenses by enabling solicitors to act as barristers.

The popular poetry of Greece, or at least of that portion of Greece which is still under the Turkish yoke, has found an admirable interpreter in Miss Lucy M. J. Garnett—Greek Folk-Songs from the Turkish Provinces of Greece: Literal and Metrical Translations, by L. M. J. Garnett (Elliot Stock). To a perfect acquaintance with the uncouth and difficult dialect of the original, derived from a long residence in the country, the translator adds a happy literary instinct which has enabled her to seize upon the appropriate tone for dealing with the various classes of compositions comprehended in her volume, and a command of pure idiomatic English accurately reflecting the artless simplicity of the original. The pieces comprise ballads of legendary folk-lore, both primitive and Christian; songs and stories of the affections; and historical ballads of the strife with the Ottoman. The latter, of course, are of comparatively recent date, and show that the genius of popular song has not yet departed from among the people. Miss Garnett's translation reflects every mood in turn with equal felicity, and skilfully combines literary form with perfect fidelity to the original. The long, and in many respects valuable, introduction by Mr. Stuart Glennie would, we think, have been more in place if the writer had confined himself to the illustration of the pieces which it professes to introduce, but with which the greater part of it has little apparent connection.

At the School Board for London on Thursday week the School Management Committee made it known that the trustees of the Mitchell's Charity had agreed to give eight scholarships of the annual value of £30, instead of six as formerly, and that six of these were to be for boys and two for girls. Six boys and two girls were presented to the Board, and congratulated by the chairman on having obtained these scholarships.

TO THE CORPULENT.

"It is a very singular thing that a disease of such significance as corpulency, entailing as it does so many inconveniences and vexations, to say nothing of the more serious consequent dangers, should have been allowed to work mischief in the world all these years almost unbecded; so strange, indeed, that one is almost forced to the opinion that corpulency must be a disease of recent times, which has only now assumed sufficient importance to be classed as a disease, and to receive the serious attention of scientific men.

"That corpulency is a disease, is very clear, and there is no reason why it should not be regarded in an equally serious light as consumption or any other disease. Yet it is made light of and ridiculed, and the unfortunate possessor of too much fat, instead of securing the sympathy of his fellow men and women, gets the credit of being a person of gross and intemperate habits, a glutton in fact. Thus, when we see a picture of a fat monk or squire, there is almost invariably present also a big venison pasty, a fat capon, and flagon of wine; so it is that, unconsciously, and, as it seems, unjustly, we always associate a big corporation with big feeding. In a work on the subject of corpulence, recently published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store-street, Bedford-square (formerly of Gower-street), London, whose treatment for the cure of corpulency has, as we have said, become so popular that "doing Russell" has become almost a household word, he clearly proves from his experiences in a vast number of cases brought under his notice, that stout persons are usually the most temperate. He also makes it very clear that corpulency is a disease, and a dangerous one too, and while insisting that it should be treated as such, strongly disapproves of the system of attempting to remove superfluous fat by a course of emaciating drugs; pointing out with truth that even where it is possible to get rid of a few pounds of fat by this dangerous means, the reduction is only temporary, and the fat returns more rapidly than it left, and one does not want to be taking physic for ever. In contrast to this doubtful method of procedure, Mr. Russell attacks the disease as it were at the fountain head. The medicine he prescribes does not lower, but builds up and tones the system; in short, Mr. Russell's aim is to eradicate, to cure the disease, and that his treatment is the true one seems beyond all doubt. We have now before us many hundreds of communications from persons of all ranks of life, including among them many well-known noblemen, gentlewomen, and professional men, all testifying in the most grateful terms as to great and lasting benefit derived from Mr. Russell's remedy. Want of space does not permit us to quote largely from these letters, but we gather that in one severe case as much as eight pounds of superfluous fat has been got rid of in one week, the writer of the letter going on to say that he never felt in such health and spirits in his life. Three pounds, however, seems to be about the average reduction, depending apparently upon the severity of the case. Mr. Russell's remedy consists of a medicine which has the advantage of being agreeable to take, besides being entirely vegetable in its composition, and perfectly harmless; and from the letters referred to above we may sum up the chief points of Mr. Russell's remedy as follows:—

"Firstly. It is beyond all doubt efficacious.

"Secondly. It is perfectly harmless, on which point all seem to be unanimous. The expressions, 'admirable tonic,' 'splendid stuff,' &c., occurring frequently in the letters referred to.

"Thirdly. It is agreeable to take—a great consideration, for not everybody can take nauseous medicines.

"Fourthly. It does not necessitate semi-starvation.

"Fifthly. The effects are permanent.

"Sixthly. It is a most exhilarating and strengthening tonic.

"Seventhly. It appears that it is particularly beneficial in cases where obesity is accompanied with gout and rheumatism. All this we gather from the unsolicited testimony of a vast number of respectable people, and it is evident that the British public has not been slow to avail itself of Mr. Russell's treatment; indeed, we may look to see in a few years a marked diminution in the number of corpulent persons in England, and then there seems no longer any necessity to carry about with us the incubus of corpulency when it may so easily be got rid of; and we advise those who have not done so, to send to Mr. Russell, Woburn House, Store-street, Bedford-square, London, for his interesting book, which, it seems, is to be had by forwarding 8 stamps, sufficient to cover cost of postage and printing. The book contains, among other useful information, the Recipe, showing the harmless nature of the drugs used.

"We understand, by-the-way, that a slight modification of the original formula has made the remedy, if possible, even more certain in its effects than formerly."

For the satisfaction of Stout Persons, who may not be constitutionally robust, it should be mentioned that the Medicine is also a most invigorating tonic. Being also agreeable to the taste, makes a capital drink when largely diluted.

The Recipe referred to above, with other useful information, may be obtained, on receipt of 8 stamps, letter rate, of

PUBLIC DEBT OF NEW ZEALAND.

CONVERSION of £3,772,200 NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT FIVE PER CENT CONSOLS.—The Governor and Company of the Bank of England Give Notice that on behalf of the agents appointed by the Government of New Zealand in Council, under the New Zealand Consolidated Stock Act, 1877, the Amendment Act, 1881, and the Consolidated Stock Act, 1884 (Sir Francis Dillon Bell, K.C.M.G., and Sir Penrose Goodchild Julyan, K.C.M.G., C.B.), they are authorised to invite holders of the debentures of the above loans to bring in their debentures for conversion on the following terms, viz.:

For every one hundred pounds of such debentures a new debenture will be issued for the same amount, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum for seven years, from April 15, 1885, to April 15, 1892, when it will be converted into £90 New Zealand Four per Cent Consolidated Stock, inscribed at the Bank of England, which will rank pari passu with the Four per Cent Consolidated Stock already created and issued, and redeemable at par on Nov. 1, 1929.

Applications for conversion will be received up to April 30 next, inclusive.

The interest upon the new debentures will be payable by coupons in the same manner as upon the Consol Debentures—viz., Jan. 15, April 15, July 15, and Oct. 15, at the Bank of England, the first coupon being for the dividend due July 15 next.

Consol Debentures, from which the coupon due April 15 next must be detached, may be deposited at the Chief Cashier's Office, Bank of England, for exchange on or after Wednesday, the 15th inst. They must bear all coupons subsequent to that due April 15 next, and must be left three clear days for examination. Receipts will be given for the debentures deposited, and the new debentures will be issued in exchange as soon after as possible.

The usual annual drawing for redemption of the Consols will take place on Tuesday, March 31; debentures deposited before that date will not be affected by the drawing. Holders of Consol Debentures drawn for redemption, in respect of which no application for conversion has been made, will be allowed to receive, in exchange for each drawn debenture, a new debenture as above, upon payment of the sum of £1 per cent, provided application be made before April 15 next.

By the Act 40 and 41 Vict., ch. 59, the revenues of the colony of New Zealand alone will be liable in respect of the stock and the dividends thereon; and the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, and the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, will not be directly or indirectly liable or responsible for the payment of the stock or of the dividends thereon, or for any matter relating thereto.

Bank of England, March 6, 1885.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND.

STREET IN BELFAST, ULSTER HALL AND OTHER BUILDINGS.

house had its display of banners, and every window was crowded with eager spectators. At Royal-avenue, where several important streets meet and where there are many fine public buildings, the sight was especially imposing. Every house was gaily decked, draped in crimson and gold festoons, with laurel and ivy, and displaying bunting in infinite variety. The new Liberal Club vied in tasteful ornamentation with the Ulster Club. The work of decorating the city had been intrusted to the firm of Messrs. Defries and Son, of London. The weather was very fine; the day was observed as a general holiday, most of the shops being closed, and the people of Belfast came out in thousands to give the Prince and Princess a right Royal welcome.

The Prince and Princess arrived at the Ulster Hall, where numerous addresses were presented to them, the principal being from the Corporation of Belfast, the Presbytery of Belfast in connection with the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, and the Ulster Medical Society. Their Royal Highnesses drove through the principal streets to the Osborne yacht, at Donegal Quay, which they reached about six o'clock. In the evening the town was brilliantly illuminated. One of the most conspicuous objects was the Albert Memorial, at the eastern end of Donegal-place. The display made by Messrs. Robinson and Cleaver, in High-street, including the beautiful revolving crystal star from the Kremlin at Moscow, was much admired.

The Royal party remained on board the Osborne during the night, the yacht being off Carrickfergus. On Friday morning they embarked on board the steamer Manx Queen for conveyance to Belfast. The landing-place was at Donegal Quay, where they were received by the Chairman of the Harbour Commissioners, Mr. E. J. Harland, with the Mayor and Corporation; and an address of welcome was presented. The Royal party visited York-street Mills, the flax-spinning establishment of Mr. Mulholland, M.P., and the mill of Messrs. Richardson, Sons, and Owden, linen manufactory, in Donegal-square. They went to the Townhall, where they were entertained by the Mayor at luncheon. The printing and engraving establishments of Messrs. Marcus Ward and Co. were next visited. A drive of a few minutes brought the Royal party to Queen's College, where the students and the Professors and Doctors were assembled in the great hall. The President of the College, Dr. Porter, read an address welcoming the Princes and Princess. The next place visited was the Presbyterian Assembly's College of Belfast, where the Royal party was received by the Rev. Dr. Killen, President, the Vice-Presidents, and several members of the Faculty. An address was presented by Dr. Killen, to which the Prince replied. Leaving the Presbyterian College, the Royal party drove to the Queen's Island, crossing Queen's Bridge, and passing by the Southern Quays. It was intended that they should have visited the extensive ship-building works of Messrs. Harland and Wolff, at Queen's Island, but there was no time for this; a rapid run was therefore taken to the site of the proposed Alexandra Graving Dock, lower down the river, where the Princess of Wales, in the presence of the members of the Harbour Board, cut the first turf of the works. This ceremony was quickly concluded, and the Royal party then embarked on the Royal yacht for dinner. At nightfall the city was again brilliantly illuminated. The grand ball, given by the Mayor to about eight hundred invited guests, to meet their Royal Highnesses, was held at the Ulster Hall.

On Saturday, the Royal party left Belfast, by railway, for Londonderry, where they were greeted with a cordial welcome; and proceeded to Newton Stewart, and to Baronscourt, the seat of the Duke and Duchess of Abercorn. On Monday last, their Royal Highnesses bade farewell to Ireland, embarking at Larne in the Osborne yacht, which conveyed them to the Scottish coast. They landed in the evening at Stranraer, and travelled all night to London, arriving safely at home on Tuesday morning.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

INDISCRETION.

Despite the efforts of the Nihilists, Fenians, and other well-meaning individuals, who have rendered the latter part of the nineteenth century so exciting a period to live in, the science of blowing people up is still far from having attained exactitude. In laying mines or throwing glass balls filled with explosives, so many possibilities have to be taken into account, that it almost seems as if this method of improving society would in the end prove too disheartening to be persevered with. The Royal train passes in safety over the perilous spot, and it is only the Royal baggage, following half an hour later, that is converted into smithereens; the tyrant whom it is desired to "remove" passes along the street scatheless, while some unoffending citizen makes a premature ascent to the skies. And so Miss Susan Bowman, who had conceived a really ingenious plan for wrecking Mr. Vidal's happiness, and had worked it out with an attention to details which ought to have ensured success, arrived at no more satisfactory result than the destruction of such remnants of happiness as were left to Mr. Vidal's wife.

Clare never for a moment thought of making such a scene as Susan's sanguine fancy had anticipated. She knew that angry words would not mend matters; and even if she could have brought herself to confess that she had played the spy upon her husband, she would have shrunk from speaking of what she felt to be in some sort degrading to herself as well as to him. Her feeling was not so much one of indignation as of dull despair. She wanted to get away from Adrian: not to quarrel with him or to upbraid him, but simply to get away from him for a time. It vexed her not a little to discover that, in spite of all that he had done, she loved him still. Why should she go on caring for a man who no longer cared for her? She could not tell why—she had always believed that she would hate him if he proved false to her; but now that the blow had fallen, she found that she did not hate him. Those whose hearts are broken can hardly suffer much from wounded pride. Clare's pride asserted itself no farther than to make her resolve that her husband should never suspect the existence of the weakness which she could not overcome. "If I could only get away!" she repeated to herself over and over again. She dwelt upon this thought until what had at first been no more than a vague wish became a definite and imperative craving; and when Adrian, who had been dining out, came home that night, he found her, rather to his surprise, waiting for him in the drawing-room.

"Adrian," she said at once, "I want to go home for Christmas."

"To go home?" he echoed, in some consternation. "Well, really, I don't quite see how we could manage that."

"Not you; of course you could not leave London. But there is no reason why I should not go alone. They would be glad to have me at home; and I have not been feeling well lately."

"Are you really not feeling well, Clare?"

"I never feel quite well here," she answered, evasively; "I dare say I shall feel better in Cornwall. Have you any objection to my going?"

Adrian hesitated. "Won't they think it rather odd?" he suggested.

"I don't think so. There is nothing extraordinary in my requiring a change of air and in your being too busy to go out of town. You need not be afraid about that," she added, with a rather bitter smile; "I am no more anxious than you are that they should know what terms we are on."

An interval of silence was broken by a deep sigh from Adrian. "Do you like being upon these terms, Clare?" he asked.

"I think they are the only terms possible for us," she replied coldly. "May I write to my mother, then?"

"Oh, by all means, if you wish it," answered Adrian, whose temper, as we know, had already been tried that day, and who was beginning to think that it would have been no bad thing if Adam had been allowed to keep all his ribs. "I shall not spend a very cheerful Christmas; but that, of course, is of no consequence. How long do you propose to make your visit?"

"I thought of a month; but I could come back sooner, if I was wanted for anything here." She added, after a moment, "I think the servants understand their work pretty well now; but I will speak to the cook before I go, and make arrangements, so that you shall not be troubled about ordering dinner."

"Oh, if you are going to be as much as a month away, I shall put the servants on board wages and take my meals at the club," answered Adrian.

Clare felt a twinge of compunction. If it had been in her power to inflict some sharp mental suffering upon her husband, she would not, perhaps, have stayed her hand; but the idea of driving him out of doors to seek his dinner was repugnant to her. "I am afraid that will be very inconvenient," she murmured; "it is such a long way to go."

"No; I shall not find it so. I can always dress there in the evenings, and I rather like a walk before breakfast. Besides, I am not particularly fond of eating in absolute solitude."

Adrian felt himself decidedly aggrieved; and this is always a consolatory sensation. He did not press his wife for reasons for her desertion of him, nor did she volunteer any. It was arranged that she should start for Cardrew in the second week of December, and the prospect of a speedy release enabled her to bear herself with tolerable composure during the interim.

The day fixed upon for her departure was drawing nigh, when she was made the recipient of an honour as unexpected as it was flattering. Lord St. Austell, who was at one time a great frequenter of ladies' drawing-rooms, has of late years ceased to seek relaxation in that particular field, and is now more often to be seen behind the plate-glass window of his club towards five o'clock in the afternoon than beside the tea-tables of his fair friends. Nevertheless, it was at that hour on a dim December day that his brougham stopped at the door of a certain modest mansion in Alexandra-gardens, and immediately afterwards he was shown into the presence of our astonished heroine, his eye-glass in his eye, a smart little bouquet in his button-hole, and his teeth agreeably conspicuous.

"And how is Mrs. Vidal?" inquired his Lordship, pleasantly, holding out a lavender-kidded hand. It is hard for even the most juvenile of old gentlemen to keep quite abreast of the customs of the day, and Lord St. Austell has never been able to divorce himself from his lavender kid gloves.

"I have come," he continued, "to beg for a cup of tea." And thereupon he seated himself beside Clare's work-table, and contemplated her across it with that dreadful grinning smile of his, in which his eyes did not participate.

Upon the face of it, there is no reason at all why an elderly acquaintance should not drop in towards the close of the afternoon and ask for a cup of tea; but Clare would hardly have been more taken aback if the Czar of all the Russias had suddenly presented himself with the same modest request. She displayed a good deal of confusion, thereby delighting her visitor, who thought modesty a very becoming thing in a young woman.

"I did not know you were in London," she remarked, saying the first thing that came into her head.

"I only arrived from Paris yesterday; but Lady St. Austell has been here for some weeks. Of course, she has called upon you. No? I am quite ashamed—I blush for her. But she is so young and thoughtless that she often forgets her duties, I am sorry to say. She has not forgotten Mr. Vidal though; for I left him in Grosvenor-square half an hour ago. But perhaps I ought not to have mentioned that; perhaps he doesn't always tell you what house he is bound for when he goes out. I don't mind confessing that I didn't tell Lady St. Austell I was coming here."

"Do you take cream and sugar?" asked Clare, not much relishing this style of conversation.

"Anything that you are kind enough to give me, my dear Mrs. Vidal; senna would taste sweet, coming from your hand. I was saying that I had seen Mr. Vidal at my house. I left a positive mob there—my son, amongst the rest. I don't know whether you ever met my son."

Clare said she had not had that pleasure.

"Ah, well, you haven't missed much. Blaise is a very good fellow; but he is too good for poor sinners like me. He is many years older than I am, and he depresses me so with his solemn ways that I generally slip out of the house as soon as he enters it. He means to stay with us for another week, I am told. Perhaps you will allow me to take refuge with you sometimes during this period of affliction."

"I should be most happy," answered Clare, using that conventional phrase as insincerely as it has ever been uttered; "but I am going down to Cornwall the day after to-morrow."

Lord St. Austell fell back in his chair, with an exaggerated show of consternation. "Going down to Cornwall! Oh, Mrs. Vidal, how can you have the cruelty to deal such knock-down blows with a smiling face? Why go down to the gales and rains of Cornwall? Why not stay in London and console the humblest of your slaves? Do stay!" He bent insinuatingly over the table, and stretched out his hand to grasp that of his hostess, which, however, he missed, owing to its abrupt withdrawal.

Clare shrank back affrighted from those grinning jaws, those wicked old gleaming eyes. It must be admitted that Lord St. Austell's method of making love was somewhat wolfish; but he had met with so many a tender lambkin willing to jump down his throat, that he had not unnaturally learnt to make advances more bold than wary. Nevertheless, he knew better than to follow up one false step by another; so, pushing back his chair, he fell to discoursing about Paris and the last new play at the Comédie Française in a pleasant, fatherly sort of way, until she became reassured, and began to think that perhaps he was not such a bad old man, after all. Having created this favourable impression, he proceeded forthwith to obliterate it.

"I suppose," said he, "that when you are in Paris you spend a good deal of your time in flattening your nose against the jewellers' windows. All ladies do. So do I, sometimes. I saw this," he continued, opening a small velvet case, which he took from his breast-pocket, "in the Rue de la Paix, and it rather took my fancy."

Clare examined the diamond pendant handed over to her for inspection. "It is lovely," she said.

"So glad it pleases you; because I was thinking of you when I bought it. Will you accept it, dear Mrs. Vidal?"

"Oh, no, thank you!" exclaimed Clare, dropping the case and drawing back. "I never accept presents of jewellery."

"Don't you think," asked Lord St. Austell sweetly—"excuse my saying so; but don't you think that is a little bit prudish of you?"

"Prudishness has nothing to do with it," replied Clare, the colour mounting into her cheeks; "I don't care to receive presents from strangers, that is all."

"But I," observed Lord St. Austell, imperturbably, "am not a stranger. Added to which, I really think that, taking everything into consideration, I may claim certain privileges."

"Do you mean on account of your advanced age?" asked Clare, who understood his insinuation, and was made so angry by it that all her timidity left her. "No doubt that is quite sufficient to absolve me of any prudishness if I refuse to take a valuable present from you; still, I would rather not have it, thank you."

Lord St. Austell thought that a little display of temper made pretty Mrs. Vidal look prettier than ever. It was without any acerbity that he replied: "I was not alluding to my age; only to the fact that I am my wife's husband, while you are your husband's wife. It seems to me that, as we are both so accommodating, we are entitled to treat ourselves to little equivalents every now and then. At the same time, I should be very sorry to force my poor trinket upon you against your will. Let us talk about something else."

But Clare did not want to talk about anything else. Her only wish was to get rid of this odious old satyr as soon as possible, and she made that wish so plain that he was presently compelled to take his leave. He squeezed her hand affectionately at parting, and said: "As you are going away, Mrs. Vidal, I shall go too. There will be nothing to stay in London for now; but we shall meet again before the spring, I trust, and in the meantime I shall be always thinking about you."

To this speech Clare listened in chilling silence; but when her venerable persecutor had left her, she sat down and began to cry softly. This, then, was the sort of life that she was destined to lead henceforth; and it was to insults such as these that women of the world were expected to submit without taking offence; and it was in the society of such people as the St. Austells that Adrian delighted!

Had she been able to read the thoughts that were passing through Adrian's mind at that same moment, she would have discovered that he did not always find Lady St. Austell's society delightful. On entering her drawing-room that afternoon, he had found a large assemblage of visitors already seated there, and before them all she had smiled upon him, languished at him, and whispered to him, in a way that caused them to exchange significant glances, and made him very uncomfortable. He did not want to be thus distinguished; he did not want people to say—as he knew they would say—that he was the latest of this capricious lady's admirers; and he did his best to check her advances. In this attempt he failed completely. Lady St. Austell had three good reasons for conducting herself as she was doing. Firstly, flirtation was as the breath of her nostrils to her; secondly, she wished to get rid of her visitors, who bored her; thirdly, and lastly, it gave her much pleasure to shock her step-son, Lord Blaise, whom she could not endure, and who was now standing upon the hearthrug, looking down upon her with astonishment and disgust. So she continued to whisper soft nothings to Adrian, and the visitors departed, one by one, and Lord Blaise looked more and more displeased every minute.

There was a saying to the effect that the Earls of St. Austell were alternately rips and prigs, and that a black-haired Earl was invariably succeeded by a red-headed one. Perhaps each heir-apparent, on surveying himself in the glass, may have felt that it was hopeless to struggle against his manifest destiny, and so may have helped to perpetuate the tradition. The father of the present holder of the title had been an eminently respectable old person who had lived well within his income, and had collected butterflies; his son, who was now something more than middle-aged, and whose carrotty locks were streaked with grey, had once been described by the leader of his party as the most conscientious and the dullest man in England. When Lord Blaise rose in the House of Commons there was a general stampede. No one had ever been found who could listen to him for five minutes without falling into profound slumber, and the newspapers never thought of reporting him at length. This did not prevent him from plodding on with his carefully-prepared speeches from the exordium to the bitter end; nor had it kept him out of office. He had been Under-Secretary for various departments, and had distinguished himself by the patience with which he submitted to be questioned, and by the extraordinary prolixity of his replies. His party was at present in opposition; and this was a source of grief to him, for he loved the labour of going into details, and it was not always easy to obtain a hearing when, after much research, he had discovered some inaccuracy in the statements of his successor. In private life he had not a great many friends, although he was just, benevolent, and perfectly straightforward in all his words and ways. It is permissible to a man to be straightforward, if only he will be so in a pleasant manner; but poor Lord Blaise's manner was not pleasant, and this made his straightforwardness unwelcome to most people.

His step-mother, who had had to listen to more than one remonstrance from his lips, and had found it equally impossible to conciliate and to break with him, derived some satisfaction from outraging his notions of propriety, and if she could have induced Adrian to respond a little more warmly now to the encouragement vouchsafed to him, she would not have felt that her afternoon had been wholly barren of amusement. When the last of her guests had gone away, she seated herself on an ottoman beside the young author and said,

"Now we can talk in peace. You need not mind Lord Blaise; he is mounting guard over us in the interests of morality, and cart-ropes would not drag him out of the room."

Lord Blaise cleared his voice, thrust his hands into his pockets and leant back against the mantelpiece. It always took him some little time to think of a reply, and Lady St. Austell went on, without waiting for him, "He may safely be treated as a nonentity. The only language that he speaks is the language of Hansard and Bluebooks, and he won't understand more than a word here and there of what we say."

"We have no secrets to talk about, that I am aware of," remarked Adrian.

"How cautious you are! It really is rather hard that one can never count upon ten undisturbed minutes in one's own house. The end of it will be that I shall have to go to yours. Will you admit me, if I knock at your door?"

"Of course we should be delighted, Lady St. Austell," answered Adrian; "but unluckily my wife is going down to the country the day after to-morrow."

"You don't say so! Then the day after to-morrow you may expect to see me. She will leave in the morning, I suppose?"

"Julia," broke in Lord Blaise, in a harsh voice, "when do you leave town?"

"Really I don't know; I haven't made up my mind yet. If it didn't sound inhospitable, I would ask when you mean to go?"

"Your movements," replied Lord Blaise, "need not be in any way affected by mine. I require nothing more than a bed-room, and I can easily remain on here after you move, if necessary. As a matter of fact, I believe that I shall finish the business that I have to attend to in about three days' time."

"In that case you may count upon being cheered by my company throughout your stay. But to return to what I was saying," she added, addressing Adrian; "I really should enjoy above all things paying you a visit. May I?"

"Oh, certainly," said Adrian, with a somewhat ungracious air.

"Very well; that is settled. The day after to-morrow, then, about three o'clock in the afternoon. I shall come early, so as to have a good long time, and I shall explore the recesses of your study, and sit in the historical chair in which you meditate upon your writings. Perhaps I may write a few words, as a memento of my visit, with the historical pen. What fun it will be!"

Lord Blaise frowned heavily at Vidal; but as the latter did not speak, he felt bound to utter a protest. "Are you aware, Julia," he asked, "that in acting as you propose you will risk nothing less than the loss of your character?"

"Exactly so," agreed Lady St. Austell; "that is the amusing part of it. I have long wished to do something innocent and at the same time truly shocking; and this is an opportunity which may not recur. There will be very little risk about my visit to Mr. Vidal's house; because only three people will know of it, and they will all hold their tongues upon the subject, I think. I shall not tell for obvious reasons; Mr. Vidal will not tell, because he is a gentleman. About you I am not quite so sure; but after all, it is only fair to you to say that you are not an absolute idiot."

"In view of the very serious nature of the case," said Lord Blaise, not at all mollified by this passing tribute to his intellectual powers, "I must claim the right of exercising my own judgment as to the line of action which it may be advisable for me to adopt." And with that he marched out of the room.

Lady St. Austell burst into a fit of laughter. "Now, would you," she asked—"would you have believed it possible that Lord St. Austell could have such a son as that?"

"I certainly think you were paying him rather too high a compliment when you said that he was not an idiot," replied Adrian, who was a good deal put out. "I should have thought anyone with a grain of intelligence would have understood that you were not serious in proposing to go to my house."

"What!—not serious? Indeed I never was more serious in my life. If anything in this world is certain, it is certain that I shall be in Alexandra-gardens the day after to-morrow as the clock strikes three."

"Really, I think you had better not."

"How disagreeable you are!" cried Lady St. Austell, petulantly. "You never do anything that I want you to do! Why should you grudge me a little harmless amusement? It can't hurt you, whatever happens."

Adrian was not quite so sure of that; but he only said, "It was of you that I was thinking."

"Then pray don't disturb yourself on my account any longer. If I choose to be imprudent for once in a way, that is my affair. One thing I can promise you: if you won't allow me into your house, you shall not be allowed into mine again."

A more alarming form of menace might have been discovered; but such as it was, it served its purpose. Adrian yielded, and presently took his leave, inwardly resolving to give Lady St. Austell no second pretext for compromising herself and him.

Late that night, as Lord St. Austell was sitting in the smoking-room of his club, he was surprised to see his son approaching him with the aspect of one who has a purpose in hand.

"Hullo, Blaise!" said he, "what are you doing abroad at this hour? I thought your nurse always put you to bed and tucked you up at ten sharp, during the Recess."

"I want to say a word or two to you about Julia," began Lord Blaise, disregarding this facetious greeting. "She will get herself into serious trouble if she goes on as she is doing. I suppose you and she understand each other, and you apparently see no objection to a good deal that I should think highly undesirable in my wife; but you can hardly wish her to be the heroine of an open scandal, and"——

"Blaise," interrupted Lord St. Austell, fixing a steady stare upon his heir-apparent, "did you ever hear how it was that an ancestor of ours came very near having his head cut off, in the reign of James II.?"

"He was suspected of being implicated in Monmouth's rebellion. The evidence was of the flimsiest description, and I believe that nothing whatever was proved against him, beyond a few imprudent speeches."

"Just so. He made some imprudent speeches and meddled with what didn't concern him. I wouldn't follow his example, if I were you."

"Nobody can cut my head off," remarked Lord Blaise.

"No; but somebody can cut you out of the whole of the Hertfordshire estates, and of a very considerable amount of personal property. Believe me, you had better stick to politics, and leave social affairs to meaner intellects."

"I am sorry if my remarks offend you," said Lord Blaise; "but your displeasure will not prevent me from telling you that I heard Julia make an appointment, this afternoon, to visit a certain Mr. Vidal at his house the day after to-morrow, having previously ascertained that his wife would be absent from home on that day."

Lord St. Austell chuckled, and seemed much amused. "The deuce she did!" cried he. "This is great sport. My dear Blaise, you did well to impart this distressing news to me, and I will not disinherit you so long as you continue to be honest and virtuous. May I ask whether you heard any hour fixed for the appointment that you speak of?"

"Yes; she mentioned three o'clock."

"Thank you very much. Now I won't keep you out of bed any longer. I am sure that the family honour is safe in your keeping, and that you won't let anybody else into the secret which you have so properly confided to me. Good-night."

CHAPTER XXIX.

AN UNWELCOME GUEST.

When Adrian had taken Clare's ticket for Polruth, had put her into the train, and had recommended her to the care of the guard, he walked away sadly enough. The day was damp, raw, and dismal, and he shuddered as he thought of the empty house whither he was returning—that empty house in which he was presently to have the honour of receiving Lady St. Austell. He shuddered a little at the thought of Lady St. Austell too, and then could not repress a smile at the irony of the situation. If Clare only knew who was going to spend the afternoon in her drawing-room! Happily, the Flying Dutchman would be hurrying her through Devonshire by that time, and it was in the last degree unlikely that she would ever hear of an escapade which it was to Lady Austell's interest to keep secret. But he ceased to smile when he remembered that equal reliance could hardly be placed upon the discretion of the servants. Doubtless the servants knew very well that there was a split between their master and mistress; doubtless also they were eager to arrive at its origin, and would draw their own conclusions from so significant a circumstance as the arrival of a lady at the house within a few hours of Mrs. Vidal's leaving it. After Adrian had reached home, he began to hope that this aspect of the case might have presented itself to Lady Austell as well as to himself, and that calmer reflection would induce her to abandon her rash purpose.

But this hope was doomed to disappointment. Punctually at three o'clock her carriage dashed up to the door, and directly afterwards she swept into the drawing-room with an air of triumph.

"You see, I have kept my word," she said.

"I feel very proud," answered Adrian. "I will ring and order some tea."

"Oh, not yet, thank you," laughed Lady St. Austell; "I have only just finished luncheon. Now confess the truth; you never believed that I should come, did you?"

"The proof that I did is that I am here," Adrian replied. "I don't think I have ever been at home at this hour before."

"Well, at any rate, you hoped I shouldn't come, and at this moment you are wishing with all your heart that I hadn't. Strictly between ourselves, I may tell you that I had quite made up my mind this morning not to come; but when Blaise walked in to luncheon with a face as long as Cromwell-road and asked me what I was going to do in the afternoon, I couldn't resist the temptation of replying, 'I thought I told you that I was going to see Mr. Vidal.' And so here I am. If you could manage to look a little less awkward and uncomfortable, it would set me more at my ease."

Adrian endeavoured to obey this injunction. It was some relief to him to find that Lady St. Austell was not in one of her sentimental moods. "What shall I do to amuse you?" he asked, cheerfully.

"I don't think I need call upon you to exert yourself yet; just at present the sensation of being here is sufficiently amusing in itself. So your wife has gone home, has she?"

"Yes. I don't know whether you care for Japanese china; but I have some Satsuma in the next room which my father-in-law got for me, and which is rather good, I believe. Would you like to see it?"

"Presently. I was going to ask you about your wife. Why has she gone off like this?"

"She wants to see her people."

"That is reassuring. I was afraid I might be the innocent cause of her flight."

"She does not even know that you are in London," said Adrian, with a touch of impatience.

"I wouldn't be so sure of that, if I were you. She knows more than you think for, perhaps: people's wives generally do. And I can tell you something about her that you don't know. She has made a conquest."

"Indeed?"

"Yes; indeed. And who, of all people in the world, should her admirer be but my husband! Isn't it funny? It is as if we four had sat down to a rubber of whist; only we are all rather bad players, because we can't find out what our partners have in their hands. I don't know when I have been more tickled than when I heard of Lord St. Austell's last infatuation. The second coachman told his valet, who told my maid, who told me, that he paid Mrs. Vidal a visit of over an hour the other day."

A more unwelcome piece of intelligence could hardly have been conveyed to Adrian, who now began to understand why Clare had avoided speaking to him or looking at him during the last two days. "This is very flattering," he remarked, grimly.

"Well, not so very; because Lord St. Austell is anything but particular, and I doubt whether he ever was what I should call really in love in his life. It is great fun, though."

"It does not appear so to me," said Adrian; "but possibly my appreciation of the ludicrous may be defective."

Lady St. Austell stared at him and laughed. "How glum you look!" she exclaimed. "Are you going to assume the part of a jealous husband? That would be perfect! It would then only remain for Lord St. Austell to honour me in the same way—he does so sometimes—and the whole business would become so delightfully involved that we should none of us know exactly what was the matter. What I should like, would be to see Lord St. Austell and Mrs. Vidal walk into the room now."

"Heaven forbid!" ejaculated Adrian.

"Heaven is not likely to work miracles for our benefit; but supposing that it were possible for those two to appear suddenly, what a thrilling scene we should have! You must admit that it would be thrilling."

"I dare say it would," answered Adrian; "but I don't think I like being thrilled. Won't you come and look at my china, and leave the absent to look after themselves?"

Inwardly, he was wondering how much longer Lady St. Austell meant to stay. He had found it pleasant enough to visit her in Grosvenor-square, and to be sympathised with and petted by her; but it was quite another thing to have her sitting in his own drawing-room, suggesting horrible catastrophes, and affecting that recklessness of tone which is so extremely repulsive in a woman of whom you do not happen to be enamoured. He heartily wished that he had had the strength of mind to tell her plainly that he must decline to receive her during his wife's absence.

As, however, the mischief was done now, and could not be undone, he wisely resolved to make the best of things, and not to offend a lady who, good-natured though she was, did not readily pardon those who remained insensible to her charms.

WIMBLEDON MEETING.—THE QUEEN'S PRIZE CONTEST.

The preliminary prize-list for the forthcoming meeting of the National Rifle Association at Wimbledon has been issued, and shows several alterations and additions, of which those in the Queen's prize contest are the most important. A sum of £292 is added to the Queen's prize-list, thus bringing the total amount to be fired for in this the most important shooting event of the year to the substantial total of £1960, divided into 360 prizes. It is in the conditions, however, that the change is most marked, as there are now to be three stages instead of two, as formerly; and the final struggle for the possession of the most coveted honours will consequently become more interesting than before. Under the new arrangement, the silver medal, silver badge, and £60 become the second prize in the contest; and the "sixty" will all receive prizes according to their places in the three stages together. The Queen's prize-list and conditions are as follows:—1st prize, her Majesty the Queen's Prize, £250, and the gold medal and badge; 2nd prize, the silver medal, badge, and £60; 3rd prize, the badge and £40; 4th prize, £30; 5th prize, £20. Then follow ten prizes of £15, thirty of £12, fifteen of £10, one hundred of £4, one hundred of £3, and one hundred of £2. Conditions—first stage: 200, 500, and 600 yards, seven shots at each. The first 300 in the first stage will be entitled to fire in the second stage, and the next sixty below the 300 will receive prizes of £2 each; second stage, 500 yards, ten shots, and 600 yards, fifteen shots. The places of the 300 competitors will be decided by their aggregate scores in the first and second stages. The first sixty will be entitled to fire in the third stage, and the remaining 240 will receive the 240 prizes next below the first sixty prizes in the prize-list; third stage to be fired in the order laid down for the second stage, distances 800 and 900 yards, fifteen shots at each distance. The places of the sixty competitors will be decided by their aggregate scores in the three stages.

Lieut.-Col. and ex-Sheriff Cowan has been chosen Alderman for Cordwainer Ward in the room of the late Lord Mayor.

The Board of Trade have awarded a binocular glass to Captain A. S. Crowley, master of the American schooner Sarah Eaton, of Calais (Maine), United States, in acknowledgment of his humanity and kindness to the shipwrecked crew of the British barque Kenilworth, of Liverpool, which was abandoned at sea on March 2 last.

A party of fifty-five children from the Rev. Dr. Stephenson's Homes at Bonner-road and Gravesend, left Euston Station last week for Canada. They were joined at Stafford by a few more children from the Cottage Homes at Birmingham. At Liverpool a further contingent of thirty awaited them from Dr. Stephenson's other homes at Edgworth, Lancashire, and Ramsay, Isle of Man. The emigration department of these homes has been in active operation since 1872, having its own depôt and agency at Hamilton, Ontario.

PROBLEM No. 2145.
By W. Grimshaw.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play, and mate in three moves.

Played recently at Bath, the Rev. G. A. MacDonnell giving the odds of Pawn and move to another Amateur.
(Remove Black's K B P from the board.)

WHITE (Mr. P.)	BLACK (Mr. M.)
1. P to Q 4th	Kt to K B 3rd
2. P to K 2nd	P to K 3rd
3. Kt to K B 3rd	P to B 4th
4. P to B 4th	P to Q 4th
5. R to Q 3rd	Kt to B 3rd
6. Kt to B 3rd	P takes Q P
7. K P takes P	B to Kt 5th
8. Castles	B to Q 3rd
9. R to K sq

White has not made the most of the odds, and this and the next move throw away all the advantage with which he started.

9.	Castles.
10. Q to Kt 3rd	Kt to Q R 4th

Recovering his Pawn:

11. Q to B 2nd	P takes P
12. B to B sq	Kt to Q 4th
13. K to K Kt 5th	B to B 4th
14. Q Kt to K 4th	B to B 5th
15. B takes B	Kt takes B
16. P to K R 4th

There is nothing in this attack, as the sequel shows. Retreating the Kt to K B

WHITE (Mr. P.)	BLACK (Mr. M.)
3rd and K Kt 3rd, respectively, appears a preferable line of play.
16.	Kt to Kt 3rd
17. P to K Kt 4th	R to B 5th
18. P to B 3rd	P to K R 2nd
19. Q R to Q sq

There was only K R 2nd for the Knight, and there was no safety there.

19.	P takes Kt
20. Kt takes P	Q to B 3rd
21. P to Q 5th	P to K 4th
22. Q to R 4th	B takes P

With the adverse Queen remote from the scene of action, Black can well afford to put two minor pieces en prise. The termination is very neat.

23. P takes B	R takes P (ch)
24. K to R 2nd	R takes P (ch)
25. Kt to R 3rd	Q to B 7th (ch)
26. K to R sq	Kt to B 5th
27. Q to Q 7th	Q to Kt 6th
28. R takes P	Kt takes Kt

The thirteenth annual meeting of the West Yorkshire Chess Association was held on Saturday, the 7th ult., at Wakefield. It was arranged that not less than £10 would be divided as prizes between the winners in the several tourneys, and that the Woodhouse Challenge Cup would be presented to the winning club by the donor, Alderman Woodhouse, of Leeds. We go to press too early to record the result of the play.

From the St. Patrick's Chess Club "Pamphlet" we learn that, at a meeting of the members of the Irish Chess Association, held on the 16th ult., the rules were considered and adopted; among them being one providing for the admission of ladies to membership. The "Pamphlet" will in future appear in type, a change which, it may be presumed, is called for by an increase in its circulation. Nevertheless, we advise all collectors of clubs curiosa to purchase the five numbers that have appeared in manuscript. They can be obtained from the proprietor, 29, Nassau-street, Dublin, at the price of twopence per number, post-free.

We quote the following neat position from the Nationaltidende, of Copenhagen, where it appears without the author's name. It bears a close resemblance to the work of Mr. S. Loyd:—

White: K at K R 3rd, Q at Q Kt sq, Kt at K 2nd; Pawns at Q 3rd, Q B 2nd, and Q R 7th. (Six pieces.)

Black: K at K R 8th, Kt at Q B 8th; Pawns at K R 5th, Q 6th, Q B 6th, and Q Kt 7th. (Six pieces.)

White to play, and mate in three moves.

Mr. Sheffield Neve has been chosen master of the Essex staghounds, formerly under the mastership of the Hon. H. W. Petre.

Lord Carnarvon presided yesterday week over a meeting at Willis's Rooms, convened for the purpose of taking the preliminary steps towards the formation of a national land company, the object of which will be to buy large holdings of land and to subdivide them into small quantities on a system of deferred payments over a term of years. A provisional committee was appointed, as well as a committee to inquire how far the present state of agriculture and condition of labour admit of the successful application of industrial partnerships to the cultivation of land in the United Kingdom. Amongst the speakers were the Duke of Argyll, the Marquis of Ripon, Lord Thurlow, Sir R. Loyd-Lindsay, M.P., Sir W. Barttelot, M.P., and Mr. Albert Grey, M.P. Sir R. Loyd-Lindsay has offered to the company a farm of 400 acres in Berkshire, upon any terms the company may suggest.

ROYAL INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

The second exhibition at their new galleries fully justifies the members in the bold course they adopted in offering greater facilities to painters in water colours. The expansion of this branch of the art during the past few years has been very marked, and hitherto but slight facilities were offered to painters who had individual ideas or unorthodox views. The Institute in its spacious galleries has now room for every variety, and its liberal-minded management excludes no peculiarities of style or expression, provided a certain level of technical skill can be proved. Amongst the thousand and more pictures which make up the present season's exhibition it will be hard, therefore, if all tastes cannot find something to satisfy them; whilst there are many works which cannot fail to obtain suffrages in the apparently hostile camps of painting. The president, Mr. James D. Linton, is represented by only two pictures, both single figures, "Waverley" (444) and "Rose Bradwardine" (464), in both of which he shows that masterly power of producing in water colours results which few can rival even in oils. Waverley is represented full face, the tips of his black three-cornered hat just appearing over his rich brown hair. His doublet is of a sort of yellow frieze, over which he wears a black velvet coat; the texture of both is rendered with all Mr. Linton's minute delicacy and truth; whilst the pose of the figure is firm and the drawing correct. Scarcely less praise must be awarded to the companion work. Rose Bradwardine is standing by the breakfast-table, with a pot of flowers, freshly arranged, in her hand—simple and truthful as the novelist depicted her. Close by is Mr. Randolph Caldecott's "First Flight" (438), showing the "field" at the first breaking away of the fox—horses and riders in full fettle, and eager to get over the hurdle fence in style. The old gentleman on the grey horse is most happily depicted; but there is even more humour in the companion picture, "The Last Flight," showing another hunting-party cautiously avoiding or heavily clambering over an easy hedge, horses and riders alike exhausted. Although Mr. Caldecott has not, and perhaps with reason, represented in "The Last Flight" the party which promised so boldly in the first, the components of the group are much the same; and he has wisely preserved a specimen "fine old English gentleman—one of the olden time" in both scenes, in order, perhaps, to point a moral which fox-hunters will not fail to seize. From Mr. Caldecott to Mr. Walter Crane the transition seems abrupt, and the distance great; but the latter has done his best to perform the journey in his "Pan Pipes" (47), two solidly-built country girls, in exquisite costumes and classic attitudes, dancing to the music of a youth, in modern attire and uncomfortable attitude, who is seated on the edge of a very classic well. Although Mr. Crane has for the nonce left mediævalism and the bloodless, fleshless beauties with which he is accustomed to fill his charming landscapes, yet even still he seems to be unable to give a sense of unity to the limbs of which he composes his figures. In colour and in the accessories of dress and setting they lack nothing; but in themselves, in spite of the weight of flesh they carry, they scarcely suggest reality. Some of his smaller landscapes are pleasant reminiscences of English summer weather; and amongst such are "Swanage" (345), which is represented by a green field with a red cow, and an indistinct fringe of houses in the background; "Ballard Down" (372), lost in a mist, may be especially mentioned. Mr. Abbey's single work, "An Old Song" (294), is somewhat aggravating. It is impossible not to be attracted by its delicate feeling, its harmonious colouring, and the true poetry which surrounds the old couple who, from the corner of the room, are listening to their daughter as she sings beside her harp. The girl herself is pleasant to look at, in spite of her neck and of the disproportionate length of her body, from her waist downwards—a defect of drawing which is emphasised by the fender, which occupies so prominent a place in the room. It is in the light falling from the deep bay window on the old father's grey hairs, in the tender gallantry with which he holds his wife's hand, and with her recalls the words of the "old song," that the charm of Mr. Abbey's work lies—in a word, in the sentiment of the ensemble rather than in the execution of all its details. Sentiment of another kind, but none the less true, is to be found in Mr. Joseph Nash's "Hope Springs Eternal in the Human Breast" (935), which might well be taken for the garret-scene in "Masks and Faces." The Triplet of the picture is also an author in search or in need of a patron. He has risen early, and donned his only coat, of which the seams are wearing white; his wife, half dressed, has stepped out of bed to help in his toilet, to apply to the rusty coat what remains in the ink bottle after the husband's labour of the night. Perhaps Mr. Nash may have been self-inspired; but this is not the case with Mr. C. Green, Miss M. J. Moberley, and Mr. J. Lawson Stewart, all of whom draw their subjects from the "Old Curiosity Shop"—the first-named giving us "Nelly and Her Grandfather at the Races" (626), in which the best feature is the back view of Codlin as he stands beside the show in which Short was playing the quarter-staves. "The Flight of Little Nell and Her Entry into the Old Curiosity Shop" (665) tells its tale plainly, but without much poetry; whilst the "End of the Journey" (1020) is scarcely more than architectural study of an old church in its half-ruined cloisters. Of real humour there are some excellent examples; for instance, John Tenniel's "Sir Andrew Ague-cheek" (485) laboriously spelling his notes, and playing "o' the viol di Gamba"; Mr. Joseph Nash's "Tithe Pig" (512): a complacent tenant who has brought to his rector the smallest and most comical black pig—a form of tithe which the reverend tithe-receiver accepts with anything but effusion; Mr. Frank Dadd's "The Boy—What Will Become of Him?" (412): a boy seated in a chair, his hands resolutely stuck into the pockets of his duck trousers, and his face fixed in almost comical wrath, whilst an old professor of phrenology is measuring his head, and explaining to the father, who sits beside, the future destiny of the youth, as foreshadowed by his bumps. In point of technical execution, there are few finer works in the present exhibition than this and Mr. Dadd's other work, "Tally-ho! Off We Go!" (547): a scene in the huntsman's lodge—the old man riding his little grandchild on his foot, whilst two grave old hounds before the fire are demurely watching this parody of their life. Mr. Stephen T. Dadd promises well in his cleverly painted "In Flagrante Delicto" (697): two puppies who have pulled the cloth from the table—and with it the gamekeeper's dinner.

We must postpone for the present any further remarks upon the contents of this exhibition, which contains many works deserving more than a passing glance.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Dec. 17, 1877), with three codicils (dated Feb. 23, 1881, and Jan. 15 and Sept. 2, 1884), of Sir Charles James Freake, Bart., late of Cromwell House, South Kensington, who died on Oct. 6 last, was proved on the 13th ult. by Dame Eliza Pudsey Freake, the widow, and Charles Townshend Murdoch, the acting executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £718,000. The testator gives to his wife £5000 all his furniture, plate, pictures, books, jewellery, household effects, wines, consumable stores, horses and carriages, an annuity of £2000 for life, a further annuity of £5000 for life or widowhood, and the use, for life, of Cromwell House, or Bank Grove, Kingston, or any other house belonging to him she may select; to his daughter-in-law, Frederica Charlotte Mary, £2000 per annum for life, an additional £3000 per annum for the same period if she survives his son, her husband, and the houses at Dartmouth and in London, where she now resides, also for life; upon trust, for each of the children of his son and only child, other than his eldest son, £50,000; and to his executor, Mr. Murdoch, £2000. All the residue of his freehold, copyhold, leasehold, and personal estate is to be held, upon trust, for a period of twenty-one years from his decease, to pay during that time £17,000 per annum to his son Thomas George, and to allow all the remainder of the income to accumulate. At the expiration of the term of twenty-one years the whole of such residue is settled to the use of his said son, for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively according to seniority in tail male. Full powers are given to his trustees to manage his building and other estates, to grant leases, and to complete contracts.

The will (dated Aug. 27, 1880), with a codicil (dated Oct. 29 following), of Colonel the Hon. Charles Grantham Scott, late of Eathorpe Hall, Warwickshire, and of No. 79, Eaton-square, who died on Jan. 5 last, was proved on March 30 by the Hon. Frances Maria Scott, the widow, one of the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £52,000. The testator gives to his wife £800, all his jewellery, trinkets, wines, consumable stores, such of his furniture, effects, horses and carriages, at his Eaton-square house, and such of his plate and plated articles as she may select, and an annuity of £700 in addition to the amount secured to her by settlement; to his son Beauchamp Henry John, the remainder of his plate and plated articles, all his furniture and effects at Eathorpe Hall, and £6000; to his sons Louis Guy and Dudley Alexander Charles, £6000 each; and to his daughters Evelyn Mary, Jessie Louise, and Alice Henrietta, £2000 each, and a further sum of £2500 each on the death of his wife. The residue of his real and personal estate he leaves to his said three sons.

The will (dated Aug. 28, 1876) of Dame Augusta Platt, late of No. 61, Queen's-gardens, Bayswater, who died on Feb. 16 last, was proved on March 28 by Charles Platt and the Rev. Herbert Edwyn Platt, the sons, two of the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £9000. The testatrix appoints among certain of her children the unappointed part of the trust funds under her marriage settlement, and bequeaths a few legacies. The residue of her real and personal estate she leaves to her daughters, Miss Susan Platt and Miss Augusta Platt. The deceased was the widow of the Hon. Sir Thomas Joshua Platt, Knight, formerly one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer.

The will (dated Feb. 5, 1878), with a codicil (dated April 27, 1882), of Mr. William Charles Humphrys, late of No. 17, Anglesea-place, Southampton, and of Elm Lodge, Bursledon, in the same county, who died on Oct. 17 last, was proved on March 31 by Mrs. Isabella Eliza Dehany Humphrys, the widow, Lieutenant-Colonel George Cookes, and George Rastrick, the surviving executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £14,000. The testator leaves to his wife £500, and all his wines, consumable stores, carriages and horses; he also leaves her for life £2500 per annum, and his residence in Anglesea-place (including the stables), with the furniture and effects; to his sons, Ambrose William, Julian, and Horace, present legacies of £5000 each, and a further £5000 each on the death of his wife; upon trust for the children of his deceased daughter £4000; and upon trust for his grand-daughter, Angela Humphrys Drummond, his house known as Highfield, Bursledon. The residue of his property is to be held, upon trust, for his said grand-daughter, and his three daughters, Beatrice Caroline Letitia, Ada Mabel, and Julia Wiggett.

The will (dated Oct. 21, 1881), with two codicils (dated Nov. 16, 1881, and Jan. 10, 1884), of Mr. Henry Newson, late of No. 57, Lincoln's-inn-fields, who died on Feb. 12 last, at St. Leonards-on-Sea, was proved on March 23 by Mrs. Caroline Elizabeth Newson, the widow, William Charles Jackson; Henry Carrs Newson, the son, and Alexander David Maclaren, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £67,000. The testator bequeaths to his wife all his jewellery, plate, books, furniture, household effects, horses and carriages, and £1500 per annum for life, if she shall so long continue his widow; to Mary Carrs Kitton, an annuity of £100; to his executors, Mr. Jackson and Mr. Maclaren, £150 each; and the residue of his real and personal estate, upon trust, for his three children, Mrs. Mary May Hermon, Mrs. Florence Thompson, and Henry Carrs Newson.

The Scotch Confirmation, under seal of office of the Commissariot of Clackmannan, of the trust disposition and settlement, executed Dec. 21, 1883, of Mr. James Archibald, of the firm of Robert Archibald and sons, Tillicoultry, woollen manufacturers, who died at Glasgow, on Nov. 2 last, granted to Mrs. Ann Hynde or Archibald, the widow, Robert Archibald, the son, the Rev. James Brown, and David Macwatt, the executors nominate, was sealed in London on March 28, the value of the personal estate in the United Kingdom exceeding £53,000.

The will (dated Nov. 22, 1876), with four codicils (dated Dec. 1 and 21, 1876; Nov. 2, 1880; and May 16, 1882), of Mr. Francis Jackson Kent, late of Castle House, Hampton, Middlesex, who died on Feb. 10 last, was proved on March 20 by Francis Jackson Kent and Robert Jackson Kent, the sons, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £39,000. The testator leaves £300, his furniture, plate, pictures, effects, horses and carriages, and an annuity of £700, to his wife, Mrs. Mary Ann Kent; and makes provision for his daughters, and the children of his deceased daughter and son. There are also some other bequests. As to the residue of his real and personal estate, he gives one fourth each to his sons Francis and Robert; one fourth, upon trust, for his son Edmund, his wife, and children; and one fourth, upon trust, for the widow and children of his deceased son, Jackson.

The will (dated Sept. 15, 1883), with a codicil (dated Dec. 22 following), of Mr. Richard Bright, formerly of Bruton-street, but late of Nepaul, Torquay, who died on Feb. 2 last, was proved on March 23 by James Gordon Walls, George William Brown, Lewis William Hurford, and Henry Robert Chasty Hurford, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £37,000. The testator bequeaths legacies to his nieces, nephew, partner, and others, including £500 to be distributed among the persons in the employ of the firm of Bright and Co. receiving wage at the time of his decease. The residue of his property he leaves to his daughters, Mrs. Letitia Mary Hurford and Mrs. Susan Hannah Hurford.

The will (dated May 20, 1884) of Mr. John Angel Talbot, late of Radipole, in the county of Dorset, who died on Feb. 15 last, was proved on the 15th ult. by Mrs. Emma Talbot, the widow, George Andrews, and Robert Oakley, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £31,000. The testator makes some bequests to his wife, executors, and man-servant. The residue of his property is to be held, upon trust, for his wife, for life or widowhood; in the event of her marrying again, a fixed annuity is substituted for such life interest; and, subject thereto, for his sons, John William and Robert Randall, in equal shares.

THE DURBAR AT RAWUL PINDI.

The conference between Lord Dufferin, the Viceroy of India, and the Ameer of Afghanistan, Abdurrahman Khan, at the Viceregal Durbar held at Rawul Pindi, in the Punjaub, at the beginning of April, is an event of great political importance. We have given a View of Rawul Pindi, with a description of the place, which is on the road from Lahore to Attock and to Peshawur. The Ameer came from Cabul, arriving at Rawul Pindi by the railway from Peshawur on the morning of March 31. The Viceroy had arrived at Rawul Pindi on the afternoon of the 27th. One of our Illustrations is that of the scene at Lord Dufferin's arrival.

His Excellency was accompanied by Lady Dufferin, Sir Alfred Lyall, Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces; Mr. Durand, Officiating Foreign Secretary; Mr. Mackenzie Wallace, private secretary; Lord William Beresford, and the rest of his personal staff. The train entered the Rawul Pindi station at five o'clock, and here, on alighting, his Excellency was received by Sir Charles Aitchison, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjaub, Sir Donald Stewart, Commander-in-Chief in India, General Sir Frederick Roberts, Commander-in-Chief in Madras, General Hardinge, Commander-in-Chief in Bombay, General Wilson, General Sir Michael Biddulph, the Hon. Mr. Gibbs, and the principal civil and military officers. Among these were Colonel Bradford, Agent to the Governor-General for Rajputana, the Lord Bishop of Lahore, the Roman Catholic Bishop of the Punjaub, the Financial Commissioners, and several Commissioners of the Province, the Secretaries to the Punjaub Government, and various heads of Departments, Brigadier-General Gordon, General Baker, General Leslie, General Gillespie, and the Military Staff.

Beyond these officers the Punjaub Chiefs received the Viceroy in the order of their rank, space on the platform being marked off for each chief and his retinue by a low railing covered with red cloth. They were the Maharajah of Puttiala, the Nawab of Bhawulpur, and the Rajahs of Jheend, Nabha, Kapurthulla, Faridkote, and Chumba.

After speaking to Sir Charles Aitchison and to a few officers whom he knew, or who were introduced to him, his Excellency proceeded to make the acquaintance of the Punjaub chiefs, exchanging a few kindly words with them, and to receive the address of the Municipal Committee. This occupied some time, and the Royal salute had been fired before Lord Dufferin made his appearance outside the station. The view from the railway station was very picturesque. In the far distance lay the mountains, looking green and grey under sunshine and cloud, and tipped in a few places with snow. In the foreground rose the spires and buildings of the city, intermixed with trees, rising from a sea of emerald-green fields. Immediately in front were the long lines of railway trucks and sheds, and the fine bridge spanning the Leh stream. And there was a gathering, bright with blue and purple and gold, of the chiefs of the Indian Army, the leaders of the Punjaub Commission, and the Native Princes of the province, assembled to do honour to their Viceroy and Governor-General. On the other side of the station, the courtyard was filled with the bright costumes of the body-guard and the 9th Lancers, and behind them two lines of troops kept the road clear for the Viceregal party. The saluting battery was drawn up at a short distance from the station, on the other side of a little green, and the whole view was shut in, beyond, by the avenues of the cantonment roads.

Through the long lines of troops, the Viceregal procession took its way from the railway station to the camp. The escort consisted of the 9th Lancers, headed by the Deputy Assistant-Quartermaster-General, a detachment of the Body Guard preceding and following the three carriages, another detachment of the Lancers, and a field battery. In the first carriage were the Viceroy and Lady Dufferin, Lord William Beresford, and one of the Aides-de-Camp; in the next came Sir Alfred Lyall, Mr. Durand, Mr. Mackenzie Wallace, and another Aide-de-Camp; in the third were the rest of the personal Staff. The Viceregal carriage was drawn by four horses ridden by two postilions, and preceded by two outriders. It moved slowly throughout the whole distance, and the clock was striking six when the final strains of "God Save the Queen," and the completion of the second Royal salute, announced that Lord Dufferin had reached his camp. The crowd dispersed rapidly, and the troops were marched back to their camps. The arrangements made by the police and military were excellent, and Lord Dufferin must have been greatly pleased with the success of his State entry into Rawul Pindi.

The Ameer Abdurrahman, on the morning of the 31st, was received by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjaub, the General of the Rawul Pindi Division, and the Commissioners. A guard of honour of the Irish Fusiliers was drawn up at the railway station, and saluted him as he alighted. He was dressed in a blue undress military coat of European pattern, with a grey sheepskin Turkestan hat, and wore two stars on the left breast. He is suffering from the gout, and walked lame. The rainy weather marred the ceremony arranged for the reception. The Ameer preferred to go in the carriage which the Viceroy had sent, and the procession of fifty-six elephants was abandoned. In the carriage with the Ameer were the General commanding the division and Major Napier. An escort was formed by the King's Dragoon Guards, a battery of Horse Artillery, and the 15th Bengal Cavalry. The route selected was more than two miles long, and was lined throughout on both sides with troops of all arms. The carriage proceeded at a walk, so that the Ameer had a good opportunity of seeing the troops assembled in his honour. A salute of twenty-one guns was fired when the procession started, and another salute by a second battery of horse artillery announced that the destination had been reached. The Duke of Connaught, who, with the Duchess, had arrived the night before, saw the procession pass from the club stand.

Our Illustration of the arrival of the Viceroy is from a photograph taken by Mr. J. Burke; the Sketches of troops attending the Durbar, or crossing the Jhelum river on their way to Rawul Pindi, were drawn by a military correspondent, Lieutenant Offley Shore, of the 31st Punjaub Infantry, forming part of the 1st Brigade, 1st Division, of the force assembled on this occasion.

Mr. William Dick, principal clerk in the office of Accountant-General of Customs, has been appointed Accountant-General, in succession to Mr. Jenner Weir, who has retired from the service.

Three charity dinners were held on one day last week. At the anniversary festival of the Orphan Working School, Haverstock-hill, held at the Freemasons' Tavern (Mr. C. Palmer, M.P., in the chair), subscriptions to the amount of £2207 were announced. Viscount Hardinge presided at the anniversary dinner of the Artist's Benevolent Society, and the subscriptions, including one hundred guineas from the Queen, amounted to nearly £500. The first annual festival in connection with the recently-formed Work-Girls' Protection Society was held at Willis's Rooms—the Duke of Cambridge in the chair. The Rev. George Nugee gave interesting details of the movement, and also stated that the Queen and the Prince and Princess of Wales had expressed their deep sympathy with the effort that was being made. The secretary, Mr. Bunnet, then announced a list of donations, amounting in the aggregate to upwards of £1000, the chairman's list being £425.—The Cabdrivers' Benevolent Institution held its annual general meeting on Thursday week, at St. James's Hall. Lord Aberdeen presided. It was reported that the society now possesses funded capital to the amount of £8400.—Yesterday week, at the Cannon-street Hotel, the Bishop of Ripon presided at the anniversary festival of the British Orphan Asylum, Slough, subscriptions and donations to the amount of £1330 being announced. On the same day, the General Porters' Benevolent Association held its annual dinner, the subscriptions amounting to £2200.

RECOMMENDED BY THE BEST PHYSICIANS. HAS WON ITS WAY TO ROYAL FAVOUR.

The AMMONIAPHONE is invaluable in all PULMONARY AFFECTIONS, and may be regarded as a specific in all cases of ASTHMA and BRONCHITIS. It is a tube about 25 in. in length, constructed of a specially prepared non-corrosive metal, with handles having patent spring valves. It is charged with a chemical compound, combined so as to resemble in effect that which is produced by the SOFT BALMY AIR of the ITALIAN PENINSULA when inhaled into the lungs, hence the term—ARTIFICIAL ITALIAN AIR.

CHARLES WYNDHAM, Esq., Criterion Theatre, Piccadilly, Jan. 15, 1885, writes:—
"I have now used the AMMONIAPHONE which you forwarded me about a fortnight ago, and, although rather sceptical at first, I am bound now to confess it is of very great service to me."

Rev. W. HAY M. H. AITKEN writes:—
"14, Bryanston-square, London, W.
"Will you kindly recharge my AMMONIAPHONE. I have derived much benefit from its use; it certainly does clear the voice in a remarkable way, and enables me to get through my work, preaching two or three times a day, and sometimes oftener, with much less trouble and fatigue."

THE DOCTOR'S VERDICT.

A. S. KENNEDY, Esq., L.R.C.P., L.R.C.S., &c., writes:—"14, Conduit-street, London, W., Dec. 20, 1884.—The two AMMONIAPHONES that I had from you have given very good results. Apart from improved timbre, resonance, and extension of register, which are undeniable, I have found the AMMONIAPHONE most useful in cutting short catarrhal and laryngeal troubles, and of great benefit in removing hoarseness. Several patients have tried the AMMONIAPHONE at my suggestion, and are all pleased with the improvement in their voices."

THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY DISPUTE: TYPES OF RUSSIAN SOLDIERY.

SKETCHES BY MR. A. LARSEN, OUR SPECIAL ARTIST LATELY IN SIBERIA.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

Never since the days of Shakspeare have three men been linked together by the bonds of friendship and literature so distinguished as Southey, Wordsworth, and Coleridge. Landor called them three pillars of one tower; and, though each pursued a distinct path as poets, and Southey's reputation is mainly due to his prose, the names of the trio must ever be inseparable in the history of our literature. Coleridge has been dead for more than fifty years, and yet up to this week there has been no public recognition of his exquisite genius. Visitors to Westminster Abbey have looked upon the features of Wordsworth and Southey, but have sought in vain for the author of "The Ancient Mariner." This is the more singular, since Coleridge not only deserves a place, if ever singer did, in the Poets' Corner, but is also high in the roll of fame as a consummate critic, as a theologian, and as a philosopher. His claims were tardily acknowledged by the honour done to his memory on Thursday. Something more, however, is yet due to him; and it is to be hoped the unveiling of his bust will remind a really competent writer that the life of Samuel Taylor Coleridge on a scale worthy of the subject is a desideratum in literature.

Why will ladies wear those gloves of many buttons, if it be too much trouble to button them all the way up? The fashion was intended to show off the shape of the arm; but, if the upper part of the glove is left in loose wrinkles, the intention is frustrated, and the observer thinks that the wearer must either be a very slovenly, careless creature, unfitted to preside over a household, or have either a grievously fat or a skinny, bony, shapeless arm, to which the glove refuses to cling. Choose either alternative, or button the gloves right up.

The small association of women who are doing business as type-writers in Chancery-lane say that theatrical people and authors are their best customers. The former require their prompt-books and separate actors' parts, and that is intelligible enough; but if authors simply require type-writers to make their effusions legible to editors, so much the worse for the authors. If they wrote plainly they would not be obliged to have recourse to the type-writers, and would effect a considerable saving. Illegibility is not the sign-manual of genius, nor its necessary concomitant; for though Dean Stanley's last letter to a relative was carried about the roads of a suburban village for hours by a despairing postman, and would probably never have reached its destination had not that functionary met the lady to whom it was addressed, yet George Eliot wrote the clearest of hands, and the writing of most of our popular novelists is as plain as print. Everyone who tries may learn to write clearly, but even then the labour of engrossing clerks may be saved, and will afford ample occupation to those who multiply copies of any given document by mechanical means.

If the Delphic and other oracles were (intentionally) equivocal, so are proverbs, whether intentionally or not. "Stuff a cold, starve a fever," says the proverb; and you take that to be two separate injunctions, bidding you stuff yourself when you have a cold and starve yourself when you have a fever. You obey the injunctions to the best of your humble ability and means until you meet "the schoolmaster abroad," who pities your ignorance, tells you that the course you and your fellow ignoramuses fatuously but in all good faith pursue accounts for many a premature death, and assures you that the proper way to interpret the proverb is "stuff a cold" (if you are fool enough to do so), and you will have to "starve a fever" (if, indeed, it be right to do that), just as, according to him, "marry in haste, repent at leisure" means "marry in haste" (if you are fool enough to do so), and you will have to "repent at leisure." But (as you tell him, of course) he may not be correct in either case. The first proverb may mean "a person who would stuff a cold would also starve a fever," both courses being wrong; and the second may mean, "as the world cannot go on very well without marriages, and as you would be pretty sure not to marry if you stopped to think about it, the best way is to get it over quickly, no matter if you have to repent it ever afterwards: you'll have plenty of time to do the repentance in." The fact is that the only proverbs that are good for anything but to puzzle us all are those that enable you to exasperate a fellow-creature who is in difficulties by reminding him (keeping carefully out of his reach) that "it's a long lane that has no turning," that "beggars mustn't be choosers," and so on, out of your choice assortment of more or less insulting commonplaces.

The racing season gallops apace: already the first two of the five "classic" races, the Two Thousand and the One Thousand, are over, having been decided this week at Newmarket. The former was first run for in 1809, the latter in 1814; and since those dates ten winners of the Two Thousand, Smolensko, Cadland, Bay Middleton, Cotherstone, West Australian, Macaroni, Gladiateur, Lord Lyon, Pretender, and Shotover, have won the Derby, and seventeen winners of the One Thousand, Neva, Corinne, Zinc, Cobweb, Galata, Crucifix, Mendicant, Governess, Formosa, Hannah, Reine, Apology, Spinaway, Camélia (dead-heat with Enguerrande), Wheel of Fortune, Thebais, and Busybody, have won the Oaks (for a dead-heat, when not "run off," counts as a "win"). Both Two Thousand and One Thousand are now run over Rowley's mile; but up to 1873 the latter was run over the Ditch mile. For the former there has never been a "walk over," though twice, in 1829 and 1830, there were only two runners recorded; but for the One Thousand, though it has never been reduced to a match, there was a "walk over" in 1825. The Two Thousand is remarkable as the only "classic" race that has ever been won by a "twin" (for "twins" are generally of no account); and that was Nicolo (in 1823), who also won the Newmarket Stakes, beating Zinc, winner of the One Thousand and Oaks. The One Thousand is remarkable for having been won by the Duke of Grafton eight times in nine successive years from 1819 to 1827 (the interloper being Lord Jersey, with Cobweb, in 1824); and for the fate of Mayday, who won it in 1834, when it was run on the First of May, to which fact she owed her name, and who broke her leg (and was shot) in the subsequent Oaks. Of course, the winner of the Two Thousand (or One Thousand) may not be entered for the Derby (or the Oaks), as happened when Vedette won the Two Thousand in 1857; and to that circumstance it is probable that the celebrated Blink Bonny owes her great fame, as a winner (like Eleanor in 1801) of both Derby and Oaks: for Vedette would most likely have beaten both her for the Derby and Impérieuse for the Leger, had he run for them. He won everything he ran for at three years of age, and was the sire of Speculum and Galopin.

Terrible storms raged during April along the Canadian shores, and a report comes from Pointe des Monts that a large number of antiquated cannons varying from four to ten feet in length were washed up at Pointe aux Anglais, a spot which derived its name from the disaster to a British fleet which took place there two centuries ago. Old fire-arms, swords, and bayonets have been found from time to time, and tradition tells of a vast treasures, lying perdu beneath the waves. Several efforts have been made to reach it, but hitherto without success.

The new President of the United States has a reputation of saying smart things. He calls the standard silver dollar of his country, in which there is a large percentage of base metal, a cloud with a silver lining. Mr. Coxe, the new U.S. Minister to the Porte, is somewhat of a literary man, and just before starting he told the President that his friends said that if he published a book while in Constantinople it would be because he "wanted the whole edition bound in Turkey." "Perhaps they would also prefer that it should be Turkey read," was Mr. Cleveland's merciless response. Nowadays, all persons in high places are supposed to have favourite flowers, and the President has declared for the American daisy, which is much larger than the "wee, modest, crimson-tipped flower" of the British Isles.

At the private view of the Royal Academy Exhibition, it was evident that more people came to see others and show themselves and their pretty costumes than to see the pictures. In fact, the way that a certain well-known beauty and actress was mobbed hardly spoke well for the manners of even the most select English crowds. Wherever she went, her admirers formed a ring round her, and commented in audible tones on her dress and her appearance, comparing them to what they had been on previous occasions. She had no chance of seeing the pictures, even had she come for that purpose; for when she stopped for a moment in her walk through the galleries, she was hemmed in on all sides by strangers, who unceremoniously listened to her conversation. Miss Mary Anderson, too, the American actress, was similarly honised; and, if she desires to see the works of art, must either go disguised to Burlington House, or arrive there when the doors open in the early morning. Beauty and popularity have their disadvantages—especially, on Private View Day.

The Women's Silk Culture Association in the United States is going ahead, and reported most satisfactory progress at the annual meeting, which took place at Philadelphia on the 16th ult. During the last year it presented new flags of native silk to the United States Government, the Government of its own State, the City Government of Atalanta, and the Emmet Guards at Washington. The production for ordinary commercial purposes includes various dress materials, brocades, gros grains, ribbons, handkerchiefs, and knitting silk. The heavy import duties imposed by the United States on all European articles of dress are having their effect, and our cousins will soon be sufficient unto themselves in the matter of raiment.

The old boots and shoes which, when quite past wearing by anyone, find their way into our dust-bins are extremely valuable, and find their way again into our houses in most artistic forms. They are soaked in many waters to remove the dirt, all the nails and threads are picked out, and the leather is then reduced to a thick pulp, from which the now fashionable embossed leather wall-papers, screens, &c., are made. The finer the original quality of the leather the better it takes the bronze and old gold of the designs which make these hangings things of beauty. Bookbinders and frame-makers also know full well the value of this pulp, and carriage-builders press it into sheets which are invaluable for the roofs of the most luxurious vehicles. After this one feels that the word "rubbish" is a misnomer, and that no such thing exists.

The billiard-match last week between the Champion, Mr. John Roberts, jun., and Mr. W. Cook, sometime Champion, was a very unsatisfactory affair. Such a player as Mr. W. Cook condescended to accept 2000 points out of 12,000, and was beaten, on Saturday, the 2nd inst., by nearly 3000; whereas, on the Wednesday evening previously, he had played far the better of the two, and Mr. Roberts had played so badly (for him) that, in consequence of the slow play, the spectators had to be dismissed before the Champion had scored his proper number of points. No doubt, the Champion made a succession of splendid breaks; and, no doubt, Mr. Cook now and then played like a perfect tetragon; but, on the whole, it was no match at all.

Memorandum: At a game of billiards, when your adversary makes an especially brilliant shot (if he ever does such a thing), never omit to cry, "Hullo! Did you play for that?" And put emphasis on the word "play." If you can do this pretty often, you may not promote the harmony of the occasion, but you may very likely win the game.

It is said that in case of war the wealthy Russian monasteries would place their riches at the disposal of the Government, and this recalls a good story of the late Czar, which se non è vero, è ben trovato. Over the catacombs at Kief there is a well-known religious house called the Petsherskaia Laura, whose Prior, during the Crimean War, lent the Czar Nicholas five millions of roubles, in acknowledgment of which the potentate gave a bond in his own handwriting. The precious document was kept in a jewelled casket, and twenty years later, when Nicholas had long slept with his fathers, Alexander II., his son and successor, visited the monastery for the purpose of inspecting some historical documents, the Prior handed it to him with a profound obeisance, and hoped for immediate payment when he saw the Czar press it reverently to his lips and heard him exclaim, "In this you possess a treasure worth ten times the sum it represents!" A pause ensued, and then, to the monk's deep disappointment, the Czar handed the paper back, saying, "I will not rob you of your priceless treasure. Keep it as a sacred relic, for it is my father's own handwriting, and you have not purchased it too dearly!"

Sumptuary laws are things of the past, but a certain Bishop is surely trying to revive them when he gives notice that he will not confirm any girls who wear white dresses or veils. A white dress may be so simple that it is perfection as the attire of a modest and seriously minded maiden, and it ought not to be tabooed altogether, even on an episcopal authority. The Bishop of Manchester has praised the candidates who came to the sacred rite in useful black gowns, but he does not draw a hard and fast line against the garb of ideal purity and spotlessness.

It is singular that up to this year no horse had started first favourite for the Two Thousand at odds on since Lord Lyon won in 1866 with 75 to 40 on; but before that time it had been common enough. It was 6 to 4 on West Australian in 1853, 6 to 5 on Nannykirk in 1849, 13 to 8 on Tom Tulloch (who was beaten) in 1846, 6 to 5 on Idas in 1845, 7 to 2 on The Ugly Buck in 1844, 3 to 1 on Cotherstone in 1843, 11 to 8 on Crucifix in 1840, 7 to 2 on Cæsar when The Corsair won in 1839, 6 to 4 on Achmet in 1837, 6 to 4 on Bay Middleton in 1836, and the enormous odds of 7 to 1 and 5 to 1 respectively were laid on Ibrahim and Riddlesworth, who won in 1835 and 1831. On the other hand, it was 10 to 1 against the great Stockwell, 20 to 1 against The Wizard, 25 to 1 against Diophantus, and 10 to 1 against Macaroni when they won. The question this year was to which category of strong favourites Paradox would belong: and he solved it last Wednesday when he won the Two Thousand from the Chopette colt, The Child of the Mist, and four others. Fate owed Mr. Brodrick-Cloete some compensation for the great loss (4000 gs. and "expectations") he sustained by the death of Louisbourg. In old times the Two Thousand was run for on Tuesday, and the One Thousand on Thursday; but since 1872, almost indeed ever since the First Spring Meeting began on Tuesday instead of Monday (but not in 1871), the "classic" races have come off on Wednesday and Friday.

Surely a mother is entitled, if she pleases, to disapprove of her daughter "courting" and being "courted." And some people would admit her right to mark her disapproval by personal chastisement. The wife of a farmer at Leek has, however, gone a little farther than even the strongest advocate of the rod could attempt to justify. Believing her daughter to be walking down the road with a sweetheart, the stern mother mounted a horse and followed the lovers. When she overtook them, she administered a sound horse-whipping to both; and it was not until her maternal arm tired that she found that she had mistaken the pair and had thrashed somebody else's daughter. A newspaper, commenting on the affair, and referring to the police-court proceedings which are imminent, remarks that the affair "has caused the greatest amusement." To whom? Are we to believe that the sufferers were tickled at the humour of being severely beaten? or that the jocularity of the assault pleased the young man? or that the irate farmer's wife is uproarious with laughter at the idea of fines and damages? Anyhow, the occurrence is a warning to all young people not to go flirting in the lanes in the Leek district.

An addition to the list of curiosities of reporting was furnished by the accounts of the Academy banquet in Monday's papers. The Times makes Earl Granville refer to "the fact of seeing before me a noble friend, or rather an intimate enemy (alluding to a portrait of the Duke of Richmond which was hung on the opposite wall) sitting opposite to me as he usually does four evenings in the week, and who is represented, if I am not mistaken, in the act of taking notes." The other dailies report him as having alluded not to the portrait of the Duke of Richmond, but to the bodily presence of the Marquis of Salisbury, and the last part of the paragraph runs, "and who is at this very moment, if I am not mistaken, in the act of taking notes." Of such materials is history made!

How not to do it appears to be the motto of the Chile Government, at all events with respect to the splendid ironclad Esmeralda, which has just been sent out from England to Valparaiso. The ruling powers were delighted with her on arrival, and straightway invited a large party of notables to enjoy a trial-trip. But instead of retaining the skilful and experienced hands who had brought her safely across the sea, they entirely changed the crew, and substituted native engineers for the English ones. The consequence was that, though everyone was brought safely back to shore, the boilers were burnt out, and the good ship Esmeralda is now practically helpless, the repairs required before she again puts out to sea being most extensive.

Roman Catholic soldiers of the Highland Regiment now stationed at Chelsea attend the Pro-Cathedral in uniform on Sundays, and carry the banners in the processions during service. They make a very pretty effect of colour, contrasting with the sombre clothing of those who follow with the tapers.

THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

(From our Special Artist, Mr. W. Simpson.)

Sir Peter Lumsden made his appearance at Sarakhs in the first week of November last. This was done according to the appointment made with Russia, that General Zelennoy and the Russian Commissioners were to have been at that place at the same date. It was then that the Russian advance to Pul-i-Khatun was first heard of. A few days later, as we marched southwards on the left bank of the Heri-Rud, we reached that place, which is, according to Captain A. F. Barrow's measurement, thirty-nine miles from Sarakhs, and consequently all that distance nearer to Herat. From Sarakhs to Pul-i-Khatun the ground on each side of the Heri-Rud is low; on the right, or eastern bank, there are undulating downs of no great height. But at Pul-i-Khatun a hilly region begins, which gives that point a great importance as a military and strategical position. To the south is a rocky gorge, which could be defended by a very few men against great odds. Our next march was a long one of about twenty-five miles, to a place called Khojeh Saham-ed-deen; this name belongs to a saint's ziaret, or shrine. The hills on the right bank of the river increased in height as we came along, and opposite our camping ground was a bold rocky cliff, resembling Salisbury Crags at Edinburgh. Next morning, as we moved south on our march, this cliff opened out, and on its eastern flank we saw the entrance to the Zulfagar Pass. At that time we had no idea that it was likely to possess an interest in connection with the Afghan boundary; but the striking and picturesque appearance of the Pass was sufficient to entitle it to a place in an artist's sketch-book, and I am able now to give a representation of it, as it has become historical in connection with the question of the Afghan frontier. The Sketch is taken from Goolar, on the western bank of the Heri-Rud; the Pass itself is on the eastern bank, and glimpses of the river may be seen through the openings of the low hills on the Goolar side. It will be seen that the stratification produces cliffs extending like long terraces along the upper part of the hills. "Zulfagar" was the name of Ali's sword, a weapon as mystic and celebrated as the famous "Excalibur," the sword of Arthur; and the tradition is, that the pass was cleft by a blow with it given by the Khalif. This picture of the Zulfagar Pass will show what a strong position it is, even without the aid of the military engineers: and when it is stated that the ground from Pul-i-Khatun to Zulfagar, a space of nearly thirty miles, contains within it all the strategical positions of importance between Sarakhs and Herat on the Heri-Rud, the character of the Russian claims will be understood. I have introduced what is a common feature of the landscape in this part of the world in the autumn; when the long grass is dry, it catches fire, and sends up a high column of black smoke.

One of my Sketches of the Afghan Boundary Commission is that of the perambulator, or mile-measuring machine, brought by the Survey Department from India. This wheel had rolled up all the way from Rindli, the last station yet opened of the Quetta Railway, and has done its fair share of the scientific work of the Expedition. Major Holdich intends, when it returns to Meerut, to have a brass plate affixed to tell what it has accomplished. In our march from Kuhsan to Penjdeh, and on to Bala Murghab, natives of the country were employed to wheel it along. At first they could not understand the use of trundling the article, as it carried nothing; but when they found out that it was for measuring the length of the road, they began to take a great interest in the work, and did it with great care. Hera Singh rode with them to see that all went right, and a man carried the plane table, so that he could note the line of country as he went along.

The officers of Sir Peter Lumsden's party, in their enforced leisure on the banks of the Murghab, enjoyed the pastime of shooting. Pheasants had been occasionally seen on our marches; but at Meruchak, as that part of the Murghab is not disturbed by population, these birds have increased in great numbers. From Meruchak to Karaoul Khaneh, a distance of about eleven miles, there is no one to disturb the pheasants; and along the whole of this space it is like a well-kept preserve. Most of our party took advantage of this condition of things, and had a few days' good sport. Very large bags were made; over a hundred birds were brought into camp in one day. Our servants were having pheasants for their dinner, and the Mohammedan soldiers of the escort had a supply. To arrange for this, one of the beaters had to perform a process known to followers of the rules of Islam: he had to make an incision in the neck of the bird as soon as he picked it up after it was shot. This ceremony is known as "Halall," as it bleeds the animal, and makes it lawful for food. On the low ground of the Murghab valley, where it is wet and marshy, long reeds grow to a great height, ten feet being a common size, but they often reach twenty feet and more. Most of the shooting had to be done on ground covered with this kind of growth, as well as smaller reeds. These reeds made it difficult at times to shoot; for in laying the gun towards the birds some of the reeds would come in contact with the barrel, and thus prevent that accuracy of aim which was desired. At times some members of the Boundary Commission had their eyes in the air following the pheasants; of course they were, at such moments, not keeping the necessary look-out for the boundary between land and water under their feet, and the result was often a sousing up to the middle, in water about the freezing point. The birds have very beautiful colours, slightly different from the English pheasant, a whitish wing being the most distinctive characteristic. This peculiarity is found among these birds as far west as Sarakhs, but it stops at Lutfabad, about sixty miles east of Askabad; those at the Chacha and along the rivers watering the Atcks, on the north-west border of Persia, being exactly the same as the English. The Turkomans performed the part of beaters, and, for want of dogs, they had also to become retrievers; they could not understand why the birds were always allowed to get up before they were fired at. It is only ten miles from our camp where this splendid preserve begins, and it would, no doubt, be visited again, before the Commissioners would leave the Murghab Valley.

On my way home from Afghanistan, I came to Baku, on the Caspian. This is the port from which soldiers can now be most readily sent from the Caucasus and the Black Sea to the Trans-Caspian province, the Russian official name by which that part of Turkestan on the left bank of the Oxus, including Merv and Sarakhs, is now known. The railway from Batoum, viâ Tiflis, gives direct communication between the Black Sea and the Caspian. I was in Baku in the second week of April, and learned the fact of the important movement of troops which had been taking place in order to support General Komaroff's advance on the Heri-Rud and the Murghab. While I was there a rifle regiment arrived on its way through. They were quartered in a field near the railway station, where they had to wait a day or so for the steamer to take them across the Caspian to Krasnovodsk. They were all very young fellows, small and dumpy, with little or no hair on their faces. Higher up in a field was a battery of artillery, with six guns, also on its way to Central Asia. The soldiers were dressed in the usual dark green, the colour of the Russian military uniform. Since the occupation of the Caucasus, the Russian Government has organised a large number of regiments in that country, and has given them a uniform based on the old Circassian costume. I saw some of these troops at Sarakhs, when I was there in November last, and witnessed one of them perform a characteristic dance, brandishing a couple of daggers as he went through the varied movements, and a Sketch of it has since appeared in the Illustrated London News. In Tiflis these Circassian uniforms are a very familiar feature of the streets, and I give an Illustration which will convey some idea of them.

Having illustrated so far the Russian soldiers, I also give a group of what may possibly be their opponents, the Afghan soldiers. So far as uniform is concerned, they are thoroughly irregular. Some wear puggarees or turbans, while others wear sheepskin hats; and those troops who belong to Herat, some of them at least, have these head-coverings made of very long hair and shaped something like the bearskin of our Foot Guards. In this Sketch I have introduced General Ghous-ud-din Khan, who commanded the Afghans at Penjdeh. I saw him there early in December last, when he sat to me for his portrait. I have been repeatedly asked why the Afghans were beaten in the engagement of March 30. The explanation is not difficult to give. These soldiers are brave enough; but they are irregulars in the extreme meaning of that word. They want discipline, as well as good officers to lead them. They are only a mob, and such men must succumb before a regular corps of troops. General Ghous-ud-din Khan I believe to be a brave man, and one who would do his duty; but when I speak of officers to lead, I mean what we would call the regimental officers. I have heard that General Ghous-ud-din Khan behaved himself in a very courageous manner during the late action.

On crossing from Krasnovodsk to Baku, among the passengers on board the Grand Duke Constantine was a prisoner from Central Asia. What his crime was I could not learn; but he was heavily ironed: he had strong iron rings on each wrist and on each ankle, with chains connecting them. There was a military guard accompanying him, and one of the soldiers, with gun and bayonet, stood sentry over their charge during the voyage. I presume that he would be taken to Tiflis, as the capital, either for his trial or to undergo his sentence, whatever that might chance to be. W. S.

THE CHURCH.

The ceremony of the enthronement of the new Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Bickersteth, will take place in the cathedral at Exeter to-day (Saturday).

The Bishop of Truro has conferred a canonry, coupled with the precentorship of Truro Cathedral, on the Rev. Augustus Blair Donaldson, M.A., Oxon.

Dr. Hessey, the Archdeacon of Middlesex, gave his annual charge to the clergy of the archdeaconry on Wednesday, in the Church of St. Paul, Covent-garden.

Next Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, May 11, 12, and 13, addresses will be given in Westminster Abbey at four p.m. by the Bishop of Truro.

The Consistory Court of London has granted faculties for the use of the burial-grounds of Holy Trinity Church, Gray's-inn-road, and of St. John's, Clerkenwell, as recreation-grounds.

The Dean of Manchester has nominated the Rev. E. J. Reeve, Vicar of St. Peter's, Stockport, to the living of St. Alban's, Cheetwood, Manchester, rendered vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Canon Knox Little.

The election of Bampton Lecturer at Oxford University for the year 1886 took place on Tuesday, when the Rev. Dr. Bigg, of Christ Church, was selected for the appointment, which is this year held by the Ven. Archdeacon Farrar.

A morning concert was given on Monday at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, in aid of the restoration fund of St. Peter's Church, Great Windmill-street. The concert was under distinguished and Royal patronage, and an excellent programme had been compiled for the occasion.

The parish church of Rame, which overlooks the Channel from the headland to which it gives name at the entrance to Plymouth Sound, was recently reopened by the Bishop of Truro, after complete restoration at the cost of the Earl of Mount Edgcumbe, from the drawings and under the direction of Messrs. Hine and Odgers, Plymouth. The present church dates from the thirteenth century, but Norman remains have been found during the recent restoration.

Archdeacon Hobhouse and forty members of the Lower House of Convocation having presented to the Bishops a protest against the grant of land by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for two public parks in the Metropolitan district, the Archbishop of Canterbury said that the Church was bound to care not for the souls of the people only, but also for their physical and moral health. The Bishop of London said, as being extensive landowners, the Commissioners must discharge all the duties that devolved upon landowners.

The Earl of Chichester presided on Tuesday at the annual meeting of the Church Missionary Society, which was held in Exeter Hall. It was stated that the total receipts for the year had been £231,541; and the general expenditure had been £207,283, besides payments from special funds. The Committee ask for £15,000 this year, and £5000 a year rise every year afterwards. The adoption of the report was moved by the Bishop of London, who remarked that the increased means of communication between various parts of the world were a distinct call to missionary exertion.

The design of the stained-glass window which was placed in the Salisbury Cathedral last Saturday, commemorating the connection of the late Duke of Albany with Wiltshire, received the approval of the Duchess.—The parish church of Newchurch, Rossendale, has been much improved in its internal appearance by the erection of a two-light Munich stained-glass window, the work of Messrs. Mayer and Co. The subjects represented are—in one light "St. Elizabeth teaching St. John," and in the other, "Giving Alms."—The second anniversary of Lord Vernon's death was commemorated on the 1st inst. by the reopening of the parish church at Sudbury, to which a reredos and two stained-glass windows have been placed as a memorial to this much-respected nobleman.—A handsome window, executed by Headon, Butler, and Bayne, of Garrick-street, has recently been placed in the north aisle of St. Mary Magdalene Church, Munster-square, by Mr. Commissioner Kerr, in memory of his wife.—A richly painted window, from the studio of Mr. Taylor, of Berners-street, with the subject of "The Healing of Malchus," has been erected in the Church of St. Peter, Belsize Park, the gift of Mr. Charles Light, in memory of his brother, completing the series in the south aisle.—Mr. Howard Potter, of New York, on behalf of Mr. Russell Lowell, the American Minister, on Tuesday unveiled, in the parish church of Stratford-on-Avon, a Shakspeare memorial window, subscribed for by American visitors to the poet's tomb. The subjects represented in the window are Shakspeare's "Seven Ages," illustrated from the Bible. Thus the infant is represented by the finding of Moses in bulrushes, the lover by Jacob and Rachel at the well, and so on. The work has been executed in the highest style of art by a well-known London firm.

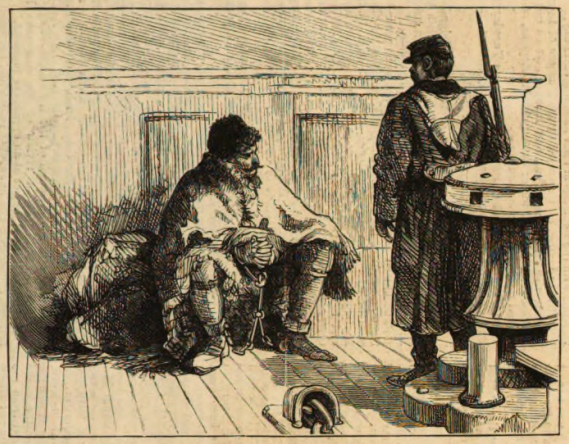
THE COURT.

Her Majesty, who is in excellent health, arrived at Windsor Castle last Saturday evening, on her return from the Continent. On the morning of Friday, May 1, the Queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, Princess Irene, and Prince Henry of Battenberg, drove to the Rosenhohe, and visited the mausoleum of the lamented Grand Duchess. In the afternoon they received the Princess of Battenberg, Princes Alexander and Francis Joseph, and Count and Countess Shoenberg. Her Majesty and the Princess afterwards drove through the principal streets of the town. The Royal party left for England at ten o'clock in the evening. The Grand Duke and the members of his family took leave of the Queen and the Princess at the railway station. On the following morning the Royal party arrived at Flushing. Her Majesty embarked on board the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, Captain Fullerton, reaching Port Victoria at 4.15 p.m., and, travelling thence by special train on the North Kent and South-Western Railways, arrived at Windsor Castle at 7.30 in the evening. Princess Beatrice and the members of her Majesty's household attended Divine service in the private chapel on Sunday morning. The Very Rev. Randall Davidson, Dean of Windsor, assisted by the Rev. Thomas J. Rowsell, Deputy Clerk of the Closet to the Queen and Canon of Westminster, officiated. The Rev. Canon Rowsell preached the sermon. Earl Granville had an audience of the Queen. Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein visited the Queen and remained to luncheon. The Duchess of Albany, with Princess Alice and the infant Duke of Albany, attended by the Hon. Mrs. R. Moreton, arrived at the castle in the afternoon from Claremont. Her Majesty went out on Monday morning. The Duchess of Albany, Princess Alice, and the infant Duke took leave of the Queen on Monday, and, attended by the Hon. Mrs. R. Moreton, left the castle shortly after two o'clock for Port Victoria, en route to Germany, where her Royal Highness is going on a visit to the Prince and Princess of Waldeck, at Arolsen. Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein dined with her Majesty in the evening. On Tuesday the new Bishops of Lincoln and Exeter arrived at Windsor Castle, and did homage to the Queen on their appointment. Earl and Countess Spencer visited the Queen at Windsor Castle, and were included in the Royal dinner party.

Official notice is given that the Prince of Wales will, by command of the Queen, hold a Levée at St. James's Palace, on behalf of her Majesty, next Monday, the 11th inst.

We are authorised to state that Drawingrooms will be held at Buckingham Palace next Wednesday, the 13th, and on Monday, the 18th inst.

Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), the Duke of Edinburgh, and Prince Christian, accompanied by his son, Prince Albert, visited the Prince and Princess of Wales at Marlborough House on Thursday week, and remained to luncheon. The Prince and Princess of Wales, accompanied by Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, were present in the afternoon at the Royal private view at the Royal Academy of Arts, Burlington House, and were received by Sir Frederick Leighton, the President, and the members of the Council. Last Saturday the Prince, accompanied by the Duke of Edinburgh, opened the subway recently constructed from the South Kensington Station to the Exhibition of Inventions. The Princess, accompanied by Prince George of Wales and suite, visited the Royal Comedy Theatre in the evening, to witness the performance of "Bad Boys." The Duchess of Albany visited the Prince and Princess of Wales. The Brazilian Minister (Baron de Penedo) presented Prince Albert Victor, in the name of the Emperor of Brazil, the order of the Southern Cross on the attainment of his Royal Highness's majority. On Sunday the Prince and Princess, and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud were present at Divine service. On Monday the Prince, in the presence of a numerous and representative assemblage, including members of the Royal family, Ambassadors, and Ministers, opened the International Exhibition of Inventions. The Prince received the Maharajah of Johore at Marlborough House in the afternoon. Prince Albert Victor has returned to Great Yarmouth, and Prince George to H.M.S. Excellent, at Portsmouth. The Prince will preside at the festival dinner in aid of the funds of the North London University College Hospital next Wednesday, May 13, at the Langham Hotel. His Royal Highness signified to the Mayor of Londonderry that he will have great pleasure in becoming an exhibitor at the Royal Agricultural Society's Show in Derry in July next, and will present a cup for competition. The Prince was last week unanimously elected a Bencher of the Honourable Society of King's Inns, Dublin. Prince Albert Victor will be called to the Bench of the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple, and will dine with the Benchers in their hall on Wednesday, June 10.



Princess Louise, accompanied by the Marquis of Lorne, on Monday visited the East-End, and inaugurated an industrial exhibition established under distinguished auspices, and also opened two small public gardens.

The Duchess of Edinburgh paid a visit on Tuesday to Mr. Bull's orchid exhibition in the King's-road, Chelsea.

The officers, past and present, of the Rifle Brigade, have appointed their annual dinner for June 5, at Willis's Rooms. In the event of the Duke of Connaught having returned from India by that date, his Royal Highness will preside.

The Queen has directed letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom, constituting the office of Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Island of Barbados and its Dependencies as a separate Government; and to appoint Sir William Robinson, K.C.M.G., at present Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Windward Islands, to be Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Island of Barbados and its Dependencies. Her Majesty has approved the appointment of Mr. Walter Joseph Seudall to be Governor of the Windward Islands of Grenada, St. Vincent, Tobago, and St. Lucia. The Assistant-Secretaryship at the Local Government Board, vacated by Mr. W. J. Sendall, has been accepted by Mr. Courtenay Boyle, one of the Inspectors of the Local Government Board.

Phonography, the most scientific and effective system of shorthand writing, which ought to be taught in schools as a universal accomplishment, is beautifully illustrated by the Reporter's Magazine. The May Number contains articles which to those who can read them present a variety of interesting literature, accompanied by small pictures and tasteful ornamental designs of an emblematic purport. We recognise a portrait of Mr. Melton Prior, our Special Artist lately in the Soudan, with a memoir of his travelling and campaigning experiences in many parts of the world. There is also a review of Mr. Mason Jackson's excellent History of the Pictorial Press, which is to us of particular interest. Mr. Archibald Forbes has something to tell of the life and work of "War Correspondents"; and a review of Mr. Augustus Hare's "Studies in Russia" comes at an opportune moment. Other articles, concerning the newspaper profession, the business of reporting, and the art and practice of phonography, will be acceptable to a large class of journalists, and to many amateurs of this useful art.

OPENING OF THE INTERNATIONAL INVENTIONS EXHIBITION AT SOUTH KENSINGTON BY THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The Prince of Wales on Monday performed the ceremony of opening this year's International Exhibition, which consists of Patents and Inventions, and of Musical Instruments, in the buildings and garden at Kensington where the Health Exhibition took place last year, and the Fisheries Exhibition the year before last. His Royal Highness was accompanied by the Princess of Wales and the young Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud. The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, with one of their children, Prince and Princess Christian, and the Duke of Cambridge, were also present. Her Majesty's Government was represented by the Home Secretary, Sir William Vernon Harcourt; and the Earl and Countess Granville, the Foreign Ambassadors, the Archbishop of York, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Mundella, and many noblemen and members of Parliament, were among the distinguished company. Their Royal Highnesses were received at the entrance, and conducted to the Council Chamber by Sir F. Bramwell, chairman; the Marquis of Hamilton, vice-chairman; Mr. Birkbeck, M.P., hon. treasurer; Mr. J. L. Bell, M.P., Sir Francis Bolton, Sir G. Grove, Mr. W. H. Preece, Sir E. J. Reed, Dr. Stainer, other members of the Executive Council; Mr. E. Cunliffe-Owen, Mr. Somers Vine, and Mr. Trueman Wood. They formed a procession and set off on a circuit of the buildings. There were no special decorations for this occasion, the exhibitors having probably had quite enough to do in getting their stands ready. The long route was lined throughout with spectators. There were occasional cheers, and continual greetings of respectful loyalty. The route of the procession was across the upper end of the Middle Court (Royal Gun Factory's exhibits) down the North Court (Engineering) across the Austria-Hungary Court and the Chemistry Court, out into the open air, then passing into the East Gallery among the printing-machines, and on past the Chinese Court to the upper end of the Eastern Arcade, and into the Conservatory, where a dais had been erected, with beautiful flowers at the sides. The Royal party stood on this dais, and heard Sir F. Bramwell read part of the Address from the Executive Council, describing the plan of the Exhibition. The Prince of Wales made an appropriate reply, in the course of which he referred to the new subway between the Exhibition Buildings and the South Kensington railway station, which was opened by his Royal Highness on Saturday. He then declared the Exhibition to be opened, and accepted a catalogue bound in crimson and gold. The procession was again formed, and the Royal visitors were conducted through the other galleries, the machinery department, the American Court, and the Old London Street, to the Prince's Pavilion; they soon afterwards left the Exhibition.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, May 5.

Parliament reassembled yesterday after a short vacation. The Chamber sat twenty minutes, and the Senate immediately adjourned until Thursday, which would seem to indicate that business is not very pressing. The great topic in the political world is M. Ribot's speech delivered last Sunday at St. Pol (Pas-de-Calais). The orator is the leader of that left-centre group of cool-headed, reasoning Republicans who, when Thiers was their chief, founded the present French Republic, who prevented the reactionary movements of 1873 and 1877, and who have constantly laboured to adapt Republican institutions to the French temperament. In his speech on Sunday M. Ribot endeavoured to prove that a monarchical restoration would be fatal, above all, to the interests which it pretended to serve. As for the Radical programme, M. Ribot will not accept either the abolition of the Senate, the separation of Church and State, the election of the magistracy, or communal autonomy—reforms which are deduced from abstract theories, and which, he thinks, would in reality lead to a constitutional breakdown and a general disorganisation of the forces of the country. M. Ribot judges the present policy of the Government to be narrow and intolerant; he demands the closing of the religious question, order in the finances, cessation (for the present) of colonial extension, and particular attention to agriculture and practical reforms. The danger is, that out of fear of Radical Utopian schemes the electors may be tempted to support the Conservatives, who on their side are organising propagandist tours in the provinces. Next Sunday M. Clémenceau will deliver a programme speech at Bordeaux, in which we shall find the Radical reply to M. Ribot's moderate platform. Henceforward, the whole interest of French politics will be centred upon the forthcoming elections. Parliament will not probably be the scene of any great battles, and by his success in promptly settling the question of the Bosphore Egyptien, M. De Freycinet has acquired sufficient prestige to carry him through to the end of the Session.

The grand and absorbing event of the week has been the opening of the Salon. This year a charge of ten francs was made for admission on varnishing day; and the proceeds, amounting to £1000, are to be devoted to the fund for the wounded in Tonquin. The Salon, which will be studied in detail in these columns by a more competent pen than mine, is of a very high average excellence; the number of immense decorative panels, destined for various public buildings in Paris and the provinces, is a novel and interesting feature. In the sculpture department, two very important works by Englishmen occupy places of honour: one is a nude bronze figure of Dryope tempted by Apollo, in the form of a serpent, by R. Barrett-Browning, the son of the poet; the other is a bronze, Hamlet with Yorick's skull, by Lord Ronald Gower.

The death is reported of General Noiset, the oldest General in the French army, at the age of ninety-three.

Mdlle. Louise Michel, who is to be pardoned together with several other political prisoners, has written to the Minister refusing absolutely to accept this pardon or to quit the prison of Saint Lazare unless all the political prisoners are pardoned at the same time.—The famous caricaturist, André Gill, died last week in the lunatic asylum at Charenton, where he had been confined for the last three years. Gill was an ardent Republican; and his caricatures were a force in the Opposition under the Empire and in the early years of the present Republic.

At Brussels on Monday morning a deputation from the Corporation of London, headed by the Lord Mayor, presented an address to the King of the Belgians, congratulating him upon the recognition of the new Congo State by the Powers. The Lord Mayor and the other members of the deputation from the City of London were entertained at lunch on Tuesday in the Hôtel de Ville, Brussels, by the Burgomaster and Aldermen of that city.

The Antwerp Exhibition was opened last Saturday by the King of the Belgians, who expressed his gratification at the realisation of a great work in the success of which he and his brother took a profound interest.

On the same day the Hungarian Exhibition at Pesth was opened by the Emperor, who remarked that so important a festival furnished a proof of national advancement.

Vesuvius has been in a state of active eruption. Last Saturday afternoon two new craters opened with great noise about a third of a mile above the station of the little railway. The streams of lava which issued flowed towards Pompeii.

The Empress of Germany has left Berlin for Baden; and the Grand Duchess of Baden has arrived at Berlin.—Dr. Nachtigal, the eminent German explorer, died on board the German gun-boat Moewe on the 24th ult.

The Emperor Francis Joseph arrived at Vienna from Pesth on Tuesday morning. Count Kalnoky followed in the evening. The members of the Diplomatic Body have all returned to Vienna from their visit to the Hungarian Exhibition.

The new Greek Ministry has been finally constituted as follows:—M. Deliyannis, Minister of Finance and Minister for Foreign Affairs ad interim; M. Zygomalos, Minister of Education; M. Papamichalopolo, Minister of the Interior; M. Antonopoulos, Minister of Justice; M. Romas, Minister of Marine; M. Mavromichali, Minister of War.

Last Sunday the nobility of Russia celebrated the centenary of their rights and privileges as granted by Catherine II. In all the principal towns of the empire the fête was kept with general accord, while at St. Petersburg and at Moscow various cerémonies, processions, and balls were arranged.

The bill for creating a public park around the American side of the Niagara Falls became law on Thursday week.—Madame Patti left for Liverpool last Saturday in the steamer Aurania.—A fire occurred in New York last Saturday night, which resulted in the death of nine persons and injuries to a number of others.—The decrease in the debt of the United States, according to the new form of the monthly statement, was 4,837,000 dols.

The Dominion Government has received a telegram stating that Riel's runners have met with no success in their endeavours to incite the Indians and half-breeds in the Qu'Appelle region to rebellion, and have returned crestfallen.—Intelligence received at Ottawa states that an engagement took place at Battleford on Sunday last between 300 Canadian troops and 600 Indians owing allegiance to the chief Poundmaker. The troops lost seven killed and twelve wounded, while the Indian loss was fifty killed and wounded.—The House of Commons rejected the Woman's Franchise Bill, after a debate lasting uninterruptedly for thirty-one hours.

The revenue returns of New South Wales for the first four months of the present year show an increase of nearly £400,000 over the corresponding period of last year. The Treasurer's estimate of a total increase of £1,500,000 for 1885 will, therefore, be more than realised. That estimate placed the revenue for 1885 at £8,480,000. Arrangements have now been fully completed for the defence of the colony against foreign attack.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, May 6.

Prospects of peace have been paramount this week, and Stock Exchange securities have considerably recovered. Consols had been as low as 94⅛, and they are now 98. All affected securities equally improved, but the prospect of peace is against such considerations as were recently supporting the American market. We are warned against too readily assuming that Russian compliance is as complete as the circumstance requires, and corrective views of that sort are no doubt useful; but in the Stock Exchange the probability of peace revives "bulls," and frightens "bears." But the currents set in motion by the fear of war are not easily turned, and money accumulates at the Bank of England at an undiminished rate.

The Budget proposals are a taste of what war means. The income tax, which is now 5d., is to be raised to 8d., the duty on beer and spirits is to be increased, the stamp duty on debentures to bearer is to be advanced from 2s. 6d. per cent to 10s., and some other changes are to be made which, as they do not directly concern business interests, do not claim notice here. The suspension of the Sinking Fund of the National Debt is, however, greatly regretted by all who have the permanent interests of the country at heart. That Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Childers should resort to such an expedient is a striking comment upon their lifelong professions and practice.

Telegrams from Ottawa in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway are to the effect that the Government have proposed to the Dominion Parliament the rearrangement of the conditions imposed by the Loan Act of last year, the rearrangement to include such further assistance as will enable the company to complete and adequately equip the road without recourse to the issue of shares or bonds. The 35,000,000 dols. unissued shares are to be cancelled, and 5 per cent bonds are to be created in lieu thereof. As regards the loan had of the Government, 20,000,000 dols. is to be secured by an equal amount of the 5 per cent bonds, and the balance is to rank, principal and interest, upon the land grant. The interest on the loan is to be reduced to 4 per cent. Further, the Government is to lend the company 5,000,000 dols. in 4 per cent Treasury bills for one year. We may assume that Parliament will agree to these proposals. In that case, the company's position on the completion of the road will be that the total charge for leased lines and interest per annum will not much exceed the net revenue which the current year is expected to yield, while the shareholders have, under the annuity arrangements, a sufficient dividend secured to them for several years.

That the Pennsylvania Railroad dividend should be 3 per cent need cause no surprise, as it is the same rate as was paid in November last, and is evidently the level intended to be observed during the present phase of business. Six per cent per annum is not a bad minimum for such times as United States railways have latterly gone through.

Mr. Eden Colville, at the meeting of the Royal Mail Steam-Ship Company, made some rather important remarks concerning the valuation of the company's fleet. The amount written off for depreciation during the year was £84,863, reducing the value to £13 8s. per ton, and Mr. Colville stated that he was not sure that their ships would realise even that figure if put on the market. This valuation, it may be maintained, is considerably below the balance-sheet value of the fleets of most of the other shipping companies, the Cunard vessels being valued at £27 and the Orient at £26 per ton.

The severe drought which prevailed for such a lengthened period last year in Australia has told severely upon agricultural pursuits, and in the case of the Scottish-Australian Investment Company the shareholders have to submit to a reduction in the dividend to 10 per cent per annum for the past half-year, against 15 per cent for the previous twelve months, and 18½ for 1882-3.

But the Australian Banks are not suffering. The National Bank of Australasia has just declared a dividend of 15 per cent per annum, and if we may judge from the steady way in which the dividend has been raised during the past ten or twelve years, we may conclude that this new rate is expected to be retained.

The Bishop of London presided on Monday at the meeting of the National Temperance League, in Exeter Hall.

Sufficient fragments have been discovered to prove that the vessel which contained the explosive used at the Admiralty a few days ago was what is known as a "stockpot" of cast iron, tinned inside and having a capacity of one gallon.

The vacancy in the headmastership of Harrow School, caused by Dr. Montagu Butler's acceptance of the Deanery of Gloucester, has been filled by the Rev. J. E. C. Welldon, M.A., Head Master of Dulwich College, and Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. The election was unanimous.

The Mansion House fund for the provision of a national memorial to General Gordon amounts to over £16,000; and a lady has just endowed for a specified period an adult bed in the London Homœopathic Hospital in memory of the character and work of General Gordon.

Mr. T. Swinburne presided on Tuesday over the annual meeting of those interested in the Royal General Theatrical Fund, in the saloon of the Lyceum Theatre. The financial statement showed that the income had amounted to £2155, and the expenditure to £2140. The balance-sheet showed that the capital account stood at £13,383.

Mr. H. H. Fowler, M.P., presided on Monday morning at the annual meeting of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, at Exeter Hall, which was crowded. The report stated that the home receipts for the year had been £121,346, and the total receipts had been £146,308. The expenditure left the society with a surplus of £18. The missionaries and assistant missionaries, including supernumeraries, numbered 287.

At a meeting of the Victoria (Philosophical) Institute on Monday evening, Professor Duns, F.R.S.E., of Edinburgh, read a paper on "The Theory of Natural Selection and the Theory of Design," in which he held that the former can never be regarded as a substitute for the latter, because it fails to give a satisfactory explanation of the differences among closely related organisms, of their gradation and succession, and of the cause of variation and reversion, and other complex phenomena. A discussion followed.

At the annual meeting of the Royal Institution of Great Britain, on May 1—the Duke of Northumberland, President, in the chair—the annual report of the Committee of Visitors for the year 1884, testifying to the continued prosperity and efficient management of the institution, was read and adopted. The real and funded property now amounts to above £35,400, entirely derived from the contributions and donations of the members. Forty-four new members paid their admission fees in 1884. Sixty-three lectures and twenty evening discourses were delivered in 1884. The books and pamphlets presented in 1884 amounted to about 276 volumes, making, with 506 volumes (including periodicals bound) purchased by the managers, a total of 782 volumes added to the library in the year.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

SECOND NOTICE.

Returning to the first room, the first picture to catch the eye is Mr. H. W. B. Davis's "Summer Twilight" (5), a flock of sheep peacefully grazing under a richly coloured sky. Just above hangs a promising work, "Ariadne Deserted by Theseus" (6), by Mrs. Rae, representing the forsaken beauty leaning against a rock, gazing in blank despair upon the sea. Another lady's picture, Miss M. Stokes's "Parting" (17), is a more homely treatment of the same sentiment: a little calf, with its legs already tied, is lying with its head on the lap of its child companion—a simple subject, treated with good taste and considerable power. Beneath it is Mr. Marcus Stone's only contribution of the year, "A Gambler's Wife" (18)—a pretty young woman in an extravagant hat, on the garden seat under a tree; in the background, on a raised terrace in front of the house (Gad's Hill, Dickens' favourite home), two children are playing in the warm sunshine of early summer, all around them seeming bright and beautiful. In another part of the garden the father is playing cards, not eagerly, but carelessly, with a few boon companions. The thought has just now, for the first time, struck the young wife that she has married a gambler, and that all the delights with which her life is now surrounded may be swept away without a word of warning. The artist translates this really dramatic idea with no little force, and has succeeded in telling a story which is none the less painful because he has concealed the thorn of the woman's life so skilfully beneath the roses. Mr. Briton Rivière's "Sheep-stealers" (24)—by its grey-green colouring, recalls in some measure the work of the late Academician, Mr. Falconer Poole; but his meaning is more easy to fathom, and the action of the sheep scampering down the hillside in the cold moonlight is excellent. Mr. Frank Holl's portrait of "General Sir Arthur Lawrence" (25), in dark-blue uniform, and Mr. J. G. Brown's "Sir Redvers Buller" (27), in scarlet, are hung as companion pictures, and the latter is worthy of the honour conferred upon him. Mr. Solomon Solomon's "Love's First Lesson" (29) will disappoint many of those who anticipated so much from this young medallist's early work. It is, nevertheless, a bold attempt to cope with a difficult treatment of the nude, and the attitude of Cupid by his mother's side is full of infantile grace. Humour is seldom wanting in Mr. Stacy Marks' work, and his "Good Story" (30), a group of middle-aged gentlemen in powdered wigs, seated round a table, is no exception; the figure of the "parson," with his elbows on the table, is the best of all. It is scarcely as highly finished as is usual with Mr. Marks, but it has more movement. We pass over Mr. F. Morgan's "Ring a Ring of Roses" (32), Mr. Markham Skipworth's "Ready to Start" (35), Mr. Ernest Parton's "Streatley-on-Thames" (40) with regret, and can only say a short word of commendation of Mr. C. H. Macartney's poetic rendering of "Dartmoor" (51) in the twilight. Of Mr. J. E. Hodgson's huge canvas "Don Quixote and the Galley-Slaves" (39), we fail to appreciate either the humour or the technical skill. It does its best to travesty both Nature and Cervantes' hero, and to convey to the mind no reasonable suggestion of the one or the other. Mr. Dicksee's "Chivalry" (53), which, with apparently grim humour, has been hung as a pendant to Mr. Hodgson's "Don Quixote," is a painful effort to revive Venetian colouring. A girl in a rich blue dress, half torn from her body, is bound to a tree, and at a little distance a knight in full armour is placidly wiping the sword with which he has just slain another knight who is lying on the ground. Through the trees a green mystic light struggles with the natural tints of the setting sun, throwing a very unearthly glamour over the scene. It is a pity that Mr. Dicksee cannot curb his somewhat exuberant fancy, and return to the ways where he won his spurs.

Mr. Bernard Cameron's "Portrait of a Lady" (58), in a black dress on a dark ground, is very graceful in pose and strong in execution; whilst Mr. Frith's "Portrait of Mrs. Alfred Pope" (66), a lady in black velvet, a profusion of white lace and a red rose in her hair, at once clever and vulgar, is in painful contrast with Mr. Orchardson's quiet, dignified "Portrait of Mrs. Ralli" (72), also dressed in black, just relieved by her lace lappets and the roll of blue knitting. Mr. Yeames' "Prisoners of War" (67), two young middies brought ashore at a French port, and the object of mingled curiosity and pity on the part of the fisher men and women, cannot fail to be popular. The two boys—one defiant, the other a little sobered by his wound—are seated on some casks, under the guard of a huge gendarme. The fisher-folk are gathering round them; and one little girl is advancing in a simple yet coquettish way towards the boy scarcely bigger than herself, and seems anxious to throw over him her protecting power. The other works of this room which are worthy of notice are Mr. Peter Graham's "Evening" (73), Mr. G. A. Storey's "As Good as Gold" (78), and, among the younger artists, Mr. Frank Calderon's "Driving a Bargain" (60)—horses at a village inn; Mr. W. Dixon Galpin's "Beatrice" (74)—a girl amongst flowers, very delicately coloured; M. Fantin's portrait of "Miss Budgett" (83), in a yellow dress; and Miss Dacre's "Passion-Flower" (86)—the study of a large-eyed sallow girl, sketched with a firm hand, and displaying considerable promise.

In the second gallery Mr. Fred. Brown again shows in "Our Playground" (92) that there are plenty of subjects worthy of the artist to be found in London streets, and especially on the Chelsea Embankment; and it is a somewhat abrupt transition to "Norway and the Sogne Fiord" (93), of which and its precipitous rocks descending into the grey water Mr. Normann has made such a careful study. Mr. E. Long's "Gunga" (100) is a repetition of one of those rich-blooded ladies who by turns have served as Syrians, Jewesses, or Egyptians, and who, decked with barbaric jewellery, inhabit palaces adorned with strange hieroglyphics; and one turns with relief to Mr. Burgess' touch of real life (106), a young Spanish girl attended by her duenna, issuing from church, and assailed by the clamorous appeals of half-a-dozen licensed beggars, embodying all the woes which flesh is heir to. Mr. Briton Rivière is scarcely so happy in "After Naseby" (107) as in some of his other works. It represents a room in a Cavalier's country house; the mistress has just received the news of the fatal fight, and, bent over the table, is giving vent to her feelings, sure only of the fidelity and secresy of the two little dogs, watching her with obvious sympathy. It might be an interesting question whether the breed of King Charles' spaniels was known in this country before the Restoration—our own impression being that they were first introduced from Holland, if not still later by Louise de Quérouailles from France. To return, however, to the pictures. Mr. J. Henry's "Flemish Pastures" (151) and Mr. J. Prinsep Beadle's "In the Pas de Calais" (105) have in common a sense of fresh air and an appreciation of sunlight not often met among our younger artists; and Mr. F. Markham Skipworth, another newcomer, who sends a "Portrait of Madame Campione" (108), deserves special notice. It represents a young and pretty woman, full face, dressed in a white satin dress trimmed with swan's-down, with a white rug at her back, and a white wall beyond—an admirable display of technical skill and harmonious colouring. Mr. John F. Faed is another instance of an Academician's son giving good promise. His "Bleak North-easter" (112) does not attempt more than the artist is able to achieve: the grey sky and murky sea, with the waves breaking angrily on the rocks, are rendered with very great truth and feeling. Mr. Herkomer's "The Earl of Ducie" (119) and Mr. Holl's "Rev. Henry Latham" (119), happily act as derivatives to Mr. H. T. Wells's glaring and uninteresting panorama of "Purbeck, and its Quarrymen" (120). The two portraits serve to show the special attributes of their respective artists, and in each case they display repose and reserved force. Two works by Mr. J. C. Hook, "The Stream" (140) and "After Dinner, Rest Awhile" (146), a flock of cormorants resting after their mid-day meal on the seaweed-covered shore, are more free from the artist's peculiarities than usual, and are not for that cause less attractive. Mr. G. D. Leslie's "Language of Flowers" (141), two girls on a sofa with a basket of flowers on the ground, is one of those very carefully composed, carefully painted, meaningless works with which Mr. George Leslie is now willing to rest content: in contrast to Mr. Vicat Cole, who, in "Iffley Mill" (135), with its rushing rain-cloud and poplars shivering in the wind, is anxious to show that he can, when he likes, get beyond sunny corn-fields and wide-spreading wealds. Miss Alice Havers' "Divided" (134), Mr. Dendy Sadler's "Salad" (136), Mr. J. Faed's "Merely by Accident" (150), and Mr. Merritt's "Eve" (176)—in the first moment of horror-stricken remorse—are among the other most noteworthy works of this room.

Of the principal attractions of the third gallery we spoke in the previous article; for it is here naturally that one looks for the "pictures of the year." But a more careful inspection very often shows that a good many to which space is accorded belong to a very remote period, whilst others are so rewarded more on account of the size or subject of their pictures than for their artistic merit. Among the former we should place Mr. Goodall's mystical work (165), Mr. Sidney Cooper's "Fallen Oak" (159), Mr. Frith's "John Knox at Holyrood" (195) singularly deficient in either force or grace; Mr. Herbert's "Sheepfold" (220), and Mr. Horsley's daughters (287); and amongst the latter category such productions as Mr. Hicks's full-length portrait of "Mrs. Crosbie" (160), and its companion, Mr. John Collier's "Sir Thomas and Lady Boughey" (187), Mr. Lorimer's "Lord Reay" (238), and the like. Happily, all are not of the same calibre, and we turn with pleasure to such works as Mr. Frank Holl's triad of portraits, "The ex-Speaker of the House of Commons" (213), in his robes and wig, flanked on one side by "Lord Dufferin" (211) and on the other by "Dr. Weir Mitchell, of Philadelphia" (219), perhaps one of the most successful of Mr. Holl's productions. Dr. Weir is seated in an easy attitude, his legs crossed, and dressed in ordinary blue coat, with a light overcoat. Lord Dufferin is represented standing, three-quarter length, in a fur coat, with the ribbon and badge of the Order of St. Patrick just appearing. There is wanting in Lord Dufferin's expression just that sense of flexibility combined with firmness, which strikes everyone who knows the states-man's real face; but in the figure of the ex-Speaker, Mr. Holl has been more successful, catching that quiet, self-possessed dignity which distinguished him during his long tenure of office. In the full-length portrait of "Mr. Wilson Barrett as Hamlet" (203) Mr. Holl has, like his model, been anxious to get away from Kemble and Sir Thomas Lawrence, and with the similar result of producing something very commonplace in conception and very admirable in execution. Sir F. Leighton and Mr. Watts contribute two three-quarter length figures of young girls, which naturally suggest comparison. The President's anonymous lady (125), "serenely wandering in a trance of sober thought," is dressed in various shades of blue; whilst "Miss Laura Gurney" (201) is conspicuous by her red cloak trimmed with fur; and were it not for the force with which the face is painted, the costume would altogether eclipse the wearer. Mr. Watts, however, is too consummate an artist to make this blunder; and the result is that his work, conceived in a fuller key than the President's, places the latter, with its delicate shades, at a considerable disadvantage. The other portraits of this room are, by Mr. Oakes, those of "Mrs. Bruce" (177), very stately, and with far more character than he has displayed of late; "Dr. Kennedy" (164), wanting altogether in that bright humorous look of the original; "The Bishop of Worcester" (240), and "The Rev. Montague Taylor" (247), a pleasant florid face; that of "Mr. David Carmichael" (255), by Mr. Wells; and of "Mr. Orchar" (185), by Mr. Pettie; and especially Mr. Farquharson's very graceful "Portrait of a Lady" (283) in a black dress, on a dark background, and only relieved by a single red feather. Mr. Farquharson has here struck a new vein, which he will not fail to find profitable, but we shall be sorry to lose him from the fields and moorlands where he has done so much good work. The two little companion pictures, "Lady Peggy Primrose" (275), by Mr. Millais, and "Lady Sibyl Primrose" (281), by Sir F. Leighton, though doubtless admirable likenesses, belong to almost a distinct range of art. In point of comparison, one cannot hesitate to award the preference to Mr. Millais' work as a type of real child life. The President's suggests already the young lady of fashion with her smooth hair, painfully neat dress, and best company manners; but Lady Peggy, worthy of her name, seems ready for a romp at any moment, and careless of the disorder in which she may be discovered. Mr. Faed returns to a style he once cultivated with so much success, and once more shows us the inside of a peasant's cottage, "When the Children are Asleep" (225), and their mother is deep in getting a few minutes quiet reading. The scene is a homely one, and the sentiment healthy; but one is inclined to ask whence, in the arrangement of a lowly cottage life, is the light obtained, since the careful mother has blown out the candle which hangs on the wall beside her. Mr. Wyllie's "Storm and Sunshine" (264) strives to reproduce a wellnigh impossible effect—a passing ray of sunlight on a ship's side, whilst all the rest of the hull and surrounding water is lashed by wind and rain. Sir John Gilbert's "Standard-Bearer" (269), in his buff leathern jerkin and steel breast-plate, seems a familiar figure, but one we are always glad to welcome; but Mr. Calderon's "Andromeda" (295), on a rock half covered by foam, is an honest attempt to deal originally with a familiar subject. In the details of his work—the white foam, the deep blue sea, and the flowing hair—Mr. Calderon displays both power and feeling, and the attitude of Andromeda is particularly graceful.

The drawings engraved and printed on two pages of our Supplement half-sheet represent the designs of some of the pictures in this year's Exhibition of the Royal Academy. Those of Mr. Marcus Stone, "A Gambler's Wife"; Mr. S. E. Waller, "Outward Bound"; Mr. Carrington, "Hamlet and Polonius"; and Mr. Stanhope Forbes, "A Fish Sale on Newlyn Beach," are the property of Messrs. Dowdeswell and Dowdeswell, fine-art publishers, New Bond-street, who intend to publish fine engravings of these pictures. We are indebted also to Messrs. Paul and Dominic Colnaghi, of Pall-mall East, for permission to copy the picture of "The First Step," by Mr. G. H. Swinstead, which has been purchased by them from the artist.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

The silver lining to the war cloud brightened the prospect on Monday; and that most sensitive financial barometer, the Stock Exchange, at once recorded the change. Consols, Russians, English railways, and all kinds of stock went up directly. Nevertheless, the Government, though naturally hopeful that the Arbitration agreed upon may result in a pacific settlement of the differences between Russia and England, wisely persevere with the Vote of Credit for Eleven Millions. Experience has proved that it is one thing to issue military orders from St. Petersburg, but quite another thing to get them obeyed to the letter by the independent and adventurous Russian Commanders on the frontier of Afghanistan. Meanwhile, pending the return to London of Sir Peter Lumsden and Colonel Stewart and Mr. Stephen, her Majesty's Ministers have had the opportunity of securing accurate information as to the topography of Penjdeh, Pul-i-Khisti, and of the adjacent country from the Special Artist of the Illustrated London News with the English Commission, Mr. William Simpson, who was consulted immediately on his arrival in the metropolis.

Earl Granville and Mr. Gladstone made the Arbitration arrangement known to the Lords and Commons in almost identical terms on Monday. But the Prime Minister's statement was the more explicit. Mr. Gladstone prefaced what he had to say on the Russian question by a quiet explanation of the satisfactory settlement with France of the little difficulty arising out of the illegal manner in which Nubar Pasha had suppressed the Bosphore Egyptien, at Cairo. As an amende, the ruffled feathers of the Gallic Consul would be smoothed by the Egyptian authorities, and the owners of the Bosphore Egyptien would be allowed to reopen the printing office. A distinct diplomatic victory for M. De Freycinet!

Ministerial cheers greeted Mr. Gladstone's opening words respecting the resumption of friendly relations with Russia in regard to the awkward Afghan frontier disagreement. The gist of the arrangement was that the British and Russian Governments "are ready to refer to the judgment of the Sovereign of a friendly State any differences which may be found to subsist in regard to the interpretation of the agreement between the two Cabinets on March 16, with a view to the settlement of the matter in a mode consistent with the honour of both States. . . . . The two Governments are prepared, under these circumstances, to resume at once their communications in London on the delimitation of the Afghan frontier—on the main points of the line. The details of that line would be examined and traced on the spot by the Commission, on the conditions agreed upon. This negotiation, of which it would be quite premature in me to anticipate the result, will be much facilitated as regards her Majesty's Government by the more full and exact knowledge which, since the meeting at Rawul Pindi, they have possessed of the views of the Ameer on the points of the frontier, and likewise by topographical information which has reached the India Office. I may also say, on another point of interest, that the Russian Government have expressed their willingness to consider as to the removal of the Russian outposts when the Commissioners meet."

The inevitable "heckling" of the Premier over, Lord Randolph Churchill, the instant the Vote of Credit resolution came up for reconsideration, most inaptly and unreasonably declared "the Government of the Queen have made a base and cowardly surrender." A curious accusation, surely, when Mr. Gladstone persisted in his demand for the Eleven Millions in order to be prepared for War if we should, unfortunately, be driven into it by Russia! Mr. Henry Labouchere was, on his side, quite consistent in moving that the vote be reduced by four millions, for the calmly and serenely philosophic member for Northampton has no belief in the alleged Russian designs upon India. By a majority of 50—79 against 29 votes—did the House negative Mr. Labouchere's proposal. Mr. Trevelyan and Mr. Gladstone had then no difficulty in warding off the attacks of Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett and Mr. A. J. Balfour; and lively exchanges succeeded between Mr. Gibson and Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Chaplin, Sir Stafford Northcote, and the Marquis of Hartington. The Opposition voted repeatedly for the adjournment of the debate, and was in a minority of 67 at the first division. In vain for a time did Mr. Gladstone stoutly maintain the urgent need of granting the vote for high Imperial purposes. Not till the small hours was the Vote of Credit at last carried by 130 against 20 votes.

Earl Delawarr's interposition as self-chosen leader of the Opposition gave rise to good-natured banter on the part of Earl Granville and the Marquis of Salisbury in the House of Lords, on Tuesday. But the Lower House was again the centre of most interest. There, apropos of Mr. Gladstone's statement that Sir Peter Lumsden and Colonel Stewart would return to London to take part in the delimitation conference, the Opposition sought to make capital by implying that the Government had submitted to a humiliating arrangement. The Premier was also very much pressed for papers, which cannot yet be supplied. In the course of the miscellaneous conversation, Mr. Gladstone parenthetically mentioned that "Communications have taken place between Lord Dufferin and the Ameer, and the whole matter assumes quite a different aspect." For the sake of the right hon. gentleman's peace of mind, it was, perhaps, lucky the Redistribution of Voters Bill came up for discussion. Sir Massey Lopes moved an amendment, to the effect that local rates should not be burdened with the expenses of the said registration, and secured so much support that he was only placed in a minority of three—his resolution being defeated by 240 against 237 votes. After the division, the House went into Committee on the measure.

Mr. Childers's portentous Budget was unfolded at wearisome length on the last evening in April. Why public time could not be saved by the circulation among members of tables of the statistics the Chancellor of the Exchequer has to present is a riddle. Briefly put, the Budget foreshadowed a total estimated expenditure for the ensuing year of £88,872,000, which, with the Eleven Millions Vote of Credit, totalled the good round sum of £99,872,000—or, close upon a Hundred Millions sterling! Comparing the estimated revenue with this colossal expenditure, there would be a total deficit of £14,932,000—"the largest deficit which has been placed before the House of Commons since the Crimean War." At the close of his protracted speech, Mr. Childers thus epitomised his proposals:—

> The net deficit, calculating the income tax at 5d., is £14,912,000. We propose to intercept the action of the Sinking Fund by £4,000,000, to raise the income tax to 8d., producing £5,413,000; to alter death duties, thus raising £300,000; and to impose a duty on corporate properties of £150,000. The increase in the spirit duty [2s. a gallon] will probably be £900,000, on the beer duty [1s. per barrel] £750,000, and the minor changes to which I have referred will produce £100,000, making a total of £12,113,000, and leaving a deficit of £2,812,000 to be met by a similar sinking fund operation during the coming year.

Sir Stafford Northcote's amiable criticism did not influence Lord Randolph Churchill, who, with much pugnacity and animation, reminded the Premier of his thrifty precepts in Midlothian. Albeit Mr. Childers's resolutions were agreed to, it may be mentioned that the licensed victualling trade is up in arms against the new taxes on beer and spirits.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

Mr. J. L. Toole has turned the Japanese mania to excellent account at his merry little theatre. The "Great Tay-Kin," as the slight extravaganza is called, is not, as everybody expected it would be, a good-natured parody of the Gilbert-Sullivan opera at the Savoy, but merely a bright vaudeville written by Mr. Arthur Law, musically illustrated by the popular George Grossmith, and that has for its scene the Japanese Village down at Knightsbridge, that since the play was produced has unfortunately been burned to the ground. What is sauce for the goose is never sauce for the gander in matters dramatic. Mr. Wyndham and others, whenever they venture to draw their material from the French theatres, are invariably taken to task on account of the "motive" on which the majority of these plays are based. It grievously shocks our critical Chadbands when on the stage they observe a husband escaping from the fetters of a termagant wife, or the peace of the domestic household in any way disturbed. Now, no one would for a moment suspect Mr. Arthur Law, the mainstay of the German Reed entertainment, of using his talent for anything but a healthy purpose, or would select Mr. Toole's theatre, that pure home of honest comedy and farce, as the place where anything vicious in dramatic literature could be found. Perish the thought! And yet it has not been pointed out, with any amount of virtuous indignation, that the hero of the new farce is actually a married man, who at a ball at the Kensington Townhall appoints to meet one of his pretty partners at the Japanese Village, forgetting for the moment that his wife might not consider such a line of conduct wholly praiseworthy on his part. As a matter of fact she does not, for Mrs. Gandy pursues her husband in the person of the terrified Mr. Toole, and forces him to dress up as a conjuror in order to escape from the clutches of his indignant spouse. Such things are admissible in all farces. They hurt no one, and even the young "lady of fifteen" would not blush to see Mr. Toole, gorgeously arrayed, flirting with Miss Linden in the Japanese Village, posing as a bigamist in the most audacious fashion, and only earning marital reconciliation after having discovered that honest Mrs. Gandy is almost as skittish as her better half. As yet, no anathemas have fallen on the devoted head of Mr. Toole for enacting a highly comic Lothario, but on the other hand he has been generously thanked for a most amusing and characteristic performance. Mr. E. D. Ward and Miss Emily Thorne sing some capital songs and duets; Mr. Toole has, of course, more than one comic solo; and the play is further enlivened by a very clever conjuring performance by a pretty young lady attired in a Japanese costume. Mr. H. J. Byron's unfinished play, that has been completed by Mr. J. Ashby Sterry, is in active rehearsal, and will be the next important production at Mr. Toole's theatre.

The gentlemen of the modern pit certainly settle their differences with theatrical managers in a far more courteous fashion than did their ancestors. Everyone must have been struck with the good sense that prevailed at the Lyceum on the evening of Mr. Henry Irving's first appearance after his American tour—an evening, also, on which the experiment of a "booked pit" was tried for the first time at that theatre. If we were to believe all we hear about "first-night wreckers," and gangs and cliques and organisations and "pit rowdyism," it is quite certain that the performance of "Hamlet" would not have passed off as quietly as it did. As was proved afterwards, there were hundreds present who entertained a very strong feeling on the pit question; but they never allowed their voices to be heard until the correct moment. Mr. Irving received a splendid welcome home; Miss Ellen Terry was cheered to the echo; the play was listened to with earnest attention; and it was not until the close of the manager's speech that the pent-up feelings of the pit poured forth, and "a scene" occurred of a very remarkable kind. It was literally "a house divided against itself," and Mr. Irving stood, patiently, the buffer between the rival factions of "new pit" and "old pit." It is extraordinary to some that there should possibly be two opinions on an innovation designed for the convenience of the public, and which has cost the manager a great deal of money. The new pit at the Lyceum, luxuriously cushioned and fitted, is the cheapest form of entertainment in the metropolis. Nowhere can such a good entertainment be enjoyed in greater comfort. Although it is never well to "look a gift-horse in the mouth," there are some practical difficulties in the way that do not concern the general public, but disturb the equanimity of the "first-nighter." This enthusiastic individual, who takes such an active and unselfish interest in the drama, has been in the habit of taking his place at the pit doors some hours before the performance begins on every evening of a new theatrical performance, and has thereby obtained a coveted seat. To this he did not object. He finds now that he has to suffer the same kind of inconvenience in order to book a seat, only the temporary struggle is transferred from five o'clock in the afternoon to five o'clock in the morning! For the first night of "Hamlet" there was just as great a crowd to book seats as there used to be to get into the pit, and it is urged that cock-crow is not a comfortable hour for squeezing for tickets. Presumably, this difficulty can easily be got over by the management, for Mr. Irving has generously said that all he wants to do is to please his patrons, and he has before now distinctly recognised the generous support he has received from the pit. There is also rankling in the mind of the "first-nighter" the fear that a booked pit may, in some theatres, mean a packed pit, and a dread lest the actor should lose the enthusiasm and the pulse of sympathy that come from theatre-goers who sacrifice considerable comfort for their pleasure. However, time, that works wonders, will settle the question one way or another. If the new pit is not popular, it is easy enough to go back to the old. A very popular compromise to the majority of first-nighters would be to allow places to be booked for every night except the first night. But this is exactly the night that the manager requires to be free from excitement, and the very time when he hopes for quiet and order, considering that the play is on its trial and the actors are extremely nervous. Mr. Irving behaved with admirable tact, and concluded a successful evening with one of the happiest quotations I ever remember to have heard as an impromptu. "So, gentlemen, with all my love I do commend me to you: and what so poor a man as Hamlet is may do to express his love and friending to you, God willing, shall not lack!" This sentence secured peace instantly; indeed, I would go so far as to say it settled the question. Never has Henry Irving played Hamlet so well. He delighted even those who are opposed to his method. He has come back from America a far better actor than when he left us, and these revivals will now acquire a new interest. Ellen Terry, younger and brighter than ever, played Ophelia with the old charm, and the whole company appears to have returned full of vigour and eager for work in the old country.

Saturday next is to be a great day at Oxford University. The once celebrated Philothespian Wandering Dramatic Club has blossomed forth into the Oxford University Dramatic Society, which select body, under the direct sanction of the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of Houses, will play the first part of Shakspeare's "King Henry the Fourth" at the Oxford Townhall. Mr. A. Bourchier, the leading spirit of Oxford theatricals, and an excellent actor to boot, is cast for Harry Hotspur, and the characters of Lady Mortimer and Mrs. Quickly will be taken by Lady Edward Spencer Churchill and Lady St. Leonards. Mr. Godwin has passed the scenery and dresses as "archæologically correct"; and it is believed that the Vice-Chancellor, Mr. Jowett, Mr. John Ruskin, and many other celebrated people, will be present. Mr. Henry Irving has half promised to go down to the morning performance on May 12.

The "Matinée fever" has already set in with extra severity. Dr. Sebastian Evans, a scholar and a writer of pure, nervous English, attracted by the brilliancy of Pailleron's comedy, "Le Monde où l'on s'ennuie," has been undeceived in his idea that the public is attracted by plays that are more celebrated for their dialogue than their action, and has unfortunately handed over his clever work to the tender mercies of some well-intentioned but inexperienced amateurs. The result at a Gaiety matinée was disappointing to those who can appreciate the wit of Pailleron and the literary skill of Dr. Evans. Elsewhere, trial-trips have been made of plays burning for a public hearing. The "Great Pink Pearl," written by Mr. Carton and Mr. Cecil Raleigh, and the "Road to Fame," a German comedy, have been produced, respectively, at the Olympic and the Vaudeville with more or less success. It is impossible that full justice can be done to these tentative efforts. They are seldom well rehearsed and often badly cast, and the result is seldom satisfactory. C. S.

MUSIC.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY, DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

Mr. A. Goring Thomas's new opera, "Nadeshda," was given for the third and fourth times last week, and on Saturday evening, his earlier work, "Esmeralda," was performed for the first and only time this season. It (like "Nadeshda") was commissioned specially by Mr. Carl Rosa, and was first brought out, also at Drury-Lane Theatre, in 1883. Last Saturday's cast was almost identical with that of previous occasions; having included Madame Georgina Burns in the title-character, Mr. B. McGuckin as Phœbus de Chateaupers, Mr. Ludwig as Claude Frollo, Mr. B. Davies as Gringoire, Mr. L. Crotty as Quasimodo, and Mr. Snazelle as the King of the Beggars. The opera—skilfully conducted by Mr. Randegger—was favourably received throughout.

The specialty of this week was the production on Thursday, for the first time in London, of the English version of M. Massenet's "Manon," which was brought out by Mr. Carl Rosa's Company at the Court Theatre, Liverpool, last January, when, as again here, Madame Marie Roze sustained the title-character, Mr. Maas having been cast for the part of the Chevalier Des Grieux in the Drury-Lane performance of the work. Of this we must speak next week. "Nadeshda" was announced for the sixth, seventh, and eighth times during this week.

In consequence of the favourable reception of "Esmeralda" last Saturday, it is to be given again next week.

The Crystal Palace inaugurated the summer season by a grand concert in the Handel orchestra last Saturday afternoon, when Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given with fine effect by an augmented band and a chorus of about six hundred voices, Madame Valleria, Miss M. Fenna, and Mr. E. Lloyd having been the solo vocalists. The second part of the concert consisted of a miscellaneous selection, in which the same solo singers appeared. Mr. Manns conducted.

Señor Sarasate gave the second of his four grand orchestral concerts at St. James's Hall last Saturday afternoon, when his finished and brilliant violin performances were heard in Beethoven's concerto, and smaller pieces by Giuraud and the executant. The concert included orchestral works rendered by a full band, conducted by Mr. W. G. Cusins. The third concert takes place next Monday afternoon.

The second of the new series of Richter concerts at St. James's Hall, took place on Monday evening, when very fine performances of more or less familiar orchestral pieces were given.

The Royal Amateur Orchestral Society gave a concert at the Royal Albert Hall last Saturday evening, when the programme included a violin solo by the Duke of Edinburgh, piano solos by Mrs. Beddington, Romberg's Toy Symphony, and vocal pieces by Miss F. Hipwell and Mr. Isidore De Lara. Mr. G. Mount conducted. The performances were given in aid of the funds of St. Michael and All Angels', North Kensington.

The fifth concert, and last but one of the present season, of the Philharmonic Society took place during this week. The programme comprised Dvorák's pianoforte concerto in G (Herr F. Rummel being the pianist), a selection from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" music, and other more familiar items.

The 147th anniversary festival of that excellent institution the Royal Society of Musicians took place at St. James's Hall last Thursday evening, when the eminent baritone, Mr. Santley, was announced to preside.

Madame Jenny Viard-Louis, the eminent pianist, gave the first of her third series of performances of Beethoven's music at Prince's Hall on Thursday week.

That accomplished pianist Mdlle. Klecberg announced a recital for this (Saturday) afternoon at St. James's Hall.

Mr. Charles Hallé will begin a new series of his interesting "Chamber-Music Concerts" at Prince's Hall this (Saturday) afternoon.

The miscellaneous concerts of the week have also included those of Miss A. Goodwin (pianist), Misses A. Hickling and B. Watson (violinist and pianist), Mr. Sinclair Dunn (vocalist), Mr. G. Gear (pianist), Mr. W. Nicholl (vocalist), and Madame Dukas's pupils.

The conversazione by which the Sacred Harmonic Society supplements its concert season was to take place yesterday (Friday) evening at Prince's Hall, and in the adjoining galleries of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours.

Mr. Geaussent's choir will give an interesting concert at St. James's Hall next Wednesday evening, when a "Patriotic Hymn," composed by Herr Anton Dvorák, will be performed for the first time, conducted by the composer; the programme comprising also Mr. Mackenzie's cantata, "Jason," and the finale from Mendelssohn's unfinished opera, "Loreley." A full band and chorus are engaged, and Madame Albani, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley will be the solo vocalists.

Madame Frickenhaus and Herr Joseph Ludwig will resume their chamber concerts next Thursday evening at Prince's Hall.

A Ballé commemoration concert is to be given at the Royal Albert Hall on May 27, in which Madame Nilsson, Madame Minnie Hauk, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Foli, and Mr. Joseph Maas, with a full band and chorus under the direction of Mr. W. G. Cusins, will take part.

Miss A. Wilson's soirée dramatique d'invitation took place on Wednesday, at the Cavendish Rooms, the programme including "The Happy Pair," "Our Bitterest Foe," and scenes from "The School for Scandal."

MAP OF THE BRITISH POSSESSIONS.

A Map of the World, "on Mercator's Projection," showing all the British Possessions coloured Red, with statistical tables of their population, revenue, import and export trade, and the distance of their chief ports from England, is presented for this week's Extra Supplement to the Illustrated London News. The British Red covers a vast space of the land surface of the globe, and so does the Russian Yellow; but we might cut off all the breadth of North America and North Asia above the 60th degree of latitude, excluding the larger proportion of territory belonging to the two Empires in those regions, without much affecting their influence over human civilisation. It is true that shores and seas near the Arctic Circle may be valuable for their whaleries, sealeries, and fisheries, and for the furs and other animal products supplied by lands whose climate forbids the cultivation of the soil; but for political and social considerations the temperate zones north and south of the Equator contain all that need be taken into account. India, the greatest in population of the dependencies of this realm, has a semi-tropical position in geography, and is thereby capable of more variety of productions, in more abundance, than perhaps any other country on earth; yet China, with the Annamese, Siamese, and Burmese States of Eastern Asia, is scarcely less favoured in this respect, viewed together as a distinct region. Wealth and power, in general, depend on the numbers and the faculties of the population, and not at all on the extent of territory. Queen Victoria, as Empress of India, has 198,790,853 subjects under the direct rule of her Government, while the Native Indian States protected or controlled by her Empire contain 55,150,456 other people. This is a great fact in the present condition of mankind; but a fact of greater importance for the future of the English nation is the situation of our principal Colonies, in North America and in Australasia, just in those latitudes where nature invites and fosters the vigorous growth and multiplication of our race. The Canadian Dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, stretching across the Western Continent at its widest part, is already the home of nearly five millions of people, as strong in character as any in the world; the colonies of Australia and New Zealand, reckoned altogether, have above three millions; and there are a quarter of a million of European race in the South African colonies. It is probable that the total English population of those countries, judging by the example of the United States of America, will amount to something like fifty millions at the end of fifty years from this time. We need not speculate very anxiously upon their political destinies, for they will assuredly take good care of their own welfare, and require none of our advice.

The remainder of the British colonies and dependencies may be divided into three different classes; namely, such as were anciently styled "plantations," where tropical produce, sugar and coffee for instance, is cultivated by negro or other fit labour, for the profit of European proprietors; secondly, commercial marts and ports, at the maritime gateways of the most productive foreign regions; and thirdly, naval and military stations, the sites of which should be chosen with a view to the protection of commerce. Upon grounds of true national policy, no remote territorial possession that is not capable of answering one of these three useful purposes can be worth its cost; but there are very few existing British possessions of which the negative can be affirmed. The British West Indies, including the islands and the territory of Demerara, or British Guiana, on the South American continent, Mauritius, Ceylon, the Borneo Settlements, and the Fiji Islands, are comprised in the first class, that of plantation colonies. The settlements on the West Coast of Africa, the Malacca Straits Settlements—of which Singapore is the chief, a place of immense value to our trade—and Hong-Kong, the key of English interests in China, with several other places familiar enough to the mercantile world, come under the second head; and there is a just demand that the safety of these places shall be ensured by sufficient provision for their naval and military defence. In the third class of British possessions, which should be maintained especially for the security of those above enumerated, and of our immense traffic on the high seas, we have the naval and military establishments of Bermuda, in the Atlantic Ocean; Halifax, in Nova Scotia, and some in the West Indies; Gibraltar, Malta, and Cyprus, in the Mediterranean and in the Levant; Aden, at the entrance to the Red Sea; Simon's Bay, at the Cape; Sierra Leone, Ascension, and St. Helena; Mauritius and Trincomalee, in the Indian Ocean; Hong-Kong, for the Chinese archipelago; and for the vast Pacific Ocean, very inadequate provision at Sydney, and a neglected dockyard at Esquimalt, Vancouver Island. We do not hesitate to say that the deficiency of fortifications, of garrisons, and of accommodation for naval forces, with the fewness and defencelessness of the coaling stations, in the Indian Ocean, in the Chinese seas, and in the Pacific, exposes British interests to extreme danger in case of war. The necessity of providing a remedy for this state of affairs is quite as urgent as that of strengthening the British fleet; and twenty millions sterling judiciously bestowed upon it would be money well laid out.

The Earl and Countess of Aberdeen opened the eighth Home for Working Boys in Whitehead's-grove, Chelsea, last Saturday.

There is an excellent programme for May at the Royal Victoria Hall and Coffee Tavern, Waterloo Bridge-road.

His Highness Abdul Rahman Khan, Ameer of Afghanistan and its Dependencies, has been appointed an Honorary Knight Grand Commander of the Order of the Star of India.

The anniversary dinner of the Royal Literary Fund took place at Willis's Rooms, on Wednesday; Lord John Manners, M.P., occupying the chair.

The Earl of Dartmouth opened last Saturday the new public swimming-baths at Dartmouth-road, Forest-hill, erected by the Baths Commissioners at a cost of £9000.

The annual ball in aid of the funds of the Popular Ballad Concert Committee will be held this year under Royal patronage on Monday, June 8, at Kensington Townhall; and the Royal Caledonian ball will take place on June 22, at Willis's Rooms.

We gave some Illustrations of the triumphal arches in the city of Belfast on the occasion of the Royal visit. Those in Glengall-place and in York-street were constructed by Messrs. S. Wilson and Co., of Belfast, who also supplied the decorations for some of the public buildings.

Mrs. Henry Lee, of Savile-row, Burlington-gardens, will give an "At Home" next Tuesday, and during the evening Dr. Samuel Kinns, F.R.A.S., author of "Moses and Geology," will lecture upon The Harmony of the Bible with Science, illustrated with numerous diagrams and geological specimens. A distinguished company is expected.

It is mentioned, in the account of the war in the Soudan that huts are now being erected for the troops remaining at Souakim. Messrs. David P. Moir and Co., of the Willesden Paper and Canvas Depôt, Cannon-street, have received from the War Office an order for 10,000 yards of 54-inch Willesden roofing. This material is weather-proof, a non-conductor of heat, and never harbours vermin; while it is much lighter and easier to fix than corrugated iron.

BURNING OF THE JAPANESE VILLAGE.

On Saturday morning, unfortunately when the London season is beginning, and all the pleasant novelties in town are eagerly visited by crowds of sightseers, the pretty model of a Japanese village at Kensington was destroyed by an accidental fire. We lately gave some description and a few Sketches of this interesting establishment, which was the property of Mr. Tannaker Buhicrosan, and was erected at the back of Humphreys' Hall, nearly opposite the Guards' Barracks in the Knightsbridge-road. The group of temporary structures, which had been put up in seven weeks, being of the flimsiest material and most inflammable, blazed up and was consumed in about half an hour. Our Illustrations show the remains of the principal entrance, and of the side entrance, after the roof had fallen in. The chief building, if it may be called a building, part of which consisted of two floors, was 150 ft. by 140 ft. in dimensions; it contained a great variety of articles imported at large expense from Japan, and the proprietor reckons his loss at £15,000, of which only £5000 was insured. The poor Japanese work-people and their families were happily able to escape, with one exception, a young man named En-nemi, a woodcarver, who perished. Mr. Buhicrosan, with much spirit, has resolved to create the village anew, while liberal provision is made by him, with the assistance of Mr. Alexander, of Notting-hill, for the relief of those distressed strangers, whose wages will not be stopped. We hope that, when the show is restored and reopened, public favour will be so continued and increased towards it as to make some compensation for the heavy loss which has been incurred. The fine new buildings called Humphreys' Hall Mansions, the ground-floor of which is occupied by Messrs. Spiers and Pond's restaurant, and the upper floors by private residential apartments, sustained great internal damage, and some injury was done to other adjacent premises.

The Poule d'Essai (French Two Thousand) was won at Paris on Sunday by M. A. Lupin's Xaintrailles. Five to one was laid on the winner.

At a meeting of the Portsmouth Town Council on Tuesday Mr. Alderman Whitcombe, who subscribed £2000 towards the establishment of a scholarship in the Royal College of Music, was presented with his portrait, in recognition of his liberality.

In London last week 2561 births and 1549 deaths were registered. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 275, and the deaths 174 below the average numbers in the corresponding weeks of the last ten years.

The marriage of the Hon. Ronald Leslie Melville, half-brother and heir-presumptive of the Earl of Leven and Melville, and Miss Portman, eldest daughter of the Hon. William Henry Berkeley Portman, M.P., took place on Wednesday.

The Earl of Suffolk presided on Tuesday morning at a council meeting of the Central and Associated Chambers of Agriculture. It was resolved that the £20,000 proposed by the Government towards the cost of registration was wholly inadequate, and Sir Massey Lopes' resolution was supported by the council. Other resolutions condemnatory of the Budget were passed.—At a council meeting of the British Dairy Farmers' Association, held the same day, it was decided to hold a dairy conference at Nantwich on Thursday, June 4, and at Chester on the following Saturday, the intermediate day to be devoted to visiting dairy farms and factories in the neighbourhood.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

Lord Wolseley, the Commander-in-Chief, arrived at Souakim this day week (Saturday), and communicated to Lieutenant-General Sir Gerald Graham, commanding the army there, the present intentions of our Government with regard to military movements. What these may be is not exactly known; and something may have been left for Lord Wolseley to determine, or to advise Government upon the matter; but there is apparently to be no further advance, and great part of the troops on the Red Sea coast are being withdrawn. The hostile Arabs have begun to attack the unfinished railway, cetting fire to the wooden "sleepers" and tearing up the rails, in which operations they have once or twice been caught and punished by patrol detachments of our soldiers. It is believed that Osman Digna, with his followers of the Haddendowa tribe, has returned to Tamai or to Tamanieb, and there is some talk of a fresh expedition from Souakim to disperse the enemy once more. It is expected that the garrison to be left at Souakim will consist of the Berkshire and Surrey Regiments and the Indian contingent. The Jumna, which had started for India with eleven hundred coolie labourers returning home, is called back from Aden, and they are to be employed in putting up huts for the troops, but the precise locality of the summer encampment on the hills is not yet known to have been fixed.

Our Special Artist, Mr. Walter Paget, contributes the Sketches of the horse-shoeing forge attached to the battery of field-artillery which forms part of the Australian (New South Wales) volunteer contingent at Souakim; an interior view of the first zereba on the route to Handoub, with the timber block-house in the background, surmounted by the heliograph signalling apparatus; and the figures of two friendly natives, of the Amara tribe, employed as runners by Mr. Huyshe, the Times' correspondent.

The health of the troops on the Upper Nile, especially at Debbeh, is reported to be suffering greatly from the climate, the heat being 120 degrees, and there are many cases of enteric fever. It is said that the revolt in Kordofan against the rule of the Mahdi is gaining strength, and his deputy at Obeid is closely besieged, so that no approach of the enemy to the Egyptian border is any longer to be feared.

At the annual meeting of the trustees of Shakspeare's birthplace at Stratford-on-Avon last Tuesday it was reported that during the past year over 13,000 persons had signed their names in the visitors' book.

Mr. Spencer Charrington, of the firm of Charrington and Co., brewers, Mile-end, has consented to preside at the seventy-ninth anniversary festival of the Licensed Victuallers' School, to take place at the Crystal Palace on Tuesday, June 30.

According to the quarterly return of the Registrar-General, the population of the United Kingdom in the middle of 1885 is estimated at 36,325,115 persons: that of England and Wales at 27,499,041, of Scotland at 3,907,736, and of Ireland at 4,918,338. In the United Kingdom the births of 293,248 children, and the deaths of 196,760 persons, were registered in the three months ending March 31. The recorded natural increase of population was thus 96,488. The registered number of persons married in the quarter ending Dec. 31 last was 140,974. The birth rate in the United Kingdom in the first quarter of 1885 was 32·7, and the death rate 22·0 per 1000. The marriage rate in the fourth quarter of 1884 was 15·6 per 1000.

ALICE AYRES.

Death has taken from this world the humble heroine of a domestic tragedy; the brave young woman who stayed on the second floor of a burning house, attempting to save three children by dropping them from the window, having first thrown out a mattress that they might fall softly, and who received mortal injuries in descending after them. Alice Ayres, the sister of Mrs. Chandler, living with the family at 194, Union-street, the oilman's shop, at the corner of Gravel-lane, in the Borough, performed this act of courageous self-devotion on Friday, the 24th ult.; and it was mentioned in our last. She had slept in a room with her three little nieces, Edith, aged five, Ellen, four years old, and Elizabeth, three years old, when she was aroused by the noise of the fire at a quarter past two in the morning. Her first thought, as the staircase was in flames, was to lower the children into the street by tying them to the sheets which she fastened together; but this would not do, and she then cast out the mattress, and let the three little girls, one after another, fall upon it. This was a desperate expedient, and it did not entirely succeed, for the youngest child was killed, but there seemed no other chance of rescue. The parents, Henry and Mary Ann Chandler, with a boy, Harry, their eldest child, six years of age, perished in another part of the house, apparently by suffocation. When Alice Ayres had done what she thought was best to save the little girls, she let herself drop from the window; but, striking in her fall against something which turned her aside from the mattress beneath, she was terribly injured, and died within twenty-four hours after her removal to Guy's Hospital. Of the whole family, only Edith and Ellen were saved. A Portrait of Alice Ayres, who was twenty-six years of age, and unmarried, is given in this Number of our Journal. Her funeral, in Isleworth Cemetery, was attended by a large assembly of people; sixteen of the Fire Brigade bore the coffin, and twenty young girls, dressed in white, brought flowers to the grave.

Mr. Horatio Davis was on Monday elected without opposition a member of the Court of Common Council for the Ward of Cheap, in the room of the late Mr. Wheeler.

It is stated that the Bank of England has purchased for £30,050 the site of the Cock Tavern and the vacant land in Fleet-street, between Chancery-lane and the Law Courts, for the erection of new buildings for the accommodation of the large business in connection with the Courts of Justice.

Under the patronage of Mr. Henry Burnley Heath, Consul-General for Italy, the annual Italian ball (evening and fancy dress), for the benefit of the French Hospital and the Italian Benevolent Society, will be held next Tuesday at Freemasons' Hall.

Mrs. Gladstone gave a breakfast to about three hundred unemployed dock labourers at Wapping on Tuesday, and afterwards addressed a few words of sympathy to the men. The Marquis of Lorne, who was among the speakers, alluded to the best means of relieving the distress. He recommended emigration.

The receipts on account of Revenue from April 1, 1885, when there was a balance of £4,993,207, to May 2, 1885, were £9,656,247, against £8,173,666 in the corresponding period of the preceding financial year, which began with a balance of £5,632,569. The net expenditure was £9,664,580, against £7,632,192 to the same date in the previous year. The Treasury balances on May 2 amounted to £5,009,103, and at the same date in 1884 to £5,740,312.

TRADE MARK

Dr. Carter Moffat's AMMONIAPHONE Harness' Patent

DR. CARTER MOFFAT'S AMMONIAPHONE

Is used and approved of by
THE ROYAL FAMILY, and by the Elite of the MEDICAL, MUSICAL, and DRAMATIC PROFESSIONS.

It is a tube about 25 in. long, constructed of a specially-prepared non-corrosive metal, with handles, having patent spring valves. It is charged with a chemical compound, combined so as to resemble in effect that which is produced by the soft balmy air of the Italian peninsula when inhaled into the lungs, hence the term—Artificial Italian Air.

THE "PRIME DONNE" APPROVE.

Madame MARIE ROZE writes:—
"Hawthorn Lodge, Finchley New-road, London, Oct. " 1884.
"Dear Sir,—I have tried your AMMONIAPHONE, with the most wonderful results. I consider it the most marvellous invention of the age for strengthening the voice and improving the tone."

Mdme. ROSE HERSEE, the distinguished English Operatic Soprano, writes:—
"Lee-place, 102, Lee High-road, Lewisham, S.E., April 4, 1885.
"Dear Sirs,—Although at one time strongly prejudiced against Dr. Carter Moffat's AMMONIAPHONE, I am bound by a sense of justice to say that I have found it a most valuable invention. Recently it enabled me to conquer a prolonged hoarseness which threatened to prevent my fulfilment of an operatic engagement. I have also tried its effects on some of my pupils with striking success."

AND SO DO THE LEADING ACTORS.

CHARLES WYNDHAM, Esq., Criterion Theatre, Piccadilly, Jan. 15, 1885, writes:—
"I have now used the AMMONIAPHONE which you forwarded me about a fortnight ago, and, although rather sceptical at first, I am bound now to confess it is of very great service to me."

THE CHURCH COINCIDES WITH THE STAGE,

Very Rev. Dr. VAUGHAN, Dean of Llandaff, writes:—
"Nov. 5, 1884.
"Dear Sir,—My voice has now nearly recovered its tone, and I have certainly derived benefit, though not suddenly or rapidly, from the use of your AMMONIAPHONE."

Rev. W. HAY M. H. AITKEN writes:—
"14, Bryanston-square, London, W.
"Will you kindly recharge my AMMONIAPHONE. I have derived much benefit from its use; it certainly does clear the voice in a remarkable way, and enables me to get through my work, preaching two or three times a day, and sometimes oftener, with much less trouble and fatigue."

AND THE PUBLIC IS UNANIMOUS IN EXPRESSING ITS APPROVAL.

Write for Copies of Testimonials too numerous to quote.

DR. CARTER MOFFAT'S AMMONIAPHONE will last for years. Should be used by Actors, Vocalists, Clergymen, Public Speakers, Parliamentary Men, Reciters, Lecturers, Leaders of Psalmody, Schoolmasters, Amateurs, Church Choirs, Barristers, and all persons who have to use their voices professionally, or who desire to greatly improve their speaking or singing tones, producing a rich, powerful, melodious voice of extraordinary ringing clearness and range.

DR. CARTER MOFFAT'S AMMONIAPHONE

"ONE OF THE MOST REMARKABLE INVENTIONS OF THE AGE"—(Vide "KNOWLEDGE," March 6, 1885)—
and has been favourably commented on by the leading journals of both Hemispheres; it has proved of the utmost value in the treatment of Coughs, Colds, Clerical Throat, Bronchitis, Asthma, Consumption, Aphonia, or Loss of Voice, Deafness resulting from Colds, and all Affections of the Throat and Chest. Such ailments may be entirely overcome by means of this simple and beneficent invention.

THE DOCTOR'S VERDICT.

A. S. KENNEDY, Esq., L.R.C.P., L.R.C.S., &c., writes:—
"14, Conduit-street, London, W.,
"Dec. 20, 1884.
"The two AMMONIAPHONES that I had from you have given very good results. Apart from improved timbre, resonance, and extension of register, which are undeniable, I have found the AMMONIAPHONE most useful in cutting short catarrhal and laryngeal troubles, and of great benefit in removing hoarseness. Several patients have tried the AMMONIAPHONE at my suggestion, and are all pleased with the improvement in their voices."

For additional testimony from Dr. C. J. ROYD WALLIS, Dr. WILLS, Dr. ANNA KINGSFORD, and numerous scientific authorities, see the "History of the Ammoniaphone," 80 pp., post-free.

The Rev. AUBREY C. PRICE, B.A., writes:—
"Chesterton, Clapham Park, S.W.,
"Jan. 27, 1885.
"I have great pleasure in bearing very high testimony to the value of Dr. Carter Moffat's AMMONIAPHONE. I tried it after a week of very hard work, in which I had preached twelve sermons. My voice was thin and weak, and my throat was very sore. The AMMONIAPHONE put all this right in a single day, and not only enabled me to speak as easily and well as if I had had previously no extra work, but actually enabled me to speak with far more ease and comfort than usual. I have given it a fair trial, under exceptionally hard conditions, and I can bear conscientious testimony to its value in sustaining and clearing the voice to an almost marvellous degree, and in preventing, to a great extent, the weariness and soreness of the throat, which I have usually experienced as the consequence of a long and severe exercise of the vocal organs."

LADY MACFARREN (wife of Sir G. A. Macfarren, the distinguished President of the Royal Academy of Music), writes:—
"7, Hamilton-terrace, N.W.,
"Oct. 22, 1884.
"I consider the AMMONIAPHONE to have a wonderfully bracing effect on the vocal organs, and shall have great pleasure in recommending it to such as have weak or relaxed throats; indeed, I have already done so."

DR. CARTER MOFFAT attends daily at the Rooms of the MEDICAL BATTERY CO., 205, Regent-street, London, W., to demonstrate the extraordinary utility of the Ammoniaphone. Write for the "HISTORY OF THE AMMONIAPHONE," an eighty-page treatise, post-free on application.

DR. CARTER MOFFAT'S AMMONIAPHONE (Harness' Patent) will be sent free by post to any part of the United Kingdom on receipt of P.O.O. or Cheque (crossed "London and County Bank") for 21s., and payable to

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

TRADE  MARK.

Are admitted by thousands to be worth above a Guinea a Box for Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as Wind and Pains in the Stomach, Sick Headache, Giddiness, Fulness and Swelling after Meals, Dizziness and Drowsiness, Cold Chills, Flushings of Heat, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Costiveness, Scurvy, Blotches on the Skin, Disturbed Sleep, Frightful Dreams, and all Nervous and Trembling Sensations, &c. The first dose will give relief in twenty minutes. This is no fiction, for they have done it in thousands of cases. Every sufferer is earnestly invited to try one Box of these Pills, and they will be acknowledged to be WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

For Females of all ages, these Pills are invaluable, as a few doses of them carry off all humours, and bring about all that is required. No Female should be without them. There is no medicine to be found to equal BEECHAM'S PILLS for removing any obstruction or irregularity of the system. If taken according to the directions given with each Box, they will soon restore Females of all ages to sound and robust health.

For a weak stomach, impaired digestion, and all disorders of the liver, they act like "Magic," and a few doses will be found to work wonders upon the most important organs of the human machine. They strengthen the whole muscular system, restore the long-lost complexion, bring back the keen edge of appetite, and arouse into action, with the Rosebud of Health, the whole physical energy of the human frame. These are "facts" admitted by thousands, embracing all classes of society, and one of the best guarantees to the Nervous and Debilitated is, BEECHAM'S PILLS have the largest sale of any patent medicine in the world.

BID ME GOOD-BYE WALTZ. On Signor Tosti's popular Song. H. W. DE CAMORS.

FAHRWOHL WALTZ. By CAROLINE LOWTHIAN.
"Truth" says:—"The 'Black and Tan,' by Caroline Lowthian, is perfectly enchanting. I did not think a polka could be made so absolutely tempting to the feet; but this one is so full of spirit and 'go' that I don't think I could resist it. . . . The 'Fahrwohl Valse' is another excellent composition by Caroline Lowthian."
The "Daily Telegraph" says:—"Miss Caroline Lowthian's 'Fahrwohl' will supply strains free and flowing. . . . Yet the firm beat in the music of 'Black and Tan' (C. Lowthian) may lead others to prefer it."

THE P. AND O. POLKA. By P. BUCALOSSI.

MON AMOUR WALTZ. By P. BUCALOSSI.
The "Daily Telegraph" says:—"In Bucalossi's 'Mon Amour Waltz' the leading theme, relieved by vigorous passages, is particularly graceful."
The "Queen" says:—"'Mon Amour Waltz' and 'P. and O. Polka,' by P. Bucalossi. These pieces, both waltz and polka, will be very acceptable in the ball-room. The waltz is singularly tuneful and the polka quite brilliant: both happily illustrated."

PHYLLIS WALTZ. By P. BUCALOSSI.

MERRY FOOTSTEPS POLKA. By P. BUCALOSSI.

THE CLAIRE WALTZ. By LEONARD GAUTIER.
"Truth" says:—"You will also like the 'Claire Waltzes,' so full of melody are they and so good to dance to. The composer is Leonard Gautier."

LE ZEPHYR POLKA. By G. DELBRÜCK.
The "Daily Telegraph" says:—"For several rooms Delbruck's polka, 'Le Zephyr,' will be selected by those engaging in that characteristic dance."
The "Queen" says:—"'Le Zephyr' Polka, by G. Delbruck. Very spirited, and decidedly fresh."

LES GRENOUILLES (FROGS) POLKA. ALFRED DELBRUCK.

LEILA VALSE. OTTO LANGEY.

TOI SEULE VALSE. LUKE WHEELER.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restoratives." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots, where the glands are not decayed. "The Mexican Hair Renewer" is sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath.
Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke; being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants, it is perfectly delicious to the taste, and as harmless as shelled Almonds. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

UNIVERSALLY PRESCRIBED BY THE FACULTY.

CHAPTER XXX.

AN UNLUCKY DAY.

Clare, meanwhile, had been making acquaintance with the vicissitudes of travel. When the train reached Swindon, it became evident that something had gone wrong. There was more than the usual bustle going on upon the platform; the railway officials were clustered together in a group, and the passengers were excitedly telling one another—as passengers always do when an unexpected delay occurs—that there had been a frightful accident and appalling loss of life. Clare could get no coherent information out of her fellow-travellers; but presently the guard into whose charge Adrian had committed her came up, and asked: "Was you the lady as booked for St. Colomb-road, m'm?"

Clare said, "Yes; has there been an accident?"

"Not to say an accident, m'm; but there's been a bit of a landslip somewheres down the line, and I doubt they won't get it clear afore night. You see, if you was going no further than Plymouth, m'm, we might be able to get you there later; but as 'tis, I don't see no chance for you."

"What am I to do, then?" asked Clare in dismay.

"Well, m'm, if you arst me, I should say you was best go back to London. There's the up express going out in five minutes as 'll get you to Paddington at 2.45, and the company 'll pass you down to-morrow with the same ticket."

There did not seem to be much choice about the matter. Clare dispatched a telegram to her father, and was presently speeding towards the metropolis again in the company of several angry individuals, who, like herself, had been compelled to abandon their journey, and who perhaps had less reason for railing at their luck than she had. It is always a disagreeable thing to have to return after saying good-bye; but in Clare's case this necessity was more than usually painful. The only grain of comfort that she could take to herself, as she was driven away from the Paddington station, was the thought that she certainly would not find Adrian at home on her return. He would, of course, dine at his club, and the chances were that she would not see him until the following morning; so that there would be no need for a long interview between them before they parted again. That she herself would have to do without dinner was not a prospect that distressed her; for she had no appetite, and, indeed, cared little about dinner at the best of times.

She was becoming more cheerful, when an incident occurred which convinced her that this was indeed an unlucky day. Near the Albert Hall her hansom was brought to a standstill, and suddenly, to her horror, a too familiar voice exclaimed: "Mrs. Vidal!—is it possible! Have you relented at the last moment and decided not to bereave us yet awhile?"

Lord St. Austell's nose and teeth and eye-glass appeared before Clare's unwilling eyes, like a nightmare, out of the murky atmosphere. "I was on my way to your house," he continued. "Going to call on your husband, you know; I quite forgot to leave a card for him the other day. Allow me"—— And with an agility very creditable in one of his years, Lord St. Austell hopped into the hansom and seated himself beside his victim. "Now we will proceed together," said he. "I call this a most auspicious meeting."

It certainly seemed to give him a great deal of pleasure. His habitual grin expressed real delight this time, and presently he fell back and went off into a fit of silent laughter which rather alarmed his companion, who could not understand why he should be so merry.

In truth, the days which are unlucky for some must needs be lucky for others, and impartial Fate, while dealing roughly with a few of our friends upon this occasion, had smiled upon Lord St. Austell. His Lordship had indeed set out from home with well-grounded anticipations of enjoyment; but this was far more than he had hoped for. His original plan of walking to Alexandra-gardens, asking for Mr. Vidal, and surprising his wife in a situation which even she would admit to be equivocal, sank into insignificance by comparison with the dramatic episode which he now had it in his power to create, and so enchanted was he at the prospect of the coming joke that he had much ado to restrain himself from ruining it by taking Mrs. Vidal into his confidence. He listened inattentively to her account of the mishap which had caused her return, and only began to be amused when she assured him earnestly that he would not find her husband at home.

"Good-bye, Lord St. Austell," she said, as she stepped nimbly out on to the pavement; "I won't ask you to come in."

"How cruel you are to me, Mrs. Vidal!" exclaimed the old gentleman, reproachfully. "But perhaps I shall be allowed into the house, though you won't invite me. I came here to call on your husband, you know."

"It really is not worth while to get out and ask for him," said Clare. "He is quite certain to be at his club."

Lord St. Austell, however, had already rung the bell; and great was the astonishment of the parlour-maid on witnessing the return of her mistress, thus escorted. Had this young woman been possessed of presence of mind or consideration for the feelings of others, she would no doubt have mentioned that Adrian was not alone; but presumably she lacked these gifts, and even ordinary good manners into the bargain; for all that she did was to open her eyes very wide and ejaculate "Lord bless me, mum! Mr. Vidal will be surprised!" After which she tripped up stairs to open the drawing-room door.

A careful comparison of the time required to drive from Paddington to Alexandra-gardens with that occupied by the conversation between Adrian and his visitor recorded in the last chapter will show that the new-comers reached the foot of the staircase very shortly after Lady St. Austell had so rashly expressed a wish for their appearance. Neither she nor Adrian had heard the door-bell ring; but they were startled simultaneously by the sound of footsteps on the stairs, and exchanged glances of dismay.

"Good gracious!" exclaimed Lady St. Austell, "there's somebody coming! What shall I do?"

There was no time for anything. The words were barely out of her mouth when the door was flung open, admitting Lord St. Austell and Mrs. Vidal; and the tableau which ensued was doubtless appreciated to the full by the only one of the four persons concerned therein who was in a condition of mind to take note of its various features.

Adrian started up. His heart died within him, and a chilly conviction crept over him that he was in a worse scrape now than he had ever been in before. Lady St. Austell began to laugh; but when she met her husband's steady, malignant gaze, she ceased suddenly and caught her breath. What would he do to her? She had always been frightened of him, and she knew that he was not the man to show mercy for the sake of mercy. Clare stopped short on the threshold, feeling dazed and sick, as if she had received a physical blow. The walls seemed to be turning round her, a mist rose before her eyes, and she would very likely have fainted had she not felt the touch of Lord St. Austell's arm, which was extended to catch her. From that contact she shrank away, making a strong effort to command herself, and stood, grasping the back of a chair with one hand and looking with a sort of fascination at Adrian's face, which was as white as her own. It was Lord St. Austell's high-pitched, sarcastic voice that broke the silence.

"Why don't you have a screen in your drawing-room, Mr. Vidal? I thought everybody had Japanese screens nowadays. It is a pity you forgot that useful article when you were furnishing, because, if you had only had it, we might have done the scene from "The School for Scandal" to perfection. Lady St. Austell would have been Lady Teazle; you would have been Joseph Surface: I should have been Sir Peter: and Mrs. Vidal—well, there the cast breaks down a little; but perhaps I might have managed Charles Surface's laugh myself. To tell the truth, I am not sure that I am particularly well fitted to play Sir Peter's part: but I so far resemble him that I shall be glad to hear anything that you may have to say for yourself, Mr. Vidal."

"Is this a preconcerted plot?" broke out Adrian, hoarsely. In truth, he hardly knew what he was saying.

"My dear Sir, you must permit me to remark that that is neither a very polite nor a very intelligent question. Ladies do not, as a rule, preconcert plots of which the last act takes place in the Divorce Court. May I inquire again whether you have anything to say for yourself?"

"Nothing to you," returned Adrian, finding a foolish comfort in defying somebody.

Lord St. Austell raised his eyebrows. "There was a time," he observed—"I am sorry to say that I am old enough to have more than one personal reminiscence connected with it—when, after such an answer as that, further words would have been superfluous. Indeed, I suppose that, whatever your answer had been, neither you nor I could have avoided a hostile encounter fifty years ago; and I may add that it is no bad thing for you that the century is so far advanced, for I should undoubtedly have killed you, if we had fought fifty years ago. Nowadays, as you are aware, a different mode of procedure is customary. We simply take Sir James Hannen and the public into our confidence, and all is amicably arranged, without loss of life."

"Sydney!" gasped Lady St. Austell, clasping her hands in a paroxysm of alarm, "you don't mean what you say—you can't mean it! You know I never did anything wrong in my life!"

Lord St. Austell focussed his eye-glass on his wife and surveyed her with interest. "I am not prepared," he answered, "to make quite so startling an assertion as that; but I will go so far as to say that never have I beheld a more innocent-looking person. Innocence is written upon every line of your countenance, my love—or at least it would be written there, if your countenance possessed any lines. You are agitated; but not more so than the circumstances warrant. You are indignant; but that is only what an innocent person ought to be; and I observe with pleasure that the colour has not forsaken your face."

Poor Lady St. Austell was ghastly. The fixed spots of pink upon her cheek-bones, which were hardly distinguishable at ordinary times from the natural bloom of youth, contrasted strangely with the greenish-yellow tinge of the skin around them. There was a pause, during which Clare quietly left the room; and then Adrian bethought himself that he had taken a somewhat unwise course in refusing to give the explanation asked of him.

"Perhaps," said he, "I had better tell the plain truth about this unfortunate business. Lady St. Austell called here this afternoon out of sheer—what shall I say?—bravado. She wanted, I believe, to shock Lord Blaise, who had annoyed her by some things that he said. It is rather hard lines upon me, seeing that I did my best to dissuade her from coming, and that I shall have to suffer for my folly in giving way; but I see no reason why she should not get off scot free."

"There is no reason," cried the unhappy lady, who was thinking only of her own predicament, and did not notice the somewhat ungracious manner in which she was exculpated. "It all happened just as Mr. Vidal says. I never meant the slightest harm, and I know it is only that spiteful, dishonourable, red-headed wretch who has caused all this trouble!" And here, being overcome by the poignancy of her remorse, she burst into a flood of tears.

Lord St. Austell laughed—not ill-naturedly. "Be comforted," said he; "I am not going to petition for a divorce. I have fifty good reasons for refraining from doing so, amongst which, perhaps, the most excellent is that I shouldn't get one. There is no evidence to convict you of anything worse than of being a singularly foolish woman; and it is hardly necessary to put the law in motion in order to arrive at a conviction of that. Excuse my plain language."

With such a load of apprehension lifted from her mind, Lady St. Austell would have forgiven anything. She dried her eyes, which began to sparkle again; and her husband went on.

"May I advise you both not to attempt this sort of thing again. People who can't command their nerves ought not to court risk. I myself have often been far more awkwardly situated than you were just now, and I have always extricated myself without difficulty; but then I'm not nervous. Well, Mr. Vidal, the play is over now, and it only remains for us to bid you good-bye and go home. Please present my compliments to Mrs. Vidal, who I am sorry to see has left us, and tell her that I trust she will show as forgiving a spirit as I have done."

When Adrian was left alone, he sat down, and for the space of five minutes made use of every strong expression that he could think of, without thereby succeeding in putting much additional heart into himself. What he was to say to Clare he had no idea; but it was certain that he must say something to her, and presently he followed her to her bed-room, screwing up his courage as best he could to face the inevitable.

He found the door locked, and she only opened it a couple of inches to give him a brief account of the misadventure which had caused her return; after which she begged that she might be left undisturbed until the next morning.

"Won't you let me tell you how all this has come to pass?" pleaded Adrian, humbly.

But she answered, "To-morrow morning, if you wish—not now."

And in the morning he found her as impracticable as he had feared that she would be. He confessed the whole truth, admitting that he had done wrong in suppressing the fact that Lady St. Austell had been for some weeks in London, but declaring that his motives had not been bad motives, and asseverating with a fervour which ought to have been convincing that he had never entertained any feeling for that lady that was not of a mildly friendly character. But after what Clare had witnessed in Kensington Gardens, such protestations could only disgust her. She listened to him impassively for a time, and then interrupted him with—

"I would rather hear no more about it, please. I don't wish to refer to the subject again; nor, I should think, do you."

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE STING OF THE SCORPION.

One morning in January, Adrian, after breakfasting at his club, thought it would be a good thing to stroll down to the office of the Anglo-Saxon. It was some considerable time since he had seen the editor of that hybrid publication, and amongst the letters which lay beside his plate was one from Pilkington, in which he was asked to "look in some day between eleven and twelve o'clock." Another of his letters was from Clare, who had now been several weeks absent, and whose return had not yet been spoken of. It cannot be said that Adrian wished for her return. He had succeeded in making himself thoroughly angry with her, and in exonerating himself from all blame. At the bottom of his heart, there may still have lurked some belief that things would come right in the long run; but he said to himself repeatedly that he had no such hope, and that if she was determined to make life a burden for them both, it was certainly better that they should remain apart. As Clare, starting from other premisses, had arrived at a similar conclusion, there seemed little likelihood that the husband and wife would meet again until they found it advisable to quiet the suspicions of their relatives. A tacit agreement that the latter consideration was of some importance caused them to write to each other twice a week; and the difficulty of composing the letter thus exchanged may perhaps be regarded as part of the penance which they both undoubtedly deserved.

Some people, as we know, have to do penance for being worse than their neighbours, others for being better, and some only for being a little too prominently before their neighbours' eyes. It was in the last capacity that Adrian had begun rather to regret his connection with the Anglo-Saxon. Pilkington's crotchet of making his contributors sign their articles had not worked well. A man may submit to adverse criticism if his critic be personally unknown to him, or even if the identity of the critic be only shrewdly guessed at; but when Tom, Dick, or Harry openly proclaims himself as a Minos sitting in judgment upon his fellows, the matter assumes quite another complexion. In such a case poor Minos can hardly hope to give satisfaction. His capacity, unprotected by the editorial "we" in which so much virtue lies, is pretty sure to be called in question; it will be asked what business he has to thrust his personal predilections and prejudices down people's throats, and his praise will be little less resented than his blame.

"Am I, who have been before the public for twenty years, to be patronised by a whipper-snapper who only learnt to write his own language the other day?" calls out Jones, the eminent novelist. "Who the deuce cares whether he thinks me 'upon the whole, the most skilful portrayer of modern English life that we have among us' or not? 'Upon the whole,' is good. Of course we understand who runs me close and might be said to surpass me, if modesty didn't close his lips."

Thus Adrian had made enemies for himself; and to make enemies was what he could not endure. Moreover, he had been distressed latterly by comments upon the management of the Anglo-Saxon, which had reached his ears. The editorial disclaimer which had been wrung from Pilkington by Lady St. Austell, and which has been quoted already, had given rise to a good deal of disrespectful mirth; nor was this the only instance in which that gentleman had thought it necessary to inform his readers that, though he sat upon the box, he did drive the coach. The common belief is that even the most perfectly trained of teams requires to be driven by somebody, and Pilkington had been at some pains to point out that his team was not trained at all. Thus the public had fallen into the disastrous habit of laughing at him and his queer paper; and Adrian feared—without having any precise information upon the point—that the circulation of the latter was not what could be wished. He had as yet received no return for the two thousand pounds which he had so reluctantly invested in it, although he had supposed that the dividends would have been payable half-yearly. Fifty per cent would have been extremely welcome to him, and so, indeed, would twenty-five. Ten would not have been amiss. Of late his expectations had become so modest that he had more than once muttered to himself that he would be very glad to see his two thousand back, without a penny in respect of interest.

Revolving all these things in his mind, Adrian walked slowly towards the Strand, where the offices of the Anglo-Saxon were situated. These were not particularly commodious; but the editor's room had been furnished with rather more regard to elegance than is generally bestowed upon such apartments, in deference to the fastidious tastes of its present occupant—who, by-the-way, was seldom to be seen in it.

Pilkington, who was seated before a broad writing-table, swung round in his chair, which turned on a pivot, and held out his hand to Adrian with that air of kindly patronage which was all his own. "How do you do, Vidal?" he said. "I am glad to see you again."

"And I am very glad to see you," returned Adrian. "I rather wanted to ask you about one or two things connected with the paper. You have been a long time out of town."

"I should have been a good deal longer out of town, if I could have consulted my own wishes; but all this"—and he waved his hand towards the table, which was covered with MSS. and proofs—"requires looking into every now and then. I find it a great drag upon me."

It occurred to Adrian that Pilkington probably earned his salary with as little labour as any man living; but he said, "I suppose you must."

"So much so that lately I have sometimes thought that it might be better to give it up."

"I trust you won't do that," said Adrian, quickly. "The whole thing would go to pieces if you withdrew."

"Even so, the world would continue to revolve upon its own axis much as usual, I dare say. But I am not sure that my retirement from the editorship would have so bad an effect upon the paper as you are kind enough to assume. Many people seem to think that Mr. Larkins would replace me very efficiently."

Mr. Larkins was the sub-editor—an alert business-like man, not quite a gentleman, who had won his spurs in journalism some years back, and who devoted only a small portion of his valuable time to the Anglo-Saxon. The sub-editorship had been offered to him by the wish of some of the proprietors and against that of Pilkington, who detested him, but nevertheless left the management of all details in his hands. It was he who wrote the paragraphs headed "Social Scraps," and as these for the most part referred to the doings of people of whom he knew absolutely nothing, he depended for his information upon various correspondents, and was as often as not led into making erroneous assertions by them. This, he was wont to declare, was not of the slightest consequence. Trifling misstatements broke no bones, and an action or two for libel tended to bring a paper into notice and increase its sale. But his chief, who took a different view, was made miserable by his repeated indiscretions.

"Larkins would alter the entire character of the paper immediately," said Adrian.

"Oh, no doubt; the question is whether the character of the paper had not better be altered. I won't affect to deny that, so far, it has hardly answered my expectations. It has been an experiment; and, after all, I take it that the pleasure which one derives from making experiments consists chiefly in one's uncertainty as to how they will turn out."

Adrian thought that depended a good deal upon whether one had staked two thousand pounds upon the result or not. "For choice," he remarked, "I prefer the experiments which turn out well."

"So do I," answered Pilkington, smiling blandly; "but 'tis not in mortal to command success. Without too much vanity, we may flatter ourselves that we have deserved it—you and I, at least. You were saying that you had some questions to ask me."

Adrian would have liked to ask whether the Anglo-Saxon was paying its way, and how soon persons who had risked money in the undertaking might expect to receive some return for their investments; but finding it rather difficult to put these inquiries into so many words, he said, "Oh, I don't know that there was anything very particular, after all. I wanted to know how things were going on."

Apparently, Mr. Pilkington did not think that this called for any rejoinder from him. He sat silent for a few moments, trimming his nails with a pen-knife, and then said, "By-the-way, have you seen this week's number of the Scorpion?"

"I don't think I have," answered Adrian. "Is there anything special in it?"

"They treat us—or, perhaps, I ought rather to say you—to a column and a half of abuse. Here it is, if you care to look at it." And he handed Adrian a copy of the paper in question, pointing out the article to which he had alluded.

It was headed Quis custodiet ipsos Custodes? and from its opening sentences Adrian learnt that the Anglo-Saxon, in spite of its failure to command popular support, had, from the outset, afforded a great deal of amusement to its readers. It had not been taken seriously; but then (said the writer) anyone who was at all behind the scenes must have known all along that it was not intended to be so taken. The editor possessed a delicate appreciation of humour, and it was impossible to doubt that he had had many a quiet laugh over the performances of the distinguished contributors whom he had prevailed upon to exhibit themselves in unwonted attitudes to an astonished public. The enjoyment that was afforded to him by his publication was probably analogous to that of the ingenious person who persuades elephants to stand on their heads on inverted tubs and poodle-dogs to fire off pistols. The Anglo-Saxon had been thoroughly funny from first to last; but in nothing had the editor shown himself more determined to have his joke than in handing over the critical department to Mr. Adrian Vidal, an author who had produced one bad and one fairly good novel, but who was otherwise unknown to fame. Month after month this very self-satisfied young gentleman had been apportioning praise and censure among the greatest living writers of fiction with a gravity which was about the most comical thing that the spokesman of the Scorpion could remember. Then followed a list of some of the books which poor Adrian had been ordered to review, together with extracts from his comments upon them, which it was no very difficult matter to turn into ridicule. "But," continued the writer, pulling himself together, as it were, and becoming grave, "there is a point at which incapacity ceases to provoke laughter; and, after perusing Mr. Vidal's last effort, which deals with recent French novels, we are inclined to ask whether the time has not come for his removal into some other sphere of usefulness. Of the six works which he has singled out for unreserved commendation, we can only say that we hope never to see any one of them in the hands of an English lady." The works referred to were then discussed as fully as the modesty of the writer would allow: "and these," he concluded, with righteous indignation, "are the pretty stories which Mr. Vidal has the face to recommend for general reading."

"I never did anything of the sort!" cried Adrian, throwing down the paper. "I never recommended them for general reading. I said they were admirable as works of art: and so they are. As for their morality, I didn't see that I was called upon to direct attention to that. Everybody knows that French novels must be judged by a standard altogether different from ours, and it would be perfectly ridiculous to begin each review by saying, 'This plot is not one which an English author would have ventured to employ.' The books were not objectionable of their kind, and the man who wrote this knows that as well as I do. It is a most dishonest and blackguardly attack!"

Pilkington continued to pare his nails: he did not manifest any responsive ire. "I have not read the books," he remarked.

"Read them, then, and judge for yourself," said Adrian, feeling that his editor was not supporting him as he ought. "As it happens, four out of the half-dozen books are by members of the Academy, and the remaining two are by men whom it would be the most absurd prudery to call immoral writers."

"Yes; but as a matter of fact, are the plots immoral?" asked Pilkington.

"Why, of course they are, in one sense. The writing is not immoral—looking at it as a Frenchman would look."

"I dare say not; but attacks such as this, whether honest or not, are calculated to do us great harm with the public, and if the facts upon which they are based cannot be denied, it is impossible to make any reply to them."

Adrian, nevertheless, resolved that he would reply, and that his reply should be of such a nature as to cause not only his assailant, but every scribbler connected with the Scorpion, to writhe. Angry as he was already, he became much more so when he had finished the article, which, quite characteristically, carried its sting in its tail.

"We will not be too hard upon Mr. Vidal"—so ran the concluding paragraph. "His taste in literature is peculiar: but we are constrained to admit that its peculiarity is not so great but that a considerable number of so-called decent people share it with him, and we are willing to believe that he is personally as decent as the best of them. He has a right to his taste. But what he has no right to do, in his quality of critic—even though he be but the critic of a serio-comic publication like the Anglo-Saxon—is to advise our wives and daughters to read books whose chief aim is to throw contempt upon those domestic and conjugal virtues for which, no doubt, Mr. Vidal's own private life is conspicuous."

It was clear enough to Adrian that the last words must have been written by someone who was not unacquainted with the circumstances of his private life. An enemy had done this thing! "Upon my soul!" he exclaimed aloud, "I believe a thick stick would convey the most suitable rejoinder that could be made to such a fellow."

"I think," said Pilkington, holding up his hand before him, and admiring his carefully trimmed nails through half-closed eyes, "that you had better keep your temper. There is nothing to be gained by responding to challenges of that kind—either with sticks or pens. Besides, your case is not a very good one. You admit that the books were immoral books, and it is certain that you praised them highly."

"I praised what deserved praise in them, and held my tongue about the rest. I never recommended them."

"Praise in a review implies recommendation, as a matter of course. The Scorpion is ill-natured and unjust; but to tell you the truth, Vidal, I think you have been guilty of a slight error in judgment."

This was more than Adrian could stand. "If that is the view that you take," he answered, with calm fury, "my engagement on the Anglo-Saxon had better come to an end. I can't undertake to review books in such a way as to please the Scorpion; and, as regards this particular review, there isn't a single word in it which I should wish to alter."

Pilkington contemplated his fingers for another minute or so before he remarked, plaintively, "This it is to be an editor! I believe I may truly say that, since I undertook the Anglo-Saxon, I have not made one solitary suggestion, however deferential, that has not been immediately followed by a threat of retirement on the part of the person to whom it has been addressed. Whether the experience of other editors coincides with mine I do not know; but if it does, I think it would be no more than common justice that our memoirs should be added to the next issue of the Lives of Saints."

Someone who had entered the room unobserved during this speech here broke into a short laugh. "All in good time," said he. "I will write the memoir myself, sooner than that it should remain unwritten; but it is impossible to canonise an editor until he or his journal have ceased to exist, and we can't do without our Anglo-Saxon yet awhile, much less without our Pilkington."

Pilkington had so much of the magnanimity which belongs to the truly great that many other persons besides Percy Kean might probably have chaffed him with impunity, had they been so minded; but nobody else ever did so. He made a half-turn on his chair now, smiling indulgently.

"Ah, Kean," he said, "you are one of the people who know everything. Perhaps you can tell us for what reason the Scorpion has thought fit to fall upon us, tooth and nail."

"Of course I can," answered Kean. "For the same reason that dogs delight to bark and bite, and bears and lions growl and fight. In addition to that, the Scorpion is a society paper, and thinks you have no business to go poaching on its preserves with your absurd 'Social Scraps.' Personally, I agree with the Scorpion."

"Then let it fall foul of Larkins," said Adrian, who was still at white heat. "It is rather too bad that I am to be accused of all kinds of wickedness because the Scorpion has a grudge against a man with whom I have nothing to do."

"Oh, the Scorpion may have a grudge against you, too, for anything that I know to the contrary," returned Kean. "I wouldn't let it get a rise out of me, though."

"That is just what I have been telling him," observed Pilkington; "and because I do so, he threatens to desert me."

"Oh, nonsense!" said Kean, good-naturedly; "he won't desert you, nor will I. No! we will never desert Mr. Micawber! Let who will play you false, Vidal and I will remain faithful to the end. Come along, Vidal, and have some lunch. I would ask our illustrious chief to join us; only I know he can't afford to be seen with the likes of me."

And, taking Adrian by the arm, he led him out into the street before the latter had time to explain that Mr. Pilkington had not reported quite accurately the words which had prompted his offer of resignation.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MAY.

"Court Royal," the leading fiction in the Cornhill Magazine, continues bright, lively, attractive, and, we must add, thoroughly unnatural. The conversation of the Jewish marine-store dealer might almost pass for a burlesque; and yet Mr. Gould's animation compels the reader to travel gaily along with him. "Rainbow Gold" is clever and well written, as usual. The novelists, however, seem unable to invent anything so dramatic as some of the strictly historical anecdotes in "Humours of Parliamentary Elections," which are instructive as well as amusing, in so far as they show what gross and almost incredible abuses may consist with a fair amount of health in the body politic. "No. 11, Welham-Square," a story of a haunted house, is unique among ghost tales for the sublime conception of an athletic spectre, pummelled within an inch of his life—or an inch beyond it—by the united efforts of three grown people.

The chief contribution to the English Illustrated Magazine is a masterly character portrait of Lord Wolseley by Mr. Archibald Forbes—highly favourable without flattery, and impressing the reader with a conviction that Mr. Forbes has perfectly studied his man, and that his verdict may be thoroughly relied upon. Bret Harte's "Ship of '49" is concluded, and is one of his best stories. The continuation of Mr. Crane's "Sirens Three" exhibits his usual wealth of fancy.

Blackwood has a valuable paper on the causes which interfere with the efficiency of the national armaments, especially in artillery, somewhat injured, perhaps, by the prominence given to the alleged grievances of particular inventors. "London in May" is a sparkling medley of artistic, social, and dramatic criticism, and the interest of "The Waters of Hercules" increases with every instalment.

The Fortnightly Review is better this month than it has been for some time past. Sir Lepel Griffin's essay on the question of peace or war with Russia conveys the Anglo-Indian view, which it is satisfactory to find substantially the same as that generally prevalent in this country. Mr. Bartley's experience as a veteran Election Agent lends importance to his views of the kind of Conservative policy likely to commend itself to the masses. Many old-fashioned Conservatives will think they might as well have Liberalism at once. Another Conservative's proposal to make a Jonah of Mr. Gladstone would have more significance if it proceeded from the other side. The charges of negligence and procrastination brought against Sir Charles Wilson by Mr. C. Williams, late Soudan correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, will no doubt be held to require an answer. Mr. Swinburne is also the subject of a fierce attack from Mr. W. L. Courtney; and Mrs. Macdonald, in a remarkably eloquent essay, exposes the idle pretence of theosophy to masquerade as Buddhism.

The Contemporary Review has three important articles—Sir Austen Layard's plea for an alliance with Turkey, Sir Richard Temple's account of the armies of the native States of India, and Sir John Lubbock's investigation, with copious illustrations, of the laws of growth in leaves. Canon Cook's abstract of the Kalevala, the great popular Finnish epic, is very interesting. "Contemporary Life and Thought in Russia" is somewhat disappointing.

The most important article in the National Review is Mr. Balfour's warning against confusing politics with political economy—excellent advice, but practically very difficult to follow. Mr. Austin's polemic against theological polemics in connection with poetry only proves, we fear, that he is very angry with the Spectator. It is surprising to find a judicious politician like Mr. Kebble, in his essay upon the Duke of Wellington as a Prime Minister, imagining that the first Reform Bill could have been emasculated by a private understanding among leading statesmen. Cobbett and the Border Minstrelsy supply material for two good literary papers.

The new number of the Magazine of Art shows a desire on the part of its conductors to relieve the dry technicalities of art with matter of a lighter character. Mr. Harry Furniss's pictorial parody on Sir Joshua Reynolds, wherein Mr. Millais is represented painting the portrait of Sir Frederick Leighton, is an amusing example; and the pretty setting by Miss Alice Havers of Mr. Allingham's "Swing Song" is a step in the same direction. Among the more serious contents of the number is an excellent essay on the art of Mr. Burne Jones.

The Art Journal for May is full of pleasant variety. The etched frontispiece is a good specimen of the art of J. E. Saintin and D. Mordant. Mr. Hatton continues his graphic sketches of "Club-Land," and Mr. J. C. Robinson, her Majesty's Inspector of Pictures, contributes a carefully illustrated paper on the collection of old masters formed by Mr. Francis Cook, of Richmond. There are other interesting articles, with numerous engravings, which altogether make up an excellent number.

The chief attraction of the Century is the cluster of articles on the Peninsula Campaign of 1862, which, in the case of those proceeding from the two commanders, lose something of their attractiveness for want of literary finish. General Johnston is so intent on defending himself against President Davis as to necessitate constant reference to President Davis's book, and General M'Clellan writes a history as he would write a despatch. Harper has a contribution most interesting to Londoners, a beautifully illustrated account of a voyage through the great metropolis by the Regent's Canal. Few have hitherto appreciated the varied picturesqueness of this water highway, now so seriously menaced by railway projects. "Española and its Environs" is full of beautiful description of New Mexican landscape and manners. "The Red Glove" is as good as ever; and there are other excellent stories. Miss O'Meara's delightful reminiscences of Madame Mohl and her salon are concluded in the Atlantic Monthly, which is further remarkable for the continuation of "The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains," and for a terse, manly, and generous criticism on George Eliot by Henry James.

"My Friend Edith," in Temple Bar, is a very pretty story. There is nothing else of special note in the number; nor in the Gentleman's Magazine, except the continuation of Miss O'Hanlon's "Unforeseen," and Mr. Montague's extremely graphic pictures of the salt lakes of South Africa. "Cecil Power's" serial in Belgravia, "Babylon," continues full of spirit and sparkle; and Mr. Julian Hawthorne's "Love or a Name," though not a high-class novel, keeps the attention on the stretch. Miss Ida Taylor's "Ingénue" evinces considerable talent for comedy.

Other magazines will be noticed next week.

Dr. W. H. Russell will preside at the anniversary dinner of the Newspaper Press Fund, to be held at Willis's Rooms on the 16th inst.

A novel and attractive show—the Miniature Madame Tussaud's Exhibition—will take place at the Lady Egerton of Tatton's, 23, Rutland-gate, on May 21 and 22; and it bids fair to be one of the most successful charitable undertakings of the season. Tickets can be obtained from Miss M. T. Flower, 14, Norfolk-crescent, W. The festival is in aid of the Industrial Fund for the Girls' Friendly Society.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications relating to this department of the Paper should be addressed to the Editor, and have the word "Chess" written on the envelope.

E T (Clifton).—Of course we accept your problem, and it shall soon appear.

H B (C edition).—Very good, indeed; and very acceptable.

G A (City Club).—Many thanks for the game. We have used your notes, as we do not think we can improve them.

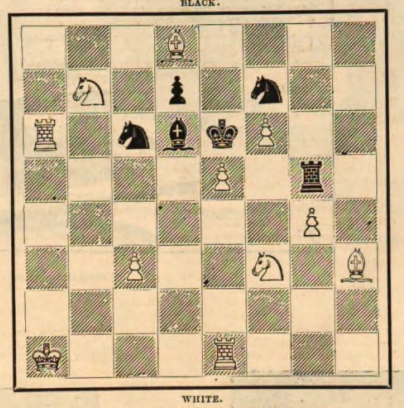
Rev. J W (Falcon).—Thanks for good wishes. We hope to hear from you frequently now the ice is broken.

Feeble (King's Lynn).—Take a course of the openings from Staunton's Handbook, and follow up with the pawn end-games in the same work. None of the more modern works are to be obtained through the ordinary channels, being, for the most part, out of print.

G E K (Southsea).—Problem No. 2141 cannot be solved as you suggest. Take your own moves 1. R to Q B 3rd, K to B 5th; 2. R to K Kt 3rd, K to K 5th; 3. B to Q Kt 7th, and now you say "mate" when there is no mate. What is to prevent Black playing 3. K to B 5th?

P S W (Shrivenham).—The first position could be solved by way of 1. Kt P takes P. The second we have not yet examined.

W D (Guernsey).—The four-move problem is unsuitable, but the one in two moves shall be examined.



C A L B (Teddington).—Neat enough. It shall be examined.

PROBLEM No. 2146.

By Walter Waring, M.A.

WHITE.

White to play, and mate in two moves.

A neat little Game played on the 27th ult. in the Winter Tournament of the City of London Chess Club, for which, with accompanying notes, we are indebted to Mr. George Adamson, honorary secretary of the club named. Mr. Adamson remarks: "It will be observed that the opening is a French defence, in which the first player adopts Steinitz's variation, 3. P to K 5th. This weak Pawn becomes the object of an attack, which Black steadily prosecutes up to the 17th move, when it falls. When too late, Black discovers that the object of his pursuit was the bait of a trap, and that in snatching it he has been caught."

(French Defence.)

WHITE (Mr. Woolley).	BLACK (Mr. Durrant).
1. P to K 4th	P to K 3rd
2. P to Q 4th	P to Q 4th
3. P to K 5th	P to Q B 4th
4. P to Q B 3rd	P takes P
5. P takes P	B to Q Kt 5th (ch)
6. Kt to Q 2nd	B to R 4th

Fearing 7. Q to R 4th (ch), and 8. B to Q Kt 5th.

7. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd
8. B to Q Kt 5th	K Kt to K 2nd

If 13. Kt takes P, then 14. Q to R 5th, &c.

WHITE (Mr. Woolley).	BLACK (Mr. Durrant).
14. P takes Kt	Q to K sq

He cannot take the Pawn, but 14. Kt to Kt 3rd is better than the move in the text.

15. B takes P (ch)	K to R sq

If 15. K takes B, then 16. Q to B 2nd (ch) recovers the piece.

16. Kt to K B 3rd	Q to K R 4th
17. B to Q B 2nd	B takes P

Swallowing the bait!

18. Kt takes B	Q takes Kt
19. R to K sq	Q to B 3rd

He can do nothing better. If he take the Q R he will be mated in four moves.

20. Q to R 5th (ch)	K to Kt sq

White mates in three moves.

The Hon. James Russell Lowell unveiled the bust of Samuel Taylor Coleridge in Westminster Abbey on Thursday.

An address to the King of the Belgians, in recognition of his Majesty's services in respect to the Congo Free State, has been unanimously agreed to by the Court of Common Council.

On Thursday week the Upper and Lower House of Convocation met in the College Hall, Westminster, to receive from the Revision Company the revised version of the Old Testament. A vote of thanks to the revisers was passed.

At the last meeting of the St. Giles's District Board of Works, it was resolved to spend £200 in planting plane-trees along such portion of the new street (from New Oxford-street to Piccadilly) as is within the jurisdiction of the Board.

Viscount Hampden (late Speaker of the House of Commons) will preside at the Anniversary Festival of the Cabdrivers' Benevolent Association, to be held at Willis's Rooms on Saturday, June 27. The object of the festival is to increase the amount of the annuity fund, so as to enable a few more aged, worn-out, but deserving cabdrivers to be chosen as pensioners at £20 a year each.

The Duke of Northumberland presided last week, at Willis's Rooms, at the annual festival of the Friends of the Clergy Corporation—an association formed for allowing pensions to widows and orphan unmarried daughters of clergymen of the Established Church, and for affording temporary assistance to necessitous clergymen and their families. It was announced that subscriptions to the amount of nearly £1000 had been promised.

The fifteenth report of the Representative Body of the Church of Ireland shows that the contributions received by that body from all sources during 1884 amounted to £190,611, an increase on the receipts of the previous year of over £12,000. The total assets on Jan. 1, 1885, stood at £7,210,563. It is stated that, unless some considerable improvement takes place in the funds of the Church, the average income of the clergy is likely to be about £200 per annum.

The company of "Pastoral Players," of which Lady Archibald Campbell is the president, will give a series of representations in the grounds of Coombe House, Kingston-on-Thames, under the immediate patronage of the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Crown Prince and Princess of Germany, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, Prince and Princess Christian, Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne. "As You Like It" will be played on May 28, 29, and 30, and again on July 14, 15, and 16. On June 29 and 30 and July 1 "The Faithfull Shepherdesse" will be produced. The plays are under the direction of Mr. E. W. Godwin, who so successfully arranged "As You Like It" last year.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Feb. 10, 1880) of Sir Thomas Bazley, Bart., formerly of Eyford Park, Gloucestershire, and for many years M.P. for Manchester, who died at Rivers leigh, Lytham, on March 18 last, was proved at the district registry of Lancaster on the 21st ult. by his widow, Mary, Lady Bazley, and Sir Thomas S. Bazley, the present Baronet, the executors named in the will. The value of the personal estate amounted to £92,000. With the exception of a few unimportant legacies, chiefly to domestic servants, the property is bequeathed to the said Thomas Sebastian Bazley (only child of the testator), subject to the payment, for her life, of one half of the total annual income to the Dowager Lady Bazley.

The Irish Probate, granted at Dublin, of the will (dated Feb. 27, 1857) of Sir William Compton Domville, Bart., late of Heywood, Ballinakill, Queen's County, who died on Sept. 20 last, to Dame Caroline Domville, the widow, and sole executrix, was re-sealed in London on the 8th ult., the value of the personal estate in England and Ireland exceeding £14,000. After providing for the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, the testator gives all the residue of his property to his wife, absolutely.

The will (dated Feb. 16, 1882) of Mr. Colin Minton Campbell, J.P., D.L., M.P. for the northern division of Staffordshire from 1874 to 1880, late of Woodseat, Rocester, Staffordshire, who died on Feb. 8 last, was proved on the 23rd ult. by John Fitzherbert Campbell, the son, Herbert Campbell, the brother, and Samuel Herbert Cooper, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £189,000. The testator gives to his wife, Mrs. Louisa Wilmot Campbell, £2000, £1000 per annum, for life, subject to reduction if she marries again, enters a convent or nunnery, or adopts a conventual life, and (on the cesser therein of a relative's interest) a residence, with the furniture and effects, at Torquay, or, if she does not elect to use it, a further sum of £200 per annum, for life; he confirms their marriage settlement, and declares that the provision made for his wife by his will is in addition to, and not in substitution of, that in the settlement. Upon trust for his daughters, Jessie Louise, Mary Emmeline, and Constance Lilian, £20,000 each; and all his real estate and the residue of the personalty to his said son. Provision is made in respect of his shares in the partnership businesses of Campbell and Co., tile manufacturers, and Minton and Co., china and earthenware manufacturers.

The Scotch Confirmation, under seal of the Commissariot of the county of Edinburgh, of the holograph trust disposition and settlement (dated Aug. 6, 1873) of Mr. John Fraser, Manager of the Life Association of Scotland, late of No. 13, Moray-place, Edinburgh, who died on Jan. 31 last, granted to Alexander Fraser, the brother, Major-General Robert Farquhar Webster, Mrs. Susan Foulis Webster, or Fraser, the widow, and four others, the executors nominate, was sealed in London on the 1st ult., the value of the personal estate in England and Scotland amounting to over £71,000.

The will (dated April 16, 1855) of Doña Francisca del Valle, late of Sancti Spiritus, in the Island of Cuba, who died on June 8 last, at Havana, was proved in London on March 31 by Don Antonio Ysnaga del Valle, the son, the executor in the second place, the value of the personal estate in England amounting to over £55,000. The testatrix leaves one fifth of her property, subject to the payment thereout of some legacies, to her husband, Don Roque de Lara, who, however, died in her lifetime; and she appoints as her universal heirs her children, Doña Maria de la Natividad, Don José Maria, Don Antonio, Don Pablo, and Doña Maria de la Concepcion.

The will (dated Feb. 1, 1872) of Don Roque de Lara y Campos, late of Trinidad and of Sancti Spiritus, both in the island of Cuba, who died at Havana April 21, 1884, was proved in London on March 31 last by Don Antonio Ysnaga del Valle, the executor in the second place, the value of the personal estate in England amounting to upwards of £31,000. The testator leaves 1000 dols. to be distributed among poor mendicants and modest poor, and directs that the expenses of his funeral and burial be economised in favour of the same; provision is made for the freeing of two slaves on the death of his wife; and there are some other bequests. He names as his universal heiress his wife, Doña Francisca del Valle, failing whom her legitimate children, Don José Maria, Don Antonio, Don Pablo, and Doña Maria de la Concepcion Ysnaga del Valle.

The will (dated Jan. 6, 1882) of Colonel Frederick Gustavus Burnaby, late of Somerby Hall, Leicestershire, who died on Jan. 17 last, at Abou Klea, was proved on the 18th ult. by Mrs. Elizabeth Alice Frances Hawkins Burnaby, the widow, and sole executrix, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £17,000. An imperfect statement of the contents of this will has been given in some papers; the following account may be relied on as correct. The testator appoints his wife guardian for her life of his children, under age at his decease, and at her death appoints Lady Hawkins Whitsted and Valentine Baker Pacha guardians of his said children; should this last named appointment take effect, then he bequeaths to them £500 each. All his real estate and the residue of his personal estate he leaves to his wife, absolutely.

The will (dated Jan. 15, 1834) of Major-General Charles George Gordon, C.B., late of No. 5, Rockstone-place, Southampton, who died on Jan. 26 last, at Khartoum, was proved on the 23rd ult., by Sir Henry William Gordon, K.C.B., the brother, one of the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to £2205. The testator leaves all his real and personal estate, upon trust, to pay the income to his sister, Miss Mary Augusta Gordon, for life; at her death his property is to be divided into eighty-two shares, and distributed among his nephews and nieces in various proportions.

The annual general meeting of the supporters of the London Homœopathic Hospital and Medical School was held on Thursday week, under the presidency of Lord Ebury. The report showed a marked degree of prosperity. Further additions to the endowed beds have been made, and one lady has endowed a bed in perpetuity by a gift of £1000.

The report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Westminster Hall restoration has been issued. The committee are substantially in favour of the adoption of Mr. Pearson's plans. It is recommended that, among other things, there should be provided four rooms of sufficient size to be used as conference or deputation rooms. Such rooms might also, it is suggested, be used by Royal Commissions. Mr. Pearson estimates the total cost of carrying out his designs at £35,300.

The earliest of the official brigade drills for the metropolitan Volunteers took place in Hyde Park last Saturday under the command of Colonel Clive, Grenadier Guards. The battalions taking part in it were the 2nd City Rifles, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Cantlon, and the 3rd London Rifles, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Lauric, with whom was the new adjutant, Captain Wilson, 60th Rifles. The usual movements were gone through with commendable precision. — On Wimbledon-common the 2nd South Middlesex Rifles and the London Scottish had instructive tactical exercises.

ROYAL INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

SECOND NOTICE.

Amongst the landscapes of the exhibition, Mr. R. W. Macbeth's "Fen Farm" (825), which is either a reproduction of, or the original study for, his oil picture exhibited at the Royal Academy last season, will probably take the first place in popular favour, and is interesting as a complement to both the oil-painting and the etching of this work. Mr. Keeley Halswelle is not numerously represented; but of his two pictures, the view of "Christchurch, Hants" (950), will rank very high amongst his works. The fine old church—altogether out of proportion to the present requirements of this decayed town—rises above the red house-tops, and stands with clear-cut outline against the blue sky. In the foreground is a wide expanse of tranquil water, round which rushes and flowering grasses of all sorts are springing into blossom and beauty. Mr. Edwin H. Fahey, whose affection for stagnant backwaters and mill pools is so well known, contributes studies from "The Thames" (54), "The Avon" (517), and "The Yare" (758), of which the first-named, with its view of Windsor Castle, is the most elaborate, but is wanting in that quality of atmosphere which is inseparable with evening on a river's side in this country. Mr. T. Collier's "Scene near Burley" (734) is filmly conceived, rendering with vigour that nearest approach to moorland scenery which our southern counties can provide. Mr. George Marks's "Chalk Pit" (90), in spite of the somewhat crude tone of the grass, is an effective piece of work, but scarcely equal in value and not be compared for vigour with Mr. Joseph Knight's "Moorland" (144), or his flat sands of "Cardigan Bay" (185), or the deep tones and fine drawing of "Clouds Lingering Yet" (911). Of Mr. G. Clausen's three works, all marked by a richness of colouring, "The Harvest" (518) is the most striking. The contrast of labour and rest, as shown in the figure of the man binding up the corn, and in the evening air which pervades the picture, is most happily touched, whilst the rays of the setting sun, as they catch the tops of the "stooks" and fall upon the tired girl, are full of deep suggestiveness. The renderings of "Hampton Court Palace" (484), and the "Great Avenue" (1061), by Mr. Fulleylove, show that whilst he can reproduce in water colours effects which won him so much praise as an oil painter, his views of Tenby prove him sympathetic with nature as she is, as well as with nature as modified by art.

The principal sea-pieces of the year include Mr. Napier Hemy's "Pilchard Fishery" (192), a most remarkable work, full of busy life. The moment chosen is when the boats, having drawn together, have inclosed a rich shoal, and all their occupants are busy in securing the prize. The colour of the water, with the drifting fleet in the background, the movement of the heaving sea, the eagerness of the fishermen, have been caught in a very remarkable manner, and it is doubtful whether a similarly difficult experiment in drawing has ever been more successfully tried. Mr. Huson's "Gift of the Storm" (24), some boys gathering seaweed, is poor in colour and harsh in tone; but Mr. H. G. Hine's "Durlestone Bay," darkened by a passing rain-cloud, is not without its attractions; and the same may be said of Mr. John Mogford's "Rocky Nook near the Lizard" (240), and of Mr. P'Anson's "Cottage by the Sea" (269). Mr. Andrew Donaldson's "Pilot-Boat, Flushing" (334), is a careful study, in spite of an exaggerated blue which pervades this as well as his two views of "Haarlem" (180 and 968), and must militate against the popularity which, by his excellent draughtmanship, he would otherwise attain.

Among the figure-pictures a prominent place is due to Mr. E. J. Gregory's "Morning Callers" (423), the study for a work which, under another name, was exhibited in oils last year—two young girls on a house-boat moored among the trees and flowering rushes have attracted the attention of the river swans. The colour of the whole scene, the graceful attitude of the girls, and the natural dignity of the birds, are even more distinguishable in the present work than they were in its more finished production. Miss Jane Dealy's "Goes Maiden" (3) of four years old, with her Frisian cap and blue kirtle, is a clever and effective bit of drawing and colouring; as is Mr. Yeend King's "La Bergère" (14), in spite of a very red face—a girl figure leaning on her staff, whilst round the meadow where her sheep are grazing the quiet river winds; Mr. Hugh Carter's "My First Solo" (37), a boy playing the fiddle to his wondering sisters, is a capital bit of home life, of which the meaning is as obvious as that of Mr. W. L. Thomas's "Fleeting Shadows" (43) is obscure—a young child propped up with pillows is patting a collie, whose sympathy seems almost human; but the expression of the girl's face is not childlike, but almost weary, as if she and sorrow or pain had long been intimate. In spite of this drawback, it is a delicate work, showing a master hand. Mr. Seymour Lucas's "Piping Times of Peace" (478) is broadly and effectively painted: a "soldier of fortune" who has hung up his sword and hauberk, and is taking his ease at the inn with a pipe and flagon of beer.

Amongst the other works to which we would call attention are Mr. C. Earle's "Tivoli Gardens" (15), Mr. E. Norbury's "August Fair, Boulogne" (35), a bold, but not altogether successful, attempt to make a night-picture in a style different to Mr. Whistler's; Mr. R. H. Carter's "Grandfa'r's Pet" (25); Miss Christina Ross's "Old Bridge at Bewick" (638) and "Mouth of the Tweed" (57); Mr. G. C. Kerr's "Evening Tide, Leigh, Essex" (73); Mr. W. Follen Bishop's "Maple-durham Mill" (99); Mr. Peter Ghent's "Moonlight on the Mersey" (101); Mr. W. H. Millais' "Spring Reflections" (124), a very delicate bit of English landscape; Mr. Ed. Caldwell's "Stage-struck" (142), an amusing study of dog life; Miss Ellen G. Hill's "Companion of her Solitude" (149), an episode in the child life of George Sand; Mr. Claude Hayes's "Changing Quarters" (158), a scene of gipsy life; M. Jules Lessore's delicate exterior of "St. Maclou" (176), and "Shoreham" (128); Mr. T. Pyne's "Hayfield" (197); Mr. John Watkins's "Une Vielle Paysanne" (201); Mr. P. Mitchell's "Fisherman's Haunts" (224), a nook on Dartmoor; Mr. C. E. Holloway's "King's Lynn" (282), "Gravesend" (421), and "Tower of London" (560); Mr. J. Aumonier's "Hastings Downs" (982 and 306); Mr H. R. Steer's "Evicted" (347), which, in spite of its poorness in colour and plagiarism of Hogarth, has many strong points; Mr. W. L. Wyllie's "Gill's Yard" (358); "The City of Rochester" discharging (532) and "The Providence" repairing (711); Mr. H. G. Hine's "Cuckmere Haven" (451), with its white cliffs and blue sea; Mr. G. S. Walter's "Sunshine and Shower" (481); Mr. John Scott's two scenes from Anderson's well-known story of "The Marsh King's Daughter" (510 and 873); Mr. Edwin Hayes' half-dozen sea-pieces, especially the "Pilot-Boat off the Mumbles" (513) and "Dover Roads" (926); Mr. Sherrin's animal studies, "Golden Plover" (545), "Stopped in his Flight" (573), and "On the Alert" (585)—two rabbits. Mr. Arthur Severn's "Silver Sea" (594) and "Barge in the Ice" (983); Mr. Wake Cook's "Arundel" (466); and Mr. Henry J. Stock's very imaginative works, "Man in the Clouds of Mortality" (690) and "Immortality Rescuing the Soul" (1050).

MR. GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA IN SYDNEY.

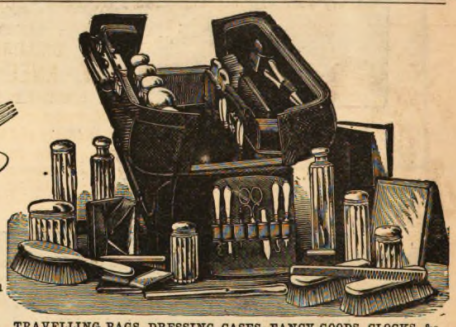
The Sydney Morning Herald of March 19 says:—"One of the most noteworthy incidents in our social life during the past week or two was the arrival by the mail steamer from San Francisco of Mr. G. A. Sala, who remained two or three days in Sydney before proceeding to Melbourne to commence his lecturing tour. Mr. Sala met with a very warm reception. The Mayor (Mr. Thomas Playfair), on the day after his arrival, invited him to an entertainment at the Townhall, at which Mr. Sala was introduced to a number of leading citizens; and on Saturday night last he was banqueted by the members of the Athenæum Club, at their premises in Hunter-street. Mr. J. R. Fairfax, president of the club, took the chair, having the guest of the evening and the Hon. W. B. Dalley, Acting Colonial Secretary, on his right hand. Mr. Dalley, in proposing the health of Mr. Sala, made one of his usual felicitous speeches, in which he paid a high compliment to Mr. Sala's literary powers. Mr. Sala made a most interesting speech in reply, alluding to the struggles and difficulties he had gone through, and claimed that he had never been false either to his own convictions or to the cause of journalism. He stated that one of the objects with which he had come to Australia was to describe it to the people of England as it really is, exaggerating nothing, but placing a faithful picture before his readers. Dr. Brereton, Mr. Curnow, Mr. F. Ward, Sir Patrick Jennings, and the Hon. E. Barton (Speaker), also delivered addresses, and the gathering was all through one of the most brilliant and most enjoyable that we have had in Sydney for many a day."

The Duke of Northumberland presided on the 1st inst. over the annual meeting of the Royal Institution.

The London Corporation has voted 100 guineas to the Gordon Memorial Fund at the Mansion House.

Mr. Gladstone visited the Institution of Civil Engineers last Saturday morning, and was shown the working of a new machine gun.

Mr. F. A. Bevan presided on Thursday week at the festival of the Home for Incurables, when subscriptions were announced to the amount of £1750.



The trustees of the British Museum have (says the correspondent of the Manchester Guardian) acquired a beautiful drawing attributed to Filippo Lippi. It represents the Madonna seated, supporting the Child on her knee, while on each side of the throne are two saints. It is executed in pen and bistre. Fra Filippo was born about 1406, in Florence, and died in 1469.

In the presence of a large assembly of the Roman Catholic nobility, gentry, and priests of the Archdiocese of Westminster, a congratulatory address, and a purse of gold containing £2000, were on the 1st inst. presented by the Duke of Norfolk on behalf of the Catholic body of the metropolis to the Right Rev. Monsignor Gilbert, D.D., who for twenty-five years has discharged the duties of Vicar-General of the Archdiocese of Westminster.

Professor Vambéry, at the Society of Arts yesterday week, read a paper on Herat, of which, in 1869, he had spoken as the gate of India. Herat, he maintained, was a place of great importance in many respects; it was a jewel that had been coveted by every conqueror, as it was still coveted to-day. The inhabitants hated the Afghans and Persians, and their loftiest idea had always been the independence of Herat. To the present day, said M. Vambéry, Herat was the traditional highway to India.

THE "LOUIS" VELVETEEN IS "The favourite and most fashionable material of the day."

THE WEAR OF EVERY YARD IS GUARANTEED by the Manufacturer, and every yard of the genuine bears the name "LOUIS."

Patterns and prices post-free from nearly all drapers throughout the kingdom.

The strictest examiner may try every test of touch and sight without discovering that these are other than the Genoa Velvets which they so closely resemble, while the peculiar arrangements resulting in the fast woven pile enable them to stand interminable and rough wear, which would ruin real velvets at four times the price. For Costumes and Trimmings it is unequalled, and, in fact, for all purposes in which Silk Velvet may be used we specially recommend the "LOUIS" VELVETEEN.

Every yard of the genuine bears the name "LOUIS."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood stated publicly in Court that Dr. J. Collis Browne was undoubtedly the inventor of Chlorodyne; that the whole story of the defendant Freeman was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See the "Times," July 13, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—The Right Hon. Earl Russell communicated to the College of Physicians and J. T. Davenport that he had received information to the effect that the only remedy of any service in cholera was Chlorodyne.—See "Lancet," Dec. 31, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Extract from the "Medical Times," Jan. 12, 1863:—"In general body by scores of orthodox practitioners. Of course, it would not be thus singularly popular did it not supply a want and fill a place."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the best and most certain remedy in Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Consumption, Neuralgia, Rheumatism, &c.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a certain cure in Cholera, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, &c.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—CAUTION.—None genuine without the words "Dr. J. Collis Browne's Chlorodyne" on the Government Stamp. Overwhelming medical testimony accompanies each Bottle. SIR HENRY MARSH, BART., M.D., Physician in Ordinary to the Queen in Ireland.

"I consider Dr. De Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil to be a very pure Oil, not likely to create disgust, and a therapeutic agent of great value."

DR. GRANVILLE, F.R.S.,
Author of "The Spas of Germany."

"Dr. De Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil does not cause the nausea and indigestion too often consequent on the administration of the Pale Oils."

DR. EDGAR SHEPPARD,
Professor of Psychological Medicine, King's College.

"Dr. De Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil has the rare excellence of being well borne and assimilated by stomachs which reject the ordinary Oils."

SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, BART., M.D.,
Physician to the Westminster Hospital.

"The value of Dr. De Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine."

DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL,
Physician to the Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.

"In Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, Dr. De Jongh's Oil possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod-Liver Oil with which I am acquainted."

DR. HUNTER SEMPLE,
Physician to the Hospital for Diseases of the Throat.

"I have found Dr. De Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil very useful in cases of Chronic Cough, and especially in Laryngeal Disease complicated with Consumption."

GENERAL GHOUS-UD-DIN KHAN, COMMANDER OF THE AFGHAN TROOPS AT PENJDEH, WITH HIS AFGHAN SOLDIERS.
FROM A SKETCH BY MR. W. SIMPSON, OUR SPECIAL ARTIST WITH THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

The history of expensive yearlings is not very encouraging to "spirited" purchasers. Take the Two Thousand Guineas race of this year as an example. Of the seven that ran, Paradox, the winner, cost the comparatively moderate sum of 700 guineas as a yearling (though at two years of age the Duke of Westminster is said to have paid 6000 guineas for him, and to have sold him, after his failure in the Middle Park Plate, for 5000 guineas to Mr. Brodrick Cloete); the Chopette colt, the second, cost 800 guineas; the Child of the Mist, the third, was of the owner's own breeding; but of the unplaced four, Langwell, the only one that was obtained by purchase, cost 1150 guineas as a yearling. As for Rosy Morn, who cost 2000 guineas as a yearling and unfortunately turned roarer, he certainly won £1947 at two years of age, but not a stiver more; and Goldsmith, who cost 2550 guineas as a yearling; Brother to Althotas, who cost 1250 guineas; Anglesey, who cost 1000 guineas; Lucebit, who cost 1050 guineas; and St. Honorat, who cost 4000 guineas at two years of age—all these did not so much as run for the Guineas, and seem to have been very bad bargains. Of the two-year-olds that have run as yet this season, the most successful has been The Bard, who cost as a yearling only 650 guineas, and has already won nearly five thousand in stakes. That is the sort of hit to make. When you can get an Eclipse for 150 guineas, a Musjid for about the same amount (only purchasers would not give so much for him, though he afterwards won the Derby), a Caractacus for some three hundred, a Voltigeur for a hundred (at which price he was "sent away" unbought as a yearling), one is inclined to ask, in the words of a frequent advertisement: "Why give more?" The answer, of course, is that "some men has plenty money and no brains," as the Claimant observed, and so they give 4100 guineas for a Maximilian as a yearling, and the first race he wins is a handicap of less than £300 at four years of age.

Readers of the huge report issued last week by the Commission on the Housing of the Poor are not likely, until they forget what they have read, to boast much of our civilisation. Overcrowding—one of the great evils of great cities—brings in its train disease and immorality, and prevents the possibility of rising into a higher life. The lethargy caused by this state of things among the poor themselves seems to have extended to local authorities. Nor is this all, for too often abuses have been allowed by vestries from interested motives. The existing Acts, if carried out, would have relieved much misery; but the love of money-making has proved stronger than justice and humanity, and even the railway companies are said constantly to avoid the obligation of providing for the families they displace. The recommendations of the Commissioners are, of course, numerous. Among the most important of them may be mentioned the stringent application of the sanitary and other Acts now in existence, the appointment of more and better qualified inspectors, the removal of the London prisons, and the conveyance of the sites to the Metropolitan Board for the erection of dwellings. The evils caused by congestion in great cities are patent enough; the remedies are not so obvious. Acts of Parliament can do something, and doubtless there is virtue in compulsion; but no Act will do away with the greed and selfishness that stand in the way of progress. Man's inhumanity to man—an inhumanity displayed by indifference as well as by overt acts—is at the root of much of the misery which the Commissioners have been so loyally striving to diminish.

Ever since the date of the Fire of London, at which time tennis was introduced into England, it has always been a most popular game with all classes. But though there have been professional players whose mission has been chiefly to instruct aspirants, there has been an absence of match-making and striving after championships which has tended to degrade so many other sports. Foot-racing, rowing, cricket, and bicycling, have all in their turn degenerated by so-called international competitions. These have generally been organised with the object, not of seeing the better man win, but of extracting as many shillings as possible from the pockets of those who desired to witness the trials. The result has been collections of mobs of the lower classes, who bet, misconduct themselves, and encourage rowdyism. America has now challenged England to a tennis-match—Lambert, of Lord's Ground, and Pettitt, of Boston, respectively, representing their nations. No inconvenience is likely to result from one such bout; but it will be a pity if so-called professional tennis-playing be countenanced, so that the game be allowed to sink to the level of boxing and wrestling matches.

The late Earl of Dudley, whose familiar figure was known to modern Londoners only as that of a weak and ailing old man, was one of the foremost athletes and sportsmen of his time. When at Oxford, in the years 1841 and 1842, he, then Lord Ward, was accounted one of the fastest bowlers at cricket which the University had known. Twice he played in the Eleven against Cambridge, in each of the matches obtaining a large percentage of the light-blue wickets. He was also a magnificent billiard-player, and his delight, twenty years ago, used to be to play "fancy" games with the then champion, John Roberts, senior. On one occasion the professional used his umbrella against the Earl's cue, the latter conceding points and winning a close and exciting match, the originality of which caused great amusement at the time to those interested in the game.

The war in the Soudan appears to be dying out gradually of itself, like a burnt candle; but it will leave behind it a strong smell of income tax.

Laws have altered, prisons have altered; but the instinct of prisoners remains the same at all times. This week a convict was sentenced at Middlesex Sessions to five years' penal servitude for breaking out of Holloway Jail, while detained there on a charge of felony. For the same offence the notorious Jack Sheppard was hanged. But this latter man was made a hero, and his life deemed of sufficient interest to occupy no less accomplished a novelist than Harrison Ainsworth; and a drama on the same subject was an immense success. Mrs. Keeley played the part of the highwayman at the Adelphi Theatre for what was an unusually long run in those days, and subsequently repeated her performance in Paris. We hear of little misguided urchins committing all sorts of offences because they have been fired by pernicious literature, and emulate the deeds of Jack Sheppard. The poor wretch Oxley, who climbed a stack of timber fifty yards high, and dived into a canal and swam forty yards, but was captured on a housetop after what is unpitifully called "an exciting chase," has been sent back prosaically to durance vile, and the world will probably hear no more of him. For his sake, let us hope not.

M. Emile Zola is engaged on a dramatic version of his novel "Germinal," which will be produced at the Ambigu, or Porte St. Martin Theatre, in Paris, in the ensuing autumn. The great sensation scene will be an explosion in a coal-mine, a situation already used by two English dramatists, the late Charles Reade and Mr. Henry Pettitt, in an Adelphi melodrama called "Love or Money." The great French realist, though he has had a hand with dramatisation of his other works, has not avowed himself as the author of the plays. "Germinal" will be an exception.

Since Max O'Rell, a French author, published his views on English society under the title of "John Bull and His Isle," and followed it up with "The Daughters of John Bull," and "A Foreign Resident" has written a work descriptive of "Society in London" according to his lights, it is almost refreshing to observe a French newspaper which openly avows its ignorance on these matters. A daily journal published in Bordeaux is certainly original in its statements regarding the English aristocracy. Here is a paragraph, presumably intended to announce the marriage of Gladys, Countess of Lonsdale, with Earl De Grey, eldest son of the Marquis of Ripon:—"Yesterday, at the Church of St. Martin, in the environs of London, took place the marriage of Madame Gladys, Duchess Dowager of Londesal, to Milor Robinson, Count De Grey. The bride belongs to the highest and most ancient nobility of England, and is the sister of the Count of Pembroke-Wilton. The bridegroom, on the contrary, is the eldest son of that Marquis de Ripoy who was the first of the Nababs to be ennobled by her Britannic Majesty." The "on the contrary" is delicious.

When a candidate for the Derby wins the Two Thousand by a head only, it is reasonable enough for his friends to be alarmed for his chances of the greater event; especially when there is a formidable competitor, who did not run for the Two Thousand, to be reckoned with for the Derby. So that the followers of Paradox may well quake when they think of Melton, to say nothing of other horses that may compete at Epsom. Still, to win at all is better than to lose; and yet losers of the Two Thousand, like Octavius (third in 1812), Whisker (not placed in 1815), Daniel O'Rourke (not placed in 1852), Kettledrum (second by three lengths to Diophantus in 1861), Kingcraft (third in 1870), Cremorne (second to Prince Charlie in 1872), Doncaster (not placed in 1873), Silvio (third in 1877), Sefton (third in 1878), Iroquois (second in 1881), St. Blaise (not placed in 1883), and Harvester (third last year) have won (for a dead-heat, not "run off," is as good as a "win") the subsequent Derby, and à fortiori should a winner of the Two Thousand (though he win but by the skin of his teeth) proceed to a further success at Epsom. On the other hand, the examples given may encourage the detractors of Paradox, seeing how often a loser of the Guineas (especially when second or third) has "illustrated" himself at Epsom. Thus both admirers and depreciators of Paradox may find balm to an equal extent by drawing perfectly legitimate but diametrically opposite conclusions; which is an unusual and a gratifying phenomenon.

It is not quite correct to say that the Derby has never been won by a nameless candidate; it was won in 1797 by an unnamed son of Fidget and Sister to Pharamond. Still, there is certainly a superstition in favour of giving a name before running a horse for the Derby; though old Lord Glasgow used to say—not without reason—that a horse should win a name by winning something worth having first: otherwise the name chosen may be most inappropriate; as was the case with the late Lord Stamford's Fortunatus, whose performances were such that he had to be renamed The Reverse.

The schools and colleges of the Southern States of America value the New Orleans Exposition very highly for educational purposes, and Professors, with fifty or sixty pupils, are continually arriving to spend a week or two in the city, and examine the exhibits. The interest with which young people thus escorted listen to the explanations given by exhibitors is quite refreshing, and in marked contrast with the demeanour on similar occasions of British children. Our boys and girls go stolidly through an exhibition, and appear to regard the acquisition of useful knowledge as a bore. They are ready enough to learn in school-time, but what they dislike and set their faces against is the admixture of instruction with recreation.

People who are accustomed to live in and near our great cities have very little idea of the rapid rate at which respectable farmers and their sons are emigrating, or of the number of English farms and homesteads untenanted even at marvellously reduced rents. No less than eighty-five vigorous young men of the yeoman class from the old country passed through Montreal on May 1, on their way to settle on farms in the great North-West, and they spoke of themselves merely as an advanced guard who would be followed by hundreds more.

Madame Christine Nilsson has been received in Paris with immense enthusiasm. The last time she was heard in the gay city was two years ago, at a fête given for the benefit of the sufferers at Ischia. Some great singer was taken ill at the last moment, and Christine Nilsson, who happened that day to be passing through Paris, en route for New York, came in her travelling costume, just as she was, and sang like a nightingale. She insisted, this spring, that her first appearance after her long absence should be for some work of charity; so she sang on behalf of the Blind, at the Trocadéro. Not only did she conscientiously go through every item on the programme, but sang several other favourite airs, winding up with a curious Swedish melody, and accompanying herself on the piano. Large as the stage of the Trocadéro is, it was literally covered with bouquets and baskets of flowers before the end of the evening.

The month of May, which is so rich in wild flowers, brings with it a couple that in provincial France are considered sovereign remedies for two of the worst physical ills that departing winter leaves as its legacy to mortals. An infusion of the yellow blossoms of the wild broom, the Plantagenista of our early English Kings, if taken internally, is supposed to remove all remnants of rheumatic affections; and a tisane made from the sweet flowers of the white hawthorn, or may, is invaluable for sore throats and glandular affections. We do not study "simples" half enough in this country, and yet when so large a proportion of our population is continually emigrating to the remote parts of the colonies, where they are out of the way of drugs and doctors, it would surely be a desirable branch of ordinary education.

How much one single intelligent and energetic woman may do for her country is exemplified at the Inventions Exhibition by the work of the Donegal Industrial Fund, an enterprise which sprang originally from the fertile brain of Mrs. Ernest Hart, and has been carried on by her to its present successful result. She has opened no less than seventy centres of work in various parts of Ireland, employed hundreds of workers, and brought thousands of pounds into the Emerald Isle during the last eighteen months. The Celtic flax-on-flax embroidery is the invention that justifies a place in the present exhibition, but the picturesque art fabrics, and beautiful hangings made by the hands of Irish peasant women, show how curiously akin to that of Oriental nations is the native eye for combination of colour and intricate design.

The Whip which was run for last week at Newmarket, whether it belonged to King Charles the Second, or to his favourite Buckingham, or to an equerry, or to a simple postillion, was in former times the most coveted of all prizes, as it was seldom run or challenged for by any but the best horses of the day; since 1795, for all its prestige and with the hair of Eclipse to form a wristband, there has been as often as not, or oftener than not, no challenge for it or no acceptance of the challenge. It was the trophy for which, in 1756, a Matchem and a Trajan ran to decide their relative merits; now it brings out a Cosmos and a Louis d'Or (bred in France), stout horses but of inferior class. That a French-bred horse should run at all for the Newmarket Whip is enough to make Mr. "Matchem" Fenwick, the "Butcher" Cumberland of "Dumplin" memory, and my Lord Grosvenor who owned "Pot8os," turn in their graves. In these times of "business" and "gate-meetings," when owners hunger after "public money," and when a winner of the Derby may fetch 14,000 guineas, gentlemen-sportsmen will not risk their most valuable horses over the four miles of the Beacon Course for a poor old whip, a paltry 200 guineas apiece, and, perhaps, a beating that would depreciate the beaten at the stud and in the market. "Autres temps, autres mœurs."

A May meeting of a novel and very charming kind took place on the 12th and 13th at South Kensington, when orchids from all parts of the world were gathered together under the auspices of the Royal Horticultural Society. The exhibition was simply lovely, and included varieties of "Ladies' Slippers" from Borneo and Peru, from the jungles of Hindostan, and the liana-tangled forests of tropical America. The "Moth" orchids from the Philippine Islands, and the Vandas from Java were in full force, and so were the Cattleyas, Dendrobes, and Odontiglossa. These were the aristocracy of the orchid tribes, and as one came out into the Exhibition-road there were women selling bunches of the plebeian meadow orchis, and on the Hampshire Downs the bee orchises are just peering out, and will probably be in bloom by Whitsuntide.

Mr. Robert MacLane, the new Minister of the United States to Paris, has been most happily chosen. He was educated at the Collége Bourbon, and there formed ties and friendships which he has kept up ever since. He has visited Paris whenever he could, and regards his future residence there with the feelings of a man returning to a circle where he is sure to find himself a welcome guest.

Roberts and Richards, to adopt the style of the nursery rhymes, were two pretty men; and last week they played two matches at billiards. The first, in which Mr. Roberts allowed Mr. Richards the "spot" and confined himself to "all round" in a game of 12,000 up, was a farce, and had to be broken off in the middle, as Mr. Richards, being out of practice, could do nothing with the "spot" and Mr. Roberts ran ahead so fast and so far that his antagonist could not see him; in the second, of 6000 points up, Mr. Richards receiving an allowance of 2000, "all round," the champion made some splendid breaks (250, 247, 207 202, 167, 153, 159, 129, 125, 121, 116, 109, 108, 106, and 105); but, like the Chopette colt in the Two Thousand, could not quite "get up," so that Mr. Richards, who only once made a break of three figures (118), won by 109. The Champion has never yet made 500 "all round"; but his country expects it of him, and even "a thousand up" should not be beyond his reach, if he has an eye to Westminster Abbey.

MUSIC.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY, DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

The production of the English version of M. Massenet's "Manon" occurred too late (on Thursday week) for notice until now. The work was originally brought out at Paris, in January 1884, and was first given, with the English text adapted by Mr. Joseph Bennett, by Mr. Carl Rosa's company at the Court Theatre, Liverpool, last January. The composer has for some years been eminent among French musicians. His most important work hitherto was "Le Roi de Lahore," produced at Paris in 1877, and brought out in an Italian version at our Royal Italian Opera-House some two years afterwards. As will readily be inferred, the book of "Manon" (by MM. Meilhac and Gille) is founded on the well-known romance by the Abbé Prévost; a clever but somewhat repulsive tale of heartlessness and profligacy. There is no need here to detail minutely all the incidents of the elopement of Manon—when on her way to a convent—with the Chevalier Des Grieux; their flight to Paris; her desertion of him in favour of a richer lover; the detection of the Chevalier in (unconsciously) cheating at cards at a gambling-house, through the treacherous agency of Manon's cousin, Lescaut, who is mixed up with much of the villany of the plot; the arrest of both Manon and the Chevalier as accomplices—they having renewed their acquaintance; the rescue of him by the Count, his father, and the final catastrophie of her death in the arms of her lover when on her way to transportation. The framework of the book offers some opportunities for contrasted musical effects, of which the composer has in several instances made good use. The concerted music of the opening scene in the courtyard of the inn at Amiens, with the bustle of arriving and departing travellers, is very animated. A pleasing air, "A simple maid," for Manon, a duet for her and the Chevalier, and an effective finale give interest to the music of the first act. The second act, which takes place in the retreat of the lovers at Paris, is brief, but contains a good duet for the pair, a dramatic quartet for them and De Bretigny (the wealthy rival) and Lescaut; and a charming air, "With Fancy's eye," for Des Grieux, which was one of the special successes of the evening. The third act is the longest, and opens with some very effective music, choral and solo, in the scene of the open-air fête in the Cours de la Reine. The interspersed dance music, in the antique style, has a good effect. In this act occurs a new scena, written by the composer expressly for Madame Marie Roze. It proved one of the principal successes of the evening, having been enthusiastically encored. In the following scene, the parlour in the Seminary of St. Sulpice, the snatches of sacred music introduced are not particularly happy, the best feature in the scene being the duet for Manon and Des Grieux, in which she gradually dissuades him from adopting a religious life, and persuades him to renew his acquaintance with her. The opening of the fourth act, in the gambling-saloon, contains some well-contrasted music—the contending emotions of the principal characters, the levity of the three actresses, Poussette, Javotte, and Rosette, and the angry disputation of the sharpers and their victims being well reflected by the composer. The closing scene contains little beyond the final duet for the dying Manon and her infatuated lover in which there is much dramatic expression.

The music of "Manon" is somewhat reflective of the influence which Wagner has so largely exercised over nearly all the composers of the present time. There are few distinct pieces which will bear severance from their stage associations. The orchestral details are rich and varied, and some of the climaxes are effective; and altogether, with good acting and singing, and an excellent mise-en-scène, the opera proved highly effective. Madame Marie Roze—as at Liverpool—acted and sang admirably in the title-character, and Mr. Maas gave the music of the Chevalier Des Grieux with great charm of voice and style, this being a change from the Liverpool cast, as was the Guillot Morfontaine of Mr. Charles Lyall, an excellent piece of humorous acting in the part of an old beau pretending to the good graces of Manon. Repetitions of the Liverpool cast were the Lescaut of Mr. Ludwig and the Count of Mr. Burgon, each of high efficiency, dramatic and vocal, Mr. W. Clifford having sustained the part of De Bretigny with gentlemanly beari g. Misses Bensberg, Fenn, and Burton were pleasing representatives of the lively actresses. The opera was well rendered throughout; the costumes and the mise-en-scène are excellent—Mr. Harris's skill in stage management being largely apparent. Mr. Goossens conducted ably.

The Philharmonic Society gave the fifth and last concert but one of the seventy-third season last week, when Herr Dvořák's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor was very finely played by Herr F. Rummel, the composer having conducted its performance. Of the concerto—an elaborate and characteristic work—we have already spoken. Other features of the concert now referred to require no comment beyond a recognition of the continued improvements in the orchestral performances since the appointment of Sir Arthur Sullivan as permanent conductor.

The Royal Society of Musicians gave the 147th anniversary festival at St. James's Hall last Thursday week, when Mr. Charles Santley presided. Our excellent baritone made a speech, in which he expressed doubts as to the great progress which music is alleged to have made in this country, excepting in so far as the excessive multiplication of students is concerned. Other speeches were made, and musical performances were contributed by several eminent artists. The subscriptions amounted to about £800.

The Sacred Harmonic Society gave its second annual conversazione—supplemental to its concert season—yesterday (Friday) week, when musical performances were contributed by several eminent artists. The proceedings took place in Prince's Hall, and the galleries of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours.

The third of the present series of Richter Concerts took place at St. James's Hall last Monday evening, when the performances opened with Beethoven's cantata, "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt"—for chorus and orchestra—a work that has been seldom heard. It was composed in 1815, and, although brief and not ranking among the most important of its composer's works, there is much beauty in it. Brahms's "Rhapsody" for alto solo, male chorus, and orchestra, was given for the first time here. It is conceived in a solemn style appropriate to Goethe's text, which suggested it. The alto solo passages were very well sung by Miss Lena Little. Other items of the programme require no comment.

Señor Sarasate's third orchestral concert at St. James's Hall, last Monday afternoon, brought forward a new concerto, composed by M. Bernard, which the great Spanish violinist performed with admirable skill and finish. The chief merit of the work consists in the opportunities afforded for the display of these qualities on the part of the executant. Other portions of the programme were too familiar to need comment. Mr. W. G. Cusins conducted, as before.

Mr. Charles Hallé began a new series of his excellent "Chamber-Music Concerts" at Prince's Hall, on Saturday afternoon, when he was assisted in his pianoforte performances by Madame Norman-Néruda (violin), and Herr Franz Néruda (violoncello). At the same time, that accomplished pianist, Mdlle. Kleeberg, gave a recital at St. James's Hall, with an interesting and varied programme.

Miss Emma Barnett gave a Pianoforte Recital at Prince's Hall on Monday afternoon, when she played a selection of pieces, classical and brilliant, with high technical skill and refined taste.

Madame Puzzi gave a "Matinée Musicale d'Invitation" at St. George's Hall, Langham-place, on Monday, when the programme included Mr. Randegger's pleasant little opera, "The Rival Beauties."

Herr Peiniger—a skilful violinist—gave the first of two recitals at Prince's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, the second being announced for May 26.

Madame Frickenhaus (pianist) and Herr Ludwig (violinist) began a new series of chamber concerts at Prince's Hall on Thursday evening, their programme having comprised solo and concerted instrumental music, and vocal duets contributed by Miss L. Phillips and Madame Fassett.

Madame Viard-Louis's interesting Beethoven Concerts, with herself as pianist, have entered a third series, the second matinée of which was announced for yesterday (Friday).

Mr. Ambrose Austin's concert at the Royal Albert Hall this (Saturday) afternoon offers rare attractions in the co-operation of some of the most eminent vocal and instrumental artists—an orchestra and chorus of large proportions being engaged, with Mr. W. G. Cusins as conductor.

Of the concert of Mr. Geaussent's choir, including the first performance of a Patriotic Hymn composed and conducted by Herr Dvořák, and the first hearing in St. James's Hall of Mr. McKenzie's cantata "Jason," we must speak next week.

A military concert, for the benefit of the Egyptian War fund, will be given next Monday evening at the Hôtel Métropole, Northumberland-avenue.

At the Highbury Athenæum next Monday will be given, by the Philharmonic Society of that locality, an evening concert. The programme will comprise "Constance of Calais" (an entirely new cantata, composed expressly for the society by Dr. Gladstone, to be performed on the 18th inst. for the first time), "Alexander's Feast," and Haydn's "Symphony No. 11."

Mr. Charlton J. Spear's fourth annual pianoforte recital is announced for next Wednesday evening at Prince's Hall.

The Balfe Memorial Concert at the Royal Albert Hall is to take place on June 10—not, as previously stated, on May 27.

Sir Julius Benedict, having recovered from his severe illness, is arranging for his annual morning concert, the date of which is, we believe, June 17. It is intended to include dramatic performances in the programme, some eminent members of the profession having volunteered their services.

Mr. Carl Weber's second annual concert was announced for Friday evening (May 15), at Prince's Hall—Miss Ida Weber, violinist, and Miss Hilda Wilson, vocalist, assisting.

Mrs. Dutton Cook's morning concert will take place on Wednesday afternoon, the 27th inst., at 1, Belgrave-square, by kind permission of Mr. R. D. Sassoon. The programme is of the most attractive character, including recitals by Mr. Wilson Barrett and Mrs. Bernard-Beere and an entertainment by Mr. George Grossmith.

Dr. Ferdinand Hiller died on Sunday, at Cologne, where he had resided for many years. He was born in 1811, and earned distinction as a pianist in his early youth, and soon became one of the most finished performers of his time. For many years, however, his chief attention was devoted to composition; his works—in almost every form, including operas, oratorios, symphonies, overtures, and a large quantity of pianoforte music—reaching a very great number. He was a man of extensive acquirements in other directions, and has left some interesting records of his intimate friendship with Mendelssohn.

TRIAL OF THE DYNAMITE CONSPIRATORS.

The trial of James Cunningham, alias Gilbert, and of Henry Burton, for treason-felony and conspiracy in procuring the dynamite explosions at the Tower of London and at the Houses of Parliament on Jan. 24, and at several other places in London upon previous occasions, was commenced on Monday at the Central Criminal Court, Old Bailey, before Mr. Justice Hawkins. The Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, Mr. Poland, and Mr. R. S. Wright conducted the prosecution on behalf of the Crown; Mr. H. C. Richards and Mr. H. E. Duke defended Cunningham; the prisoner Burton was represented by Mr. Little. The Attorney-General, Sir Henry James, stated the case, and a great number of witnesses gave evidence on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, persons employed at the Victoria Station, where the explosion took place on Jan. 26, 1884, at the Charing-cross, Ludgate-hill, Gower-street, and Broad-street Stations, at shops in London and Southampton, and at hotels and lodging-houses in Liverpool and in London, and at a cabinet-maker's workshop in Limehouse where Burton was employed for a short time. It was proved that both men came from America last December, but that Burton had been in London early last year, coming from France, and had returned to New York. The evidence, much of which is already familiar to readers of the proceedings at the Bow-street Police Court was partly occupied with descriptions of the boxes and bags in the possession of these men, and of the exploding apparatus discovered in the cloak-rooms of the railway stations, the action of which was explained by scientific experts. The circumstances of the actual explosions at the Victoria Station and on the Metropolitan Railway, in Scotland-yard and St. James's-square, and at the Tower and Westminster Palace, would afterwards be explained; but the trial could scarcely be finished by the end of the week. The extreme sentence would be penal servitude for life.

Notices of the Royal Academy, Grosvenor Gallery, and Paris Salon, and Reviews of New Books and Musical Publications, are unavoidably held over.

Lord Ashley presided on Tuesday afternoon, in Willis's Rooms, over the annual meeting of the members and friends of the General Domestic Servants' Benevolent Institute.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen entertained 300 of the residents of the Homes for Working Girls in London to tea at Stafford Rooms, on Monday evening.

The annual Italian ball for the benefit of the French Hospital and Italian Benevolent Society, was held on Tuesday night at the Freemasons' Tavern.

The Queen has honoured Mr. F. Sargent with her commands to submit his picture of her Majesty's Drawingroom, now being exhibited at 175, New Bond-street, to her Majesty at Buckingham Palace.

Lord John Manners, M.P., presided at the annual banquet of the Royal Literary Fund, held at Willis's Rooms, on the 6th inst., when a subscription-list, headed by the Queen's annual donation of £105, to the amount of £800 was announced.

Last week 2429 births and 1465 deaths were registered in London. The latter included 44 from smallpox, 91 from measles, 13 from scarlet fever, 24 from diphtheria, 46 from whooping-cough, 2 from typhus, and 12 from enteric fever. The deaths from smallpox were exclusive of 22 in the Metropolitan Asylum Hospitals.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

The House of Commons learnt on Tuesday from the highest source that it was within "a measurable distance" of Dissolution. Everybody knew the end could not be far off. But there was the inevitable shock when the Prime Minister on Tuesday made passing reference in the coolest manner to the gravely significant fact that the General Election would probably take place in "the latter part of the autumn." The prospect is not altogether reassuring to Liberals contemplating courting the new constituencies. Mr. Gladstone's Government have in the course of a few years gathered such a harvest of troubles abroad, and increased expenditure so vastly at home, that it will need considerable ingenuity to retain public confidence in the Liberal, Radical, and Whig leaders jointly responsible for the many sins of commission and of omission.

The truth is, the Conservative Party has never had in recent times a more favourable opportunity of returning to power. Could the Conservative chiefs but formulate a statesman-like and broad policy on "Tory-democratic" lines, and sincerely act up to it, they would in all probability gain the popular vote, and reach the haven of office once again. But the genius of Lord Beaconsfield is apparently needed to secure this result.

As regards both Russia and the Soudan, things have taken such a pacific turn that Parliament would hardly be surprised if the Prime Minister were to propose that swords should be turned into ploughshares. The Duke of Argyll has brought his logical mind to bear on the Russian advance in Asia. His Grace began his calming speech in the House of Lords on Monday, and was impartially bestowing his hits upon the Premier and the Marquis of Salisbury for their recent warlike addresses when he was interrupted by a painful incident. A cry escaped from a Peer seated on one of the benches behind the noble Duke; and consternation was caused when it was found that Lord Dormer had fallen back in a fit, and was insensible. His Lordship happily recovered in a quarter of an hour. But the Duke of Argyll did not resume his remarks till Tuesday, when he cited cogent reasons why India should be regarded as perfectly safe from attack. "When they do agree, their unanimity is wonderful." It was surprising to find for the nonce that the Marquis of Salisbury (who had previously formally explained that his Hackney aspersions of Russia were only meant in a Pickwickian sense) and the Earl of Kimberley and Lord Cranbrook coincided in the main with the Duke of Argyll's argument—the Opposition leaders not unnaturally entering a plea for the "scientific frontier" they had formerly prided themselves upon conceiving for India.

Monday's sitting in the Commons was very animated. The Marquis of Hartington, to begin with, had yet another explanation to offer with respect to the Soudan. His formal announcement that the British troops were to be withdrawn from the Soudan was received with ironical cheers from the Opposition, and with sympathetic cheers from the Radical benches. The noble Lord said the Government had decided to abandon the intention of advancing on Khartoum, and would withdraw our forces from Dongola to the "line of Wady Halfa or Assouan as the effective frontier of Egypt." Souakim is to be held until "arrangements for holding it by some other Power can be made." The Souakim-Berber railway is not to be pushed on as a military work; but it was implied that no discouragement would be offered to any commercial or philanthropical association which might be formed to continue the railway with the view of opening up the Soudan to civilisation. There is a possibility of this scheme, by-the-way, being tried.

It then became the duty of Mr. Gladstone to make a statement similar to that which Earl Granville had made a short time before in "another place." Repeating that the Penjdeh incident had been referred to the judgment of a friendly Sovereign, the Prime Minister added that Lords Granville and Kimberley had met M. De Staal and M. Lessar in consultation, and had arrived at an agreement with regard to the Afghan frontier. This agreement, as both Earl Granville and Mr. Gladstone stated in qualifying explanations on Tuesday, has been referred to the Russian Government for consideration. But the most hopeful feeling prevails—especially as the arrangement approved by the Foreign Secretary and the Russian Ambassador was said by Mr. Gladstone to have received the sanction of Lord Dufferin and the Council of India, whilst the Government have a "full assurance that we are acting in harmony with" the Ameer.

The Vote of Credit for £11,000,000 is still to be persevered with as a matter of prudence and safety. This Mr. Gladstone explained on Monday in moving the second reading of the Consolidated Fund Bill. Lord George Hamilton was not, however, to be dissuaded from moving his amendment in the most trenchant language: "That this House, having shown its readiness to grant such supplies as may be required for the defence of the Empire, is of opinion that, before proceeding with this bill, it is entitled to receive adequate information as to the present policy of her Majesty's Government in respect of the purposes to which the money granted by the recent Vote of Credit is to be applied." With similar pungency, Mr. Chamberlain replied, affording the noble Lord not only information but vigorous argument, the President of the Board of Trade easily moving Ministerialists to laughter, much as judges excite the mirth of budding barristers, by flinging this little quotation at the mover:—

> Proud of his speech, the King grew vain,
> And fought his battles o'er again;
> And thrice he routed all his foes,
> And thrice he slew the slain.

Like the British at Waterloo, Ministers never know when they are beaten. Thus, the Marquis of Hartington, nothing daunted by Lord Randolph Churchill's lively and witty philippic, came up smiling; and with equal cheeriness did Mr. Gladstone respond to Sir Stafford Northcote's attack. Still, Government only obtained a majority of 30—Lord George Hamilton's amendment being negatived by 290 against 260.

Her Majesty's message announcing the forthcoming marriage of Princess Beatrice and Prince Henry of Battenberg was brought up on Tuesday by Mr. Gladstone, and was received with customary courtesy by all save one or two irreconcilable followers of Mr. Parnell. Thursday was fixed for the consideration of the "suitable provision," opposition to which, on principle, was announced by Mr. Labouchere. It does not seem long ago since Sir Charles Dilke filled the same rôle.

Yet another tough fight took place on Tuesday evening over the Voters' Registration Bill, Sir Massey Lopes moving, "That the bill be recommitted for the purpose of receiving a clause providing for the repeal of so much of any Act or Acts relating to Parliamentary registration in counties and boroughs as makes the expenses of overseers of the poor and clerks of the peace or town clerks a legal charge upon the local rates." With spirit was the debate continued after the Premier had promised considerable grants in relief to the local rates. In view of Mr. Gladstone's parenthetical allusion to the proximity of the General Election, it may be accepted that there was real feeling in the resounding cheers with which Ministerialists greeted the announcement of the result of the division—rejection of the motion by 280 against 258 votes: a majority of 22 for the Government. Ere the House rose, Sir Henry James had the satisfaction of securing the third reading of the bill.

CHAPTER XXXII.

SOME FRIENDLY HINTS.

It was not without some trouble that Percy Kean persuaded Adrian to give up the idea of publishing a crushing reply to the Scorpion. "If your soul thirsts for vengeance," he said, "wait till you see a good opportunity of retaliating, and then come down upon them like a wolf on the fold. But I should strongly advise you to take no notice. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it is wiser to take no notice. Moreover, I have a notion that you won't write a great many more critiques for the Anglo-Saxon."

"You don't think it is paying, then?" asked Adrian, anxiously.

"I am quite sure it is not. With what amount of capital it started I don't know; but I will venture to prophesy that it will last just as long as that amount lasts, and no longer."

This was not pleasant hearing for Adrian; yet, when he was once more alone, it was less the probable collapse of the Anglo-Saxon that distressed him than the thought of that venomous article as to which he had been told that he would be wise to keep silence. How many people would understand the significance of the allusion to his private life he could not tell; but he feared that a good many would, at all events, perceive that the words conveyed an allusion of some kind. About this time he became nervously observant of trifles, and soon saw, or fancied he saw, that the nicest women of his acquaintance were not quite so cordial in their manner towards him as they had been, while the others were growing more so.

Walking up St. James's-street one day, he chanced upon Egerton, who stopped to speak to him, and while they were exchanging commonplaces it occurred to Adrian that he would ask this stanch supporter of the Anglo-Saxon to dinner. He would know, if anyone did, what the financial position of the paper was, and his nature was so communicative that he would be pretty sure to refer to the subject in the course of the evening, without being questioned.

"And I'll get Pilkington, if I can," Adrian added, after his invitation had been accepted.

"That will be very pleasant," said Egerton, looking down the street. "As it isn't the season, I dare say he'll come." Then he rather abruptly withdrew his eyes from contemplation of the clock-tower to raise them to his companion's face. "At your club, I think you said? Mrs. Vidal is still away, then?" he asked.

"She is still away," answered Adrian, a little surprised at the question; for he knew that Egerton was barely acquainted with his wife.

"Oh, indeed," said the other. "Well, I hope we shall see her back in London again before long." He paused for a moment, then repeated, "I hope we shall see her back before long." After which, he nodded and walked away.

This was tolerably plain speaking—so plain as to border upon impertinence; and what added emphasis to it was that Egerton was not, as a general thing, at all the kind of man to meddle with his neighbours' domestic concerns.

"I wish people would be good enough to mind their own business!" muttered Adrian, as he turned into Piccadilly.

But he ought to have known better than to waste his breath in such Utopian aspirations as that; and indeed it so happened that no later than the same evening he received an implied rebuke as unwelcome and as unexpected as Egerton's had been.

During the hunting season, Mr. Wilbraham was not very assiduous in his attendance at the House; but he ran up to London when he could spare the time, or when he was wanted to take part in a division, and Adrian not unfrequently encountered and exchanged salutations with him at evening parties. If their intercourse did not go farther than an amiable nod and smile on the one side and a gruff "How are you?" on the other, it was because Mr. Wilbraham had shown, in a manner not to be mistaken, that it gave him no sort of pleasure to talk to the popular young author. But now it seemed as if something out of the common must have induced him to abandon his attitude of armed neutrality in favour of a more aggressive one. His mien, at all events, was aggressive, if his words were not so, when he separated himself abruptly from a knot of friends with whom he had been conversing and barred Adrian's passage, saying: "I am told Mrs. Vidal is ill. I hope it is not true?"

"There is nothing serious the matter, thank you," answered Adrian, politely; "she has been a little out of sorts for some time."

"She never used to be out of sorts," returned the other, looking half inclined to pick a quarrel upon the strength of this statement. "She always appeared to me to have as good health as anybody."

"It is nothing serious," Adrian repeated. "She is not fond of London, and it has not agreed with her particularly well."

"I'm sure I don't wonder at it!" cried Wilbraham. "Nobody could keep well in such a polluted atmosphere. I can't think how you can have expected her to stand it."

"We should all like to have estates in the country," remarked Adrian, smiling; "but as that can't be managed, some of us are obliged to live in the polluted atmosphere."

"I should have thought one could write novels anywhere," said Wilbraham; "but of course one can't have a perpetual round of entertainments in the country." And with that he turned on his heel and strode off.

Such rudeness was intensely disagreeable to Adrian, who would not, if he could have helped it, have incurred the dislike of a single fellow-mortal. He went home that night feeling sincerely sorry for himself. He was altogether out of luck, he thought. He was certainly not as popular as he had been: the articles which he had written for the Anglo-Saxon had brought him little money and a great deal of vexation; and now, it seemed, he was commonly regarded as a bad husband. Nothing had gone well with him since that calamitous day when Clare had caught him entertaining Lady St. Austell in her drawing-room. His partner in misfortune had left town immediately afterwards, and he had heard no more of her. It was not likely that she would have spoken to anybody about their detection; but now Adrian began to wonder whether the story were not too good a one for Lord St. Austell to keep long to himself. If that had been divulged, it would be easy to understand the insinuations of the Scorpion, as well as the advice of his friends that he should submit to them in silence.

For some days he went about with a gloomy face, and was unusually short in his replies to those who accosted him. Nor did the dinner to which he had invited Egerton and Pilkington serve to raise his spirits. From the first moment, he saw that he had made a mistake in asking the two men to meet one another. It was plain that they were no longer upon such amicable terms as when he had last seen them together, Egerton in particular seeming to be out of temper, and disposed to differ in a fretful sort of way from the eminent person to whose opinions he had always hitherto shown himself so eager to say ditto. Pilkington, on his side, while maintaining his wonted courtesy, contrived, as courteous people often do contrive, to be excessively provoking, and led his friend into saying some very foolish things, of which he then, with the most delicate consideration, pointed out the folly. No reference was made to the Anglo-Saxon during dinner; but that something would be said about it before his guests departed Adrian was very sure; because, as he wanted to know the worst, he was resolved to introduce the topic himself.

Later in the evening, therefore, he said, with the innocent air of a disinterested seeker after information, "I hope the sale of the Anglo-Saxon continues to be satisfactory?"

Egerton rose like a trout at a May-fly. "Continues!—my dear fellow, it has never begun to be satisfactory. The first two or three numbers, perhaps—I believe they went off pretty well; but latterly it has been ruinous work. Simply ruinous, you know." And he looked somewhat indignantly at Pilkington, who blew a cloud of smoke from his cigarette and watched it floating upwards to the ceiling.

"The fact of the matter is," Egerton went on, "that we haven't gone to work quite in the right way. At least, so it seems to me; but of course I'm not a literary man, and I only judge by what I hear from others."

"When I accepted the editorship," said Pilkington, deliberately—"and, as you may remember, Egerton, I did so with some reluctance—I merely stipulated that I should be allowed to manage the paper in my own way. I never promised that that way should seem the right way to others; nor did I guarantee that the paper should pay."

"You said you thought it would."

"Well; I said I thought it would. That was my opinion, which I gave for what it was worth, on being asked for it. No one can regret its failure to pay more than I do; and I may add that I should regret it just as much even if I did not happen to have a money interest in it. If the chief proprietors think that it would prosper more under other management, I shall most willingly retire from my post. In fact, I have already thought more than once of doing so."

"Oh, come," expostulated Egerton, "you mustn't take it in that way, Pilkington; that wasn't at all what I meant. Your retirement would be the greatest possible loss to us, and—and I'm sure I hope you won't think of such a thing."

Pilkington smiled. "I don't know yet whether I shall retire or not," he answered; "but if I am scolded, I certainly shall." And soon after this he said Good-night.

"Pilkington's a deuced awkward sort of fellow to get on with," remarked Egerton, after he was gone. "You wouldn't think so to talk to him; but he is. All those little fads of his about having unusual paper and type, and so forth, have cost a lot of money, and as for his having a pecuniary interest in the undertaking—well, you know, that really doesn't amount to much. Nobody wants to dictate to him; but one has one's ideas, and he might at least condescend to listen to them. Instead of which, the moment that one hints at the possibility of his having made a mistake he begins to talk about resigning."

"He complains that that is the way in which his contributors treat him," remarked Adrian. "I suppose the truth is that all people who write much are apt to grow irritable. We don't get enough of fresh air and exercise."

"Perhaps that may be it. Anyhow, I don't think a man ought to be above being told of his mistakes, do you? If he had known of them, he wouldn't have made them, don't you see? Supposing I tell you that you have made a mistake in this or that, I take it that you, as a sensible man, will be rather grateful to me for letting you know of what you wouldn't have found out for yourself, eh?"

"Does that mean that you are going to tell me of some mistake that I have made?"

Egerton laughed. "Well, you know, I think it's rather a mistake to have such articles written about one as that in the Scorpion."

"It's a misfortune," said Adrian; "I really don't quite see how it's a mistake. You might as well say it's a mistake to get one's boots muddy on a wet day. I don't like muddy boots; but I know no way of keeping them clean, except staying at home. Of course, if I didn't write at all, the Scorpion couldn't make my writings an excuse for bespattering me."

"Ah, well," said Egerton, getting up; "you literary fellows are all the same; it isn't much use to give you friendly hints. Nevertheless, you needn't get covered with mud if you walk circumspectly—take my word for it."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

CONSOLATION.

In spite of Adrian's assertions to the contrary, Clare was really somewhat out of health. She had not mentioned the fact in her letters to her husband, so that it was no fault of his if he was unaware of it; but it must be confessed that she had made the most of her indisposition to her parents, who were as firmly convinced as Wilbraham himself that she was in no state to brave the dangers of the London atmosphere.

"I wish we could get poor Adrian down here too," Mrs. Irvine was wont to say to her friends; "it can't be good for him to slave night and day as he does. But his work obliges him to remain within reach of the British Museum, you know, and—and such places; and it is very kind and unselfish of him to spare Clare to us for so long."

With the early spring, however, the roses came back to Clare's cheeks, and then she herself perceived that she had no excuse for neglecting her duties any longer. She was stronger by this time, and had to some extent—or so she believed—lived down her trouble. But, in truth, such troubles can only be lived down by means of a little wholesome indifference; and this Clare had not been able to acquire. She returned to London determined to endure what could not be cured, and to show a brave front to misfortune in the future; but, as she still loved her husband, and still despised herself for loving a man who had deceived her, the chance that these excellent resolutions would be kept was but a poor one.

Adrian was waiting for her at the terminus, and the moment that she caught sight of him on the platform she was struck with the change in his appearance. He was thinner, paler, and his face had a worn, anxious expression which she was puzzled to account for. Was he, too, unhappy, then? In spite of herself, her heart softened towards him; and because she felt that it was softening, she made her greeting somewhat colder and more formal than it need have been, even in that public place.

"Have you been—quite well?" she asked, hesitatingly, when her luggage had been collected, and she was driving away from the station with her husband. Her voice sounded harsh as she put the question, and Adrian could not tell that this was only the result of an effort to steady it.

"I'm all right, thanks," he answered, shortly. "And you are feeling better, I hope?"

"Yes," she said; and then there was a pause, after which Adrian began to speak about some small household matters.

In truth, he was not just then in the mood to make advances or to recognise any that might be made to him. Latterly, many annoyances, small and great, had made life disagreeable to him, and in his heart he was disposed to hold Clare responsible for them all. But for her, he would never have been held up to reprobation in the public press, nor quietly dropped, in private life, by certain ladies whose notice he had learnt to prize. But for her, he would have been less reckless in his expenditure than he had been during the last few months, and more attentive to his work, which he had begun to neglect or hurry over, with results which were painfully apparent to him. He thought she deserved some punishment for the trouble which she had brought upon them both, and he wished for no reconciliation that should not promise to be a permanent one. He remembered that his wife had tried to impose conditions upon him on a former occasion, and he was as determined as ever that he would not have conditions. She must trust him first. After that, he would willingly and of his own accord give up Lady St. Austell, or anyone else to whom she might object.

Theoretically, no doubt, there was something to be said in favour of this view; but if Adrian intended to wait until Clare acknowledged herself in the wrong, it seemed likely that he might wait until he was grey-headed; and in the meantime the house in Alexandra-gardens was not exactly an earthly paradise to either of its inmates. Both of them were miserable, and one of them happened also to be fretful. They tried to be distantly civil to one another; but there was no keeping it up. Distant civility was apt to degenerate into something like sulky silence: every now and then bitter little speeches forced their way out before they could be checked; and the husband and wife never felt at ease together unless some third person was present.

Thus, when Georgina suddenly appeared from the Arctic Circle, bringing with her a pair of reindeer's antlers, the skin of a Polar bear, and divers powerful-smelling garments as evidences of the genuineness of her expedition, she received a welcome so hearty that she could not entertain a doubt as to its sincerity. "My dear Georgina," Adrian said, gravely, "you will have to come to us forthwith; it's a case of simple necessity. Since you won't consent to live with your mother, like a well-conducted young woman, it is evident that your brother's house is the proper place for you, and I must insist upon taking you under my protection. The family can't afford to trifle with its character. Even as it is, an amiable weekly newspaper has been kind enough to insinuate that I am no better than I should be."

"So I hear," remarked Georgina, looking rather hard at him. "I have already done my week in Brighton, and have been posted up in all the latest intelligence. Besides, I have seen Mr. De Wynt."

"Poor Mr. De Wynt!" interjected Clare.

"Why poor? I doubt whether he ever was poor Mr. De Wynt; but at any rate he is rich Mr. De Wynt now. His old uncle is dead at last, and has left him everything."

"Has he, really? I am so glad!" exclaimed Clare.

"Are you? I don't know that I am. I thought he did very well as he was, and I can't imagine him a High Sheriff or a Deputy Lieutenant."

"He is fitted for any position," Clare said, emphatically.

"And calculated to adorn it? Perhaps so, but it is impossible to say with any certainty, because there are some positions in which he will never find himself."

Something in the tone in which the last words were spoken caused Clare to make a rapid deduction, and late that night she invaded her sister-in-law's bed-room with the stern air of one who means to stand no nonsense.

"Georgina," she said, without any introductory observations, "Mr. De Wynt has proposed to you, and you have refused him."

"There is no evading your penetration," replied Georgina, placidly. "He has—and I have."

"Then I must say," cried Clare, in great vexation, "that I think you ought to be thoroughly ashamed of yourself!"

"Oh. Well, no doubt you know best. I am a poor simple creature, and I often do wrong without intending it; but why I ought to be ashamed of myself for refusing Mr. De Wynt, I don't altogether understand. Is it because I am particularly fitted to be a Deputy Lieutenant's wife?"

"Not at all; it is because you have been insane enough to refuse a man whom you love, and who very likely won't give you a second chance."

"I beg to say," replied Georgina, "that I have never been in love in my life. If I felt the slightest symptom of such a disease coming on, I should instantly set sail for the Antarctic Ocean and never be heard of again. I should feel that I had genossen das irdische Glück, and that it was high time for me to disappear from civilised society."

"It isn't the slightest use to talk to me like that," returned Clare, loftily; "it doesn't deceive me for a moment."

"Very well, then; I am pining for Mr. De Wynt. As soon as you leave the room, I shall throw myself, face downwards, on my bed and give way to a paroxysm of despair. All the same, I can't marry a man who has just come into a fortune, and whom I persistently snubbed when he was a comparative pauper."

"If that is the only thing!"

"But it is not the only thing. As I explained to you long ago, the idea of marriage in the abstract is repugnant to me. A single life has its attractions, after all. Has your experience led you to believe that marriages never turn out badly?"

Clare drew herself up slightly, and made no answer, not being sure whether Georgina had delivered this home-thrust accidentally or not. All doubt was removed from her mind by the latter, who went on:—

"That was a brutal thing to say, was it not? But, my dear, I intend to be brutal, and you can't stop me. Do you suppose it isn't as clear as the sun in heaven that you and Adrian have fallen out? Now, sit down here beside me and tell me the whole story from beginning to end."

"I know you mean to be kind, Georgina," began Clare, hesitatingly.

"I do; and that is why I am not going to let you put me down. I know I am not what is called a specially sympathetic woman; but as a set-off, I am far more trustworthy than the generality of women; added to which, I know my brother pretty well. I must not say that I know him better than you do; but you will allow that I am likely to judge him with greater impartiality." She rose from the low chair in which she had been sitting; and, taking Clare by the shoulders, forced her down into it. "Come," she said, as she perched herself sideways upon the arm; "what is it all about?"

Clare submitted. She was of too proud and reticent a nature to make such confessions easily; but since it was impossible to deny that she had quarrelled with her husband, it might be as well, she thought, to tell Georgina the truth and have done with it. She did not, however, tell the whole truth. She cut her recital as short as she could, and would have suppressed, among other incidents, that of Lady St. Austell's clandestine visit to Alexandra-gardens, had she not wished to prove beyond a doubt that she was the victim of no hallucination as to Adrian's treachery.

Georgina's comments were brief and decisive. "I see it all," she declared. "Adrian is a perfect imbecile. He always was, and I should be inclined to add that he always will be, only I hope that this may serve as a lesson to him. I don't know whether you are aware that he is rather more in love with you, if anything, than he was a year ago."

Clare shook her head, and smiled slightly.

"Well, he is," Georgina repeated. "My dear child, you may shake your head till it rolls off your shoulders, but you won't convince me that I am mistaken. He is a thoroughly miserable man—and I am very glad of it. I don't want you to forgive him yet awhile. If you were capable of getting up a hard flirtation on your own score, it would be no bad thing; but, as you won't do that, you had better continue your present course of treatment. I am not sure that, if I were a man, I shouldn't find it more terrible than the other. But please to bear in mind that you have no reason whatever to be miserable. I don't think so meanly of your intelligence as to believe that you are really jealous of poor Lady St. Austell, with her fat figure and her rouged cheeks. What you do complain of is that Adrian should seem to enjoy flirting with her or with anybody. It's only his way; but it's a bad way, and I quite agree with you in thinking that he ought to be cured it."
